[568] This is not a case of indulgence, but of strict right. The officers of Majesty have committed an error to the prejudice of the Petitioner, he is therefore [569]-titled to have the matter set right. The cases cited do not apply, they are cases of adversary writs. As to the Signet Bill, though not so stated in the petition it [570] has been actually corrected, and if required by the Court, an affidavit be produced.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I cannot advise you upon it. If I do anything upon this petition, it must be upon a complete statement of everything, and I shall seek the assistance of the Respondents, in order to insert such recitals as they consider material to enable them to call in question the validity of what may be said by me. It is pressing on my mind, that if this be a fatal error, and I refuse application, I fix the Petitioner with all the consequences of the error that has been committed; whereas, on the other hand, if I make an order, which, notwithstanding my endeavour to avoid error, may turn out to be illegal, the Respondents apprehend, have the means of being relieved from it; so that there seems to be no chance of doing any real and permanent injury by making an order, than by refusing to make one; but nevertheless, it is necessary to be extremely cautious.

There is no authority for calling for the production of the letters patent themselves. The letters patent are copied from the Privy Seal Bill, but it is the Privy Seal Bill and not the letters patent which is enrolled. The Privy Seal Bill, when enrolled, is the record in the Court of Chancery. The enrolment therefore must be made to correspond with the Privy Seal Bill and not with the letters patent. The purposes of correcting the record, the Privy Seal Bill alone is to be regarded.

[571] The stat. of 5 & 6 W. 4, c. 83, if looked at, will be found quite inadequate to remedy the mistake complained of.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I shall take time to consider what order ought to be made in this case.

The Petitioner, having petitioned Her Majesty for a grant of letters patent to secure to himself the exclusive use and enjoyment of a certain invention, Her Majesty having been pleased to grant that petition, adopted the usual process for the purpose of obtaining the grant. In the course of the proceedings, an error was made by a clerk in one of the offices in which the proceedings took place, and that error, not being discovered in reasonable time, found its way into the ment, which are in the possession of the party, and into that which is called the enrolment of the letters patent, which is in my custody as Master of the Rolls. The alteration consists of the substitution of the word "recovering" for the word "covering."

After litigation had commenced between the Petitioner and the persons who have appeared to oppose [572] the prayer of the petition, the Petitioner applied to me to have the word corrected in the Privy Seal Bill and in the enrolment of the letters patent. Considering it to be perfectly clear that the error was a mere slip, of which the Petitioner was entirely innocent, I consider it my duty to assist, in every way I can, in its amendment, but in such a way as may be in the least possible degree prejudicial to the party who is likely to suffer by it. It is a matter for the most serious consideration, not only whether I can legally do it, but if I can, in what manner and way it ought to be done.

I have nothing to do with the moral principle on which this application is made. The object, no doubt, is to take the advantage of a slip for the purpose of obtaining the right of the party. I make no observation upon that. The party has a right to take such an objection, if the law allows him to do so, but the question is, whether it ought to be allowed to prevail. Great learning and ingenuity have been shown in the argument, and if it were to prevail, I think it would be an extraordinary triumph of subtlety and technicality over commonsense and justice. At this moment it seems to me that it ought not, and I cannot think that it will ultimately prevail. The objections are of this sort, first, it is said that in the various proceedings which have unfortunately been rendered necessary prior to the letters patent and enrolment, the enrolment has not been rightly done, so as to enable me to have something in a correct form, duly made, whereby I may be enabled to correct the enrolment.

The other objection appears to me to be of a far more serious nature; whatever be the form of making out the letters patent, and the record of the enrolment [573], of the letters patent, there can be no doubt but that it was intended that they should correspond. I am, upon this occasion, asked to make such an alteration in the record, by obliterating the two letters "re," so that, when the alteration has been made, the record will not correspond with the letters patent, because it is stated in evidence that the letters patent contain the letters "re"—covering instead of ing."

It is a matter of most serious consideration whether I have any right or authority whatever, even if I had the letters patent here, to introduce any alteration in the record; I think that I have not, and I am at present strongly impressed with the conviction that what is required to be done cannot be legally and effectually done without the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor. I think that the authority both of the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls is required in order to do that which is now asked to be done. That is my present impression; and I feel it so strongly, that I cannot think of acting in any way against it, without having a communication with the Lord Chancellor on the subject, in order that I may know what his opinion may be.

As to the Privy Seal Bill, it is the authority upon which the enrolment is made; but it is that Privy Seal Bill coming from the Great Seal Office which is the authority for the enrolment. The Privy Seal Bill coming from the Great Seal Office is acted upon there; and it may be, that, for the purpose of this application, it may be sent back there, in order that the proposed alteration may be taken proper notice of there. I say this, although I cannot quite concur in the proposition advanced in the argument, that it is necessary for me to see that every anterior step has been strictly and duly followed. What I have got here, may, for [574] anything to the present venture to say to the contrary, be quite sufficient. I have got the sign-manual, the Queen's Bill, and the consent of the Solicitor-General to the alteration. If, indeed, every step prescribed to be taken in this case, were to be taken for the security of the Crown to prevent improvident grants of patents, it might be necessary, for the purpose of an amendment, to have the sanction of every officer through whose office the patent has passed; but I have once or twice called to the attention of the learned counsel upon the principle so many steps have been required—the principle, I am afraid, is not the purpose of giving greater security, but for the purpose of creating revenue, which revenue has been entirely satisfied by what has been already done. However (although I throw that out now), I shall reserve the consideration how this matter to be dealt with. If I make any order, I shall endeavour to do that which is right and I shall communicate it to the parties; but I shall make no order until I have had a communication with the Lord Chancellor, which I cannot at present have, account of the state of his Lordship's health; but as soon as I can, I will communicate with him, in order that I may know what his view is upon that part of the question which seems to me at least to be subject to very considerable doubt.

After making the above observations, the Master of the Rolls had an interview with the Lord Chancellor on the subject of this case, and then stated, that upon evidence as it stood before him, his opinion was that the patentee was entitled to relief; but that the enrolment could not properly be amended, without making corresponding amendment in the letters patent: and that [575] as he had no jurisdiction over the letters patent, the case appeared to him, as it had appeared to Lord Alvanley, in a like case, to require either a joint order or two concurrent orders from the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls. At that time it appeared to the Lord Chancellor, that if the Master of the Rolls were to make an order for amendment of the enrolment, any party having reason to complain of it would apply to the Lord Chancellor to discharge the order, and that upon the hearing of the application he could exercise the jurisdiction which he had over the letters patent, and by that means cause complete justice to be done, without any joint or concurrent orders of himself and the Master of the Rolls: and in consequence of this view of the case being taken by the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls made the following orders.

The first was dated the 27th of March 1841. It ordered that the proper officer of the office of the Privy Seal should be at liberty to attend the officer in whose custody the Privy Seal Bill then was, and to amend the said Privy Seal Bill, if he should think fit, by striking out the word "recovering" and inserting the word "covering" in lieu thereof; and it was ordered that the rest of the prayer of the petition should stand over.

The Privy Seal Bill having been amended in pursuance of the liberty given by the above order, March 30. The second order, dated the 30th of March 1841, was made, when after reciting that the Privy Seal Bill had been produced to the Master of the Rolls by the officer in whose custody it then was, and that it appeared to have been amended, in pursuance of the liberty given by the order of the 27th of March, it was ordered, that the enrolment made from the Privy Seal Bill should be amended, by striking out the word "recovering" and inserting the word "covering" in lieu thereof, so as to make the enrolment conformable to the Privy Seal Bill as amended; and that the proper officer should attend his Lordship with the enrolment for the purpose of such amendment being made in his presence. And it was ordered that a copy of that order should be endorsed on the roll on which the enrolment was made.

The enrolment made from the Privy Seal Bill was amended in pursuance of the last order, and a copy of the order was endorsed on the roll.

May 31. A petition to discharge both the above orders with costs was presented to the Lord Chancellor by the London Caoutchouc Company. After reconsideration and hearing the arguments, his Lordship thought that the object of altering the Privy Seal Bill was merely to authorise the holder of the Great Letters Patent to make corresponding alterations in the letters patent; and that an order should have been procured from the Lord Chancellor for the amendment of the letters patent before the Master of the Rolls made the order for alteration of the enrolment.

June 5. Subsequently the Lord Chancellor (referring to the above case of Lord Alvanley), expressed his opinion that the enrolment and the letters patent should have been concurrently amended; but having regard to the pendency of the case in which the letters patent were to be tried, his Lordship offered to the petitioner certain terms, on which he would attend to an application for the amendment of the letters patent. The patentee declined to accede to those terms, and took no steps to procure the letters patent to be altered. The Lord [577] Chancellor, on the forwards stated to him, expressed his opinion that the enrolment should be restored to its original state.

August 10. A further communication then took place between the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls; and finally an order was made on the 10th of August 1811, in the following terms: "Upon the petition" of the London Cautehouse Company, coming on to be heard before the Lord Chancellor in the presence of counsel for the Petitioners and for the Respondent, the said Christopher Nickels, and upon reading the said petition, and the several affidavits filed in support thereof and in opposition thereto, and what was alleged by the said counsel; his Lordship took time to consider his judgment, and having called to his assistance the Right Honourable the Master of the Rolls, upon the subject of the said orders bearing date 19th and 30th days of March 1841, and it appearing that Christopher Nickels, petitioner had not procured the letters patent to be altered according to the Privy Seal Bill as altered: It is hereby ordered and directed, that the order made by his Lordship the Master of the Rolls, dated the 30th day of March last, and indorsed on the roll on which the enrolment of the said Privy Seal Bill is made, be discharged, that the enrolment be restored to the state in which it was before such order was made; and that a copy of this order be indorsed on the said roll.

"COTTENHAM, C.

"LANGDALE, M. R."

[578] JAMES v. JAMES. Dec. 18, 21, 1841.

stood over with liberty to amend by adding parties. The Plaintiffs took out amendment to those parties, and stated so by amendment. The Defendants, by their answer, then objected, that the amendments had been improperly made. The Plaintiffs afterwards filed a second replication. Held, that the Defendants are not entitled to have the second replication taken off the file, unless they showed their objection to the amendments.

The testator devised some estates to trustees on certain trusts for his eleven children.

His bill was filed by two of such children, praying that the will might be proved, and that the interests of all parties thereunder might be ascertained and settled, and that a purchase of part of the property by one of the trustees might be set aside.

The answers of the Defendants objected that the representatives of several of the said children were necessary parties to the suit. A replication having been made, and witnesses examined, the cause came on for hearing in June 1840, and the objection for want of parties then prevailed. The cause was accordingly ordered to stand over, with liberty for the Plaintiffs to amend, by adding parties with apt words to describe them.

The Plaintiffs amended their bill, by stating that they had taken out representation of the deceased children, and by adding, as a new Defendant, an annuitant under the testator's will. The Defendants answered the amended bill, and submitted that the amendments were improper, and claimed the same benefit of the objection as the Plaintiffs had pleaded it.

The Plaintiffs, on the 2d of December 1841, filed a further replication to the Defendants' answer.

It was now moved, on behalf of two of the Defendants who claimed under the will, that the second replication might be taken off the file for irregularity; and that it might be taken off, so far as regarded the Defendants on whose behalf the amendment was made.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Freeling, in support of the motion. The proceedings of the Plaintiffs are altogether irregular. They had no right, under the liberty to amend, to introduce new statements by amendment, and sue in a new character as representatives of persons who were not before the Court at the former hearing, and thus raise a different issue against the Defendants; Milligan v. Mitchell (1 Myl. & Cr. 433), Goodwin v. Goodwin (3 Atk. 371).

Where parties are added after publication, the cause as to such parties must be heard on bill and answer only. (Hinde, 25, 1 Dan. Pr. 544.) This is the consequence of the rule, that, after publication of the evidence, the Court does not permit a new examination; Willan v. Willan (19 Ves. 590), Taylor v. Obee (3 Price, 83), Ward v. Eyles (Moseley, 377). If it be necessary to use evidence against the new Defendants, it must be taken in a supplemental suit; Pratt v. Barker (1 Sim. 1), Quantock v. Buller (5 Mad. 81); and a supplemental bill might have been filed under the leave to amend; Greenwood v. Atkinson (5 Sim. 419), Wood v. Wood (4 Y. & Col. 135).

If this replication were to remain, the witnesses already examined would have to be re-examined, and new questions would be raised between the parties.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. W. M. James, contra, contended that the rule stated in Hinde (page 25) did not apply, [580] that the Defendants had waived all objections to the amended bill by answering it, and that having raised new defences by the answer, it was necessary for the Plaintiffs to file a replication to the answer. That the motion ought to have been to take the amended bill off the file.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This motion has, no doubt, been in a great measure caused by reference to the rule which is stated in the books of practice, that if parties be added after publication, the cause, as to such parties, must be heard upon bill and answer only. It is not in this case necessary to determine upon the correctness of that rule, because it is not strictly applicable to this case, for these parties were not added after publication, but were original Defendants, against whom a new case is now made; they, in their turn, have brought a new case for their defence against the Plaintiffs in their new character, and while seeking to get rid of the second replication, they at the same time reserve their objections to the amendment. The case is involved in difficulties which perhaps require further consideration by the parties. At present, it seems to me that the Defendants are not entitled to take the replication off the file, and also to reserve their objections to the amendment; but if they are willing to waive the latter objection, I should be disposed to relieve them from the replication, unless the Plaintiffs, with the difficulties before them, would prefer making an application to be at liberty to set the cause right, and bring the representatives of the four children before the Court in the regular way.

[581] The parties, by consent, arranged an order on the terms suggested by the Court.

The Court will not marshal assets for the purpose of giving effect to charity legacies. A testatrix bequeathed legacies to charities and to individuals, and she directed her charity legacies to be paid "out of her ready money, and the proceeds of the sale of her funded property, personal chattels and effects, and not from the proceeds of by sale of her leasehold or real estates;" and she charged her leasehold estates, in addition, with the payment of her debts, funeral and testamentary expences, and legacies not given to charities. The pure personality was insufficient to pay the debts, &c., and all the legacies. Held, that the charity legacies failed in the proportion of the mixed personality to the pure personality.

Ann Sammon, by her will, gave legacies to certain individuals, amounting in the whole to about £4000; and she also gave legacies to charities, amounting together to about £1300 (amongst which was a legacy of £100 to the Plaintiffs), "which said charitable donations and bequests the testatrix directed should be paid and satisfied out of her ready money and the proceeds of the sale of her funded property, personal chattels and effects, and not from the proceeds or by sale of her leasehold or real estates; and the testatrix charged her leasehold estates, by her said will bequeathed to Sarah Bedcock and Mary Simmonds, in addition to her other personal estate, with and to the payment of her debts, funeral, and testamentary expenses, and of such of the said several pecuniary legacies and bequests thereinbefore particularly mentioned, and not given to charitable uses." The testatrix bequeathed her residuary estate to Sarah Bedcock and Mary Simmonds, to be equally divided between them.

The assets of the testatrix consisted of about £1200 in pure personalty, and £400 in personalty connected with real estate, of which £2985 was the produce of leaseholds, and the remainder a charge on real estate. Her assets were liable to about £500 debts, besides her funeral and testamentary expenses.

[582] On behalf of the charities, it was contended that under the terms of the will, the assets of the testatrix ought to be so marshalled, that the charity legacies should be in the first place wholly paid out of the pure personalty.

On the other hand, it was contended, that the charitable legacies were payable pro rata only, or in the proportion which the pure personal estate of the testatrix not specifically bequeathed, bore to the whole of her personal estate not specifically bequeathed.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Ellison, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Colville, for the Defendants.

Magg v. Hodges (2 Ves. sen. 52; and 1 Cox, 9), House v. Chapman (4 Ves. 542), Peris v. Walker (1 Russ. & My. 759), Attorney-General v. The Earl of Winchelsea (3 B. C. 374), Boote v. Blundell (1 Mer. 193), were amongst others cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is, if the Court can marshal the assets in order to give effect to charity legacies. In cases in which there has been a gift of the residue to a charity, there has been no doubt that so much of the residue as is connected with realty fails. There has, however, been a question, whether, where a particular legacy was given to a charity, there could be a marshalling of assets, in order to give effect to the charitable legacies. Lord Hardwicke thought there could be, and there are several [583] cases decided by him in which that has been done. (1) But it has now been decided beyond all doubt, that if a simple pecuniary legacy is given out of two sorts of personalty, there must be an abatement in the proportion of the mixed to the pure personalty. (2) I am not aware of any case in which the present question has been argued. The point was alluded to by Lord Hardwicke in Arnold v. Chapman (1 Ves. sen. 110), but he gave no decision on it, as the case before him did not require it. Moreover, there have been one or two cases in which the Court has sanctioned the payment of charity legacies out of the pure personalty, in the first instance: but there is no case in which it has been done after argument; therefore it is a new question. It does not come on in a very favourable form, when the direction is to pay the charitable bequests "out of the ready money, and proceeds of the sale of her funded property, personal chattels, and effects, and from the proceeds, or by sale of her leasehold or real estates;" but we have other directions charging the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, on the leaseholds, in addition to her other personal estate," and this precludes the assumption that the testatrix exonerated the pure personalty from the payments of the debts and leaseholds. The leaseholds being given "in addition to," and not "in exoneration of" her personal estate, we have the whole personal estate subject to the debts, &c., and the other legacies. The [584] necessary consequence is, that when you come to pay the assets in payment, you must have pro rata payments out of different parts of the personal estate; you pay the debts, funeral expenses, and legacies out of the fund, and yet it is desired that the charity legacies should be first paid out of the pure personalty. Here, as in every case, the testatrix intended all the legacies to be paid, but it must be done according to the principle of law; and if this were a matter altogether independent of authority, I own I should have thought that good reasons might have been found for marshalling assets. I cannot help very strongly thinking so; but considering the authorities which have prevailed, the language which has been laid down on this subject, and the necessity of having pro rata payments, in cases where charity legacies are concerned, I think that something more than is to be found in this will is wanting, to entitle the charity legacy to be paid in full out of the pure personalty. The words in this will seem to me insufficient to enable her intention to be carried into effect in the state of her assets.

The intention was perfectly lawful, and might have been effected in a different way; if there had been words introduced into this will, expressly throwing the other burthens upon the other portions of the estate. In that case, I think, the lawful intention would have been carried into effect, and there would have been no such difficulty as at present appears.

[585] BROWN v. PERROTT. August 2, Nov. 8, 9, 1841.

After verdict, and before judgment had been entered up, the Defendant sold his leaseholds by auction. Held, that under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, the Plaintiff could not levy execution on the purchase-money.

This case came before the Court on general demurrer. According to the allegations of the bill, the Plaintiff commenced an action at law against Perrott in June 1840, which was tried on the 17th of July when she obtained a verdict for £600. Final judgment was entered up in Michaelmas term 1840, and entered with the Master of the Common Pleas.

The bill alleged, that to defeat the Plaintiff's remedies, the Defendant, who was entitled to certain goods and a moiety of valuable leasehold property, had, on the 26th of July 1840, sold the goods; and that on the 23d of October the leaseholds had been sold by auction to three several purchasers; the Defendant fraudulently representing that the sale had taken place by Sophia Bryan, the administratrix of John Perrott, deceased, she being entitled to the other moiety of the leaseholds.

The bill also alleged that the Defendant made a fraudulent voluntary settlement of the property "pending the matters aforesaid;" and it contained allegations, that but for the fraudulent settlement, the Plaintiff would have been entitled to levy execution on the goods and leaseholds, and on the purchase-money.

The purchases had not been completed, and this bill was filed against the debtor, the several purchasers, the auctioneer who had the deposit, and the trustees under the settlement, not questioning the validity of the sales as regarded the purchasers, but praying, in effect, that the settlement might be declared fraudulent and void [586] as against the Plaintiff, and might be cancelled; that the Plaintiff might be let in to levy execution on Perrott's half of the purchase-money of the leaseholds and goods, or otherwise that the proceeds might be applied in payment of the Plaintiff's demand, and for accounts and an injunction.

One of the purchasers filed a general demurrer.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Younge, in support of the demurrer. The Plaintiff has no right to make purchases for valuable consideration without notice, parties to this bill, in which the purchases cannot be completed; he ought merely to have prayed for a receiver, who would have carried the contracts into execution. The bill is multifarious in making the several purchasers, whose contracts are distinct, parties to one bill.

The property was so circumstanced that if the settlement were out of the way, the Plaintiff would not be able to take it in execution.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, contra. Under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13, a judgment operates as a charge on all lands, &c., to which the debtor at the time of entering up the judgment is entitled "for any estate or interest whatever at law or in equity." The Plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to set aside the fraudulent settlement which intercepts her charge, and to take Perrott's interest in execution.

By the twelfth section the sheriff may seize any money, or bank notes, and "any cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes, bonds, specialties, or other securities for money, belonging to the person against whose effects [587] such writ of fiery facias shall be sued out; and may and shall pay or deliver to the party suing out such execution any money or bank notes which shall be so seized or a sufficient part thereof, and may and shall hold any such cheques, bills of exchange, &c., or other securities for money as a security" for the amount directed to be levied, "and may sue in the name of such sheriff or other officer for the recovery of the sum or sums secured thereby if and when the time of payment thereof shall have arrived." The sheriff might have seized and delivered the contract to the creditor, and might have enabled him to sue on it, if it were not for the fraudulent settlement, which ought therefore to be set aside.

Giving notice to the purchaser makes him a trustee for the Plaintiff. They cited Sagden's Vendors, 395, 399.

Nov. 8. Mr. Turner, in reply. By the thirteenth section no judgment creditor is to proceed in equity to obtain the benefit of his charge until after the expiration of one year from the time of entering up judgment.

The words "other securities" mean securities for money like those previously mentioned, viz., on bond. No suit for specific performance could be sustained in the name of the sheriff under this Act, for the sheriff could not complete the purchases.

Nov. 9. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case I have referred to the notes which I took of the argument when the case was heard on the former occasion, and I am of opinion that the demurrer must be allowed.

[588] The object of this bill is to set aside a settlement alleged to be fraudulent, in order that the Plaintiff may have the benefit of levying execution on a judgment which she has obtained. There are a great many general allegations in the bill, that for the settlement alleged to be fraudulent, the Plaintiff would be entitled to do so, if it rested there, credit might probably be given to those general allegations; upon the bill she has stated a certain number of facts, from which it appears to me she would not be entitled to levy execution, if there had been no such settlement which she alleges, and on that ground it is that I think the demurrer must be allowed.

An appeal was lodged, but the case was afterwards compromised.

[589] CLARKE v. TIPPING. Jan. 18, 1842.

[For subsequent proceedings, see 9 Beav. 284.]

It is not necessary for a Plaintiff in a bill for an account to submit to account himself; a demurrer on the ground of the omission of such a submission was therefore overruled.

This case came before the Court upon a demurrer for want of equity and for want of facts.

It appeared, by the statements of the bill, that the Plaintiff had employed the defendant Mr. Tipping for a number of years, as his agent and factor, and that very private accounts subsisted between them.

In the year 1840, the Plaintiff having become embarrassed in his circumstances, entered into an arrangement with his creditors; and, upon that occasion, it was suggested by Mr. Tipping, and, as the Plaintiff [589] said, believed by him, that Tipping was a creditor to a considerable amount; and the amount of his debt, having been ascertained, was computed at the sum of £2000.

The intended arrangement was carried into effect by a deed-poll dated in November, and a deed of trust dated in December in the same year. By the former, after reciting that the Plaintiff's debts amounted to £7600, and that the Plaintiff was indebted to the several persons named in the schedule, in the several sums set opposite their names, the several creditors released, &c., the Plaintiff from all demands, &c. This deed was executed by the Defendant Mr. Tipping; but no amount was set opposite his name in the schedule. By the deed of trust, the Plaintiff conveyed certain property to trustees, in trust to convert into money, and divide amongst the creditors, parties to the deed-poll, "in proportion and according to their respective demands."

The Plaintiff, by his bill, alleged that he was induced, by the representations of Mr. Tipping, to believe that there was a debt of the estimated amount due to him; but that he had subsequently discovered that he was, in that respect, deceived, and that, in point of fact, if the accounts were properly taken, not only would the £2000 not be due to Mr. Tipping, but the balance would probably be the other way. The bill prayed, that the accounts might be taken, and that the Defendant might be decreed to pay the Plaintiff what might be found to be due from him, the Plaintiff being willing that the Defendant, if anything should be found due to him on taking the accounts, should "receive satisfaction for the same, according to the arrangement of the year 1840, and in the manner provided by the indenture of December 1840. And that it might be [590] declared that the release of 20th November 1840 was binding on the Defendant John Tipping."

The bill did not make the other creditors, who had executed the composition deed, parties, and contained no offer to pay any balance, which, on taking the accounts, might be found due from the Plaintiff to the Defendant, but it contained the following allegation: "And the said Defendant pretends, that the creditors who may have executed the said deed-poll, are interested in the matters in question in this case, and are necessary parties thereto, whereas your orator charges the contrary of such pretences to be true, and that, by express agreement, such creditors are not interested in any part of the monies subject to the trusts of the before-stated indenture, except the portion thereof which may bear the same ratio to the whole, as the debt claimed by such creditor bore to the sum of £7600 aforesaid, of which it formed part: and that the benefit to arise from the partial or entire failure of the said Defendant's claim to a debt of £2000, or of the claim of any creditor to any debt, belongs not to a person party to the said deed-poll, but exclusively to the Plaintiff."

To this bill the Defendant Tipping put in a general demurrer for want of equity and for want of parties.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Rolt, in support of the demurrer. The Plaintiff is not entitled to the relief which he asks: he seeks to set aside the arrangement partly only. It cannot be said that the fraud vitiates a transaction in part only; Myddelton v. Lord Kenyon (2 Ves. jun. 408). [591] Lord Loughborough there observes, "If a case was made out, &c., it is impossible upon such a case so stated, that a Court of Equity could give the relief prayed by the bill. The relief prayed is not to set aside the deed as null and void, but to declare that all the trusts are void after that payment of the debts, leaving all those parts to stand and obtain their full effect so far as the payment of the debts goes. The species of relief, it is totally incompetent to the Court to give. The deed may be set aside in toto. Any bargain the parties enter into with each other may be declared null, and set aside upon grounds of fraud, practice or influence, &c. These grounds would entitle the Court to set it aside in whole, but I cannot make a new bargain for the parties."

Secondly. The Plaintiff is not entitled to the account, he not having, by his bill, submitted (as he ought) to pay what may be found due from him. The point was decided in Hickson v. Aylward, (1) and Sir A. Hart observed, "Where a bill for an account omits the offer on the part of the Plaintiff, to pay what shall appear to be due in balance turn against the Plaintiff, Lord Eldon often decided that would not do." Huddell v. Watts (2 Anstruther, 543), Fife v. Clayton (13 Ves. 547), the Defendant was driven to a cross-bill if the record remains in its present state.

Thirdly. The other creditors who were parties to the arrangement, are necessary parties to this bill, for they have an interest in cutting down the Defendant's [592] claim, so as to increase the proportions which will belong to them, and not to the Plaintiff; besides which, it is possible that they were induced to sanction the arrangement on the faith of the Plaintiff being indebted to the Defendant to the extent represented. The allegation, that they have been satisfied, is not supported by the facts stated, and if there be any doubt, the statement must be taken against the pleader.

They also cited Cave v. Foulkes (Rolls, March 28, 1836).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bazalgette, in support of the bill. The old rule certainly was, that a bill for an account ought to contain a submission to pay, but the contrary is now long been settled. The Colombian Government v. Rothschild (1 Sim. 102). Such an offer would contradict the statements of the bill which allege that nothing is due. The Court in granting relief, will do it on proper equitable terms as regards the Defendant. [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. There have been cases in which, to the very great surprise of the Plaintiffs, the Court has directed an account against them; in Buxton v. Buxton.]

As to the objection for want of parties, it is said, that the dividends to the others could be increased by destroying the Defendant's claim, but that is not so, for the other creditors were entitled in the fixed proportion which the aggregate of their own and the Defendant's supposed debt bore to the whole trust fund; and according to the allegations of the bill, the other creditors have been paid, and by agreement have no further claim. If the other creditors concurred in the arrangement, on the faith of a debt of £2000 being due to the Defendant, [593] and which is not stated on the bill, it might be a ground to set aside the release as fraudulent, but it does not make them necessary parties.

If there be any doubt as to their being necessary parties, it will be more convenient to err by not making them parties at present, than to make them parties now, and for the Plaintiff hereafter to sustain the expence of dismissing the bill against them because they appear to be unnecessary parties. Mare v. Malachy (1 Myl. Cr. 574).

Mr. G. Turner, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is not disputed that this bill contains sufficient allegations of fraud to entitle the Plaintiff to bring this clause to a trial, provided he has shaped his bill in a proper form. It is said, however, that the bill is informal in this respect:—that the Plaintiff has not offered to account himself, or to pay what, upon the taking of the accounts, may appear to be due from him to the Defendant Mr. Tipping; instead of doing that he has insisted that he is entitled to the benefit of the arrangement in one respect, whilst he seeks to be relieved from it in another.

The argument turns upon the proposal which is made, to confine Mr. Tipping to a sum of money as he may be entitled to on the footing of the trust deed, instead of offering to pay the whole sum of money, which, upon the taking of the accounts, may turn out to be due to him.

[594] In the first place it is to be observed, that a general demurrer for want of relief cannot be allowed, if the Plaintiff appears, upon the record, to be entitled to relief whatever.

The Defendant, alleging, upon the argument of this case, that the Plaintiff cannot be bound to render any account beyond that which he has offered upon the bill, says, that he has not offered upon the bill to do that, which, upon the hearing of the cause, may turn out to be entitled to; he says also, that he ought now to be considered as entitled to have full payment, if the account or the arrangement is in any way disturbed, and that as the Plaintiff has not offered him full payment, he is therefore not entitled to any relief at all.

The real foundation of this argument is the assumption, that the Plaintiff is not bound to account beyond his offer; that is, that he is not bound to account for more, or to give greater relief to the Defendant, than the Plaintiff has offered to give upon the bill.

This point has certainly been a subject very often discussed. It was the subject of difference of opinion between two very great and eminent lawyers; and I recollect an occasion where, in the presence of two Judges of this Court, it was asked, what would happen upon such a demurrer as this. It was answered by one of them, I should have no hesitation in overruling it—not the slightest. The answer made by the other was, that it required a good deal of consideration, and a difference of opinion was certainly expressed; but occasions have repeatedly occurred, where the Plaintiff, not offering at all to account, and not admitting himself to be an accounting party, but seeking an account against a person acknowledged to be an accounting party, has appeared, at the hearing, to be himself accountable, and there the Court has ordered him to account, and that without any offer having been made on his part. Notwithstanding the opinion of Sir Anthony Hart, which entirely coincided with the opinion he had formed long previously to his deciding the case of Hickson v. Aylmer, I think that this Court has often (notwithstanding the doubts which have been raised) ordered the Plaintiff to do that which was just, when he was applying at the hearing to have justice done to himself; and I cannot have any doubt, that if this case were before me at the hearing, and the Plaintiff were to try to confine his liability to the offer he has made, such attempt would fail.

I think that there is in this Court quite sufficient jurisdiction to compel the Plaintiff seeking equity upon a matter of account of this kind, to do equity on his part; and without saying that the Defendant may not be perfectly right in the claim he makes, or that the Plaintiff may not be quite wrong, in insisting that he can have the benefit of the arrangement when he seeks to be relieved from a part of it, I am of opinion that this is not a proper case for a general demurrer. The Defendant, therefore, cannot by general demurrer relieve himself from the duty of answering.

With respect to the demurrer for want of parties, I think it is impossible to be sustained on the allegations in this bill.

It is said, that the allegations that the other creditors are not interested on the bill, are not to be taken to be true; because there is a statement in the bill, from which it may, by a somewhat strained inference, collect a contradiction, and (as it is quite true) that the Defendant is, in [596] such a case, entitled to take the allegations in a most strongly against the Plaintiff, you must take that inference and allegation from his statement, in priority to the subsequently distinct statements which are made in the bill. I think, however, that the allegations in this bill are sufficiently distinct to remove the objection for want of parties.

I am not satisfied that the objection may not in substance be well founded; when creditors enter into a composition with their debtors, they have a right to be made fully acquainted with the circumstances, and to be assured that the statements made at the time are precisely true, in order that they may judge for themselves whether they will enter into such an arrangement or not; the circumstance of the debt being or not being to the amount of £2000 to Mr. Tipping, might have materially affected the other creditors in coming in under the deed. However, on the allegations in the bill, it being distinctly stated that no other creditor has now any interest in the matter, I cannot allow this objection for want of parties. It may also be recollected that this is an objection which the other creditors might be entitled to take advantage of when they come here in a suit of their own, and yet it may not be necessary for Mr. Tipping to bring them here to contest the point. The whole I think I must overrule this demurrer.(1)

Administrator ordered on motion to transfer a sum of consols into Court, upon admission in his examination before the Master, that he had possessed it, and sold it out after the bill had been filed, and had invested it in other securities, which he did not specify.

(1) The case was heard on appeal on the 9th and 11th of March 1842, before Lord Lyndhurst C., who affirmed the decision.

This case is reported on a demurrer, ante (3 Beavan, 234). So far as it is material to state them, the facts were as follows:—

William Blake, a lunatic, died in 1838, possessing £11,403 consols; and the Defendant R. D. Blake obtained letters of administration. The Plaintiff, who claimed to be entitled to a part of his estate as the assignees of one of the next of kin, filed this bill in June 1839, for an account of the consols and debts, &c., of the lunatic, and for a division of the residue amongst the next of kin. R. D. Blake was one of such next of kin.

In November 1841 a decree was made for taking the usual accounts.

The cause being brought into the Master's office, the Defendant, the administrator, was examined on interrogatories. By his examination he admitted he had possessed himself of the £11,100 consols belonging to William Blake the lunatic, and that he had since sold out, transferred, or otherwise disposed of all the said Bank annuities; and that "the said Bank annuities were transferred or disposed of by him in or about the month of July 1839, according to the best of his belief. But he said he did not know, &c., when the said Bank annuities were so transferred or disposed of save as aforesaid, nor for what respective sum or sums of money." He also said, "that he considering it advantageous to the estate of the said intestate, and for the benefit of the Plaintiff, should they ultimately be deemed entitled in this suit, but which he had been advised and believed they were not), exchanged, transferred, or otherwise disposed of the said Bank annuities, and obtained or took in lieu thereof securities or property."

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bagshawe now moved that the Defendant Robert Dudley Blake might be ordered to transfer into Court, in trust in this cause, the sum of £11,100 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, admitted by his answer and examination to have been possessed and received by him as administrator of William Blake deceased; and also the amount of all dividends which had accrued due thereon since the death of the said intestate. They contended that this sum of money being admitted to have been possessed of by the administrator, and to have been sold out by him, ought to be brought into Court; that the burthen was on the Defendant to show that it had been otherwise properly invested or applied. They referred to the cases in which executors, who had improperly invested the assets on personal securities, had been ordered to pay the amount into Court. Vigars v. Binfield (Mad. 62), Johnson v. Aston (1 Sim. & St. 73).

Mr. Tinney, contra, contended that upon the present admission the order asked should not be made. That the Plaintiffs ought to have required a further answer, and ascertained how the fund was now invested, as it might possibly have been laid upon proper securities, and that, therefore, the cases referred to did not apply. There was no charge of insolvency made against the [599] administrator, and there were no grounds for taking the property out of the hands of the legal personal representatives until the cause came on for further directions.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I must deal with this case in the way as if the motion were made upon admissions contained in the answer of the Defendant. He apparently has charged himself with this sum, therefore he is facie liable for it; but then he says he has disposed of it, but does not explain. What, therefore, I must do is to order the transfer into Court of this sum, leaving the Defendant a sufficient time to enable him to state if he has invested this sum on such securities as can be relied on, and as will entitle him to a reasonable time to call it in.

Therefore, order the Defendant to transfer the whole fund into Court within a month, with liberty for him to apply in the meantime.

See Meyer v. Montrieux, 4 Beavan, 343, and the cases there cited.

[600] JAMES V. BYDDER. July 3, 6, Nov. 12, 1841.

A. B. voluntarily assigned to trustees bonds and promissory notes amounting £600, in trust for himself and his wife and children, and he handed over securities. The trustees gave no notice to the debtors. A. B. received £200 part of the £600 (the securities having been returned to him by the trustees), the remainder was lost by the insolvency of the debtors. A. B. invested the £200 with other monies of his own on freeholds, and by writing acknowledged the £200 to be trust property. He afterwards deposited the title-deeds with the trustees as a security for the whole £600. Held, that the equitable mortgage was valid to the extent of £200 but no further.

In 1819 John Betts voluntarily executed a post-nuptial settlement, whereby he assigned to trustees certain bonds and promissory notes amounting to £600, which were due to him from different persons, and he gave them the usual power of attorney to receive the same. The trustees were to hold the monies when recovered upon trust for the settlor for life, and after his decease for his wife for life, and after their deaths upon certain trusts for their children, of whom there were then three. And the settlor further covenanted with the trustees that he would, within the space of twelve months after the decease of his then wife, pay to the trustees an additional sum of £300 upon the trusts of the settlement.

The bonds and promissory notes were delivered over by Betts to the trustees, but the promissory notes were not indorsed to them, and no notice was given to the persons indebted upon these securities of the assignment to the trustees.

John Morgan, who was one of the trustees, afterwards handed over to John Betts the bonds and promissory notes, and he recovered a sum of £100 secured by a bond and another sum of £100 due on a promissory note, but the remainder of the £600 was lost by the insolvency of the debtors. The £200 received by Betts with other money, applied in purchasing of the Greyhound Inn at Swansea.

In the year 1828 John Betts was pressed by the trustees of the settlement to pay or secure to them [601] the £600 included in the settlement, and on being threatened with proceedings to compel him to comply with their request, he offered to mortgage to them the Greyhound Inn to secure the £600, and instructed his solicitors to prepare a mortgage. A draft of the mortgage was prepared, containing a recital that part of the purchase-money of the Greyhound Inn consisted of a part of the £600 assigned by the settlement. The draft was read over to and approved of by Betts, but on the expense of perfecting it being stated, he refused to execute any deed of mortgage, and proposed, in lieu thereof, to deposit the title-deeds of the Greyhound Inn, in the hands of the trustees, as a security for the £600. The proposal was acceded to by the trustees; the deeds were placed in the hands of the solicitors and continued in their possession or power until the decease of John Betts. No legal mortgage was ever executed.

The wife of the settlor died in 1820; he married again, and had four children by his second wife. In 1836 John Betts, being seized in fee of the Greyhound Inn, made his will, by which he directed, amongst other things, that the Greyhound Inn and premises should be sold, and the proceeds paid to the four children by his second marriage.

John Betts, the settlor, died in 1837, whereupon his widow took possession of the Greyhound Inn, and she afterwards married the Defendant Bydder.

The Plaintiff, who was the surviving trustee of the settlement, filed a bill against Bydder and wife, and against the settlor's four children by the second marriage, and the executor of the testator, claiming, as trustees, on behalf of the objects of the settlement, the benefit of the equitable mortgage of the Greyhound Inn, and praying an [602] account of what was due and a sale of the premises, and an account of the personal estate of the testator, and for payment of what was due out of his real and personal estate.

The following memoranda in the handwriting of Betts were proved :—

"Swansea, 22d of July 1820.—I hereby acknowledge that Mr. John Morgan has turned to me Mr. John Benyon's bond for £100, which he held in trust for my children, and that the amount of the said bond has been received by me and deposited in the bank of Messrs. Gibbins & Eaton, Swansea. The above sum was laid out in the purchase of the Greyhound Inn in the town of Swansea.

"Memorandum, that I have to acknowledge that Mr. John Morgan has the 19th January 1822 returned me the note I delivered to him in trust for my children to Mr. John French for £100, which amount I have laid out in the purchase of the Greyhound Inn in the town of Swansea. JOHN BETTS."

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Stinton, for the Plaintiff. The equitable mortgage is actual, either to the extent of £600, or at least for the £200 received by the settlor. Where a party voluntarily settles property in favour of others, he cannot afterwards recall it; Bill v. Curleyn (2 Myl. & K. 503), Petre v. Espinasse (Ib. 496). By assignment of the securities and the delivery of the indicia of the [603] debts, was done that could be done to give effect to the settlement. That is sufficient, as held in Fortescue v. Barnett (3 Myl. & K. 36), in the case of a policy, where one of the assignment had not been given to the office. If the first transaction is incomplete and voluntary, still there was a good and valuable consideration for the second arrangement, for arrears accrued under a voluntary bond form a valuable consideration, sustaining a subsequent conveyance even as against creditors; Gilham v. Locke (9 Ves. 612), Stiles v. Attorney-General (2 Atk. 152), Tanner v. Byrne (Ib. 160).

The settlement, being in favour of children, is also supported by a meritorious consideration, which is sufficient to induce the Court to aid it in its operation; Ellis v. Hume (1 Lloyd & G. 333), Ellison v. Ellison (6 Ves. 656).

As to the sum of £200, the testator received it as agent of the trustees, and he afterwards acknowledged the trust on which it was held.

Mr. Addis, for the Defendants. The first transaction was incomplete, and no assignment of the bonds and notes of hand was or could be made by the parent, and no notice was given to the debtors; the settlement being voluntary and incomplete as an assignment, the Court will not assist those claiming under it, as the children claiming under the will. The equitable mortgage does not assist the Plaintiff in his claim, because that likewise is an incomplete transaction, and it must be contended that two incomplete transactions will, together, have [604] the effect of a perfect one. The relation of trustees and cestui que trust was never established, as the trust fund was unreceived, and at the time of the execution of the settlement was in the pockets of the persons owing the money; except as to £200, which was never received. The peculiar circumstances of this case illustrate the advantage of the "locus penitentiae," which Sir W. Grant said belonged to a voluntary mortgage; it enabled the parent to act consistently with common justice and his duty, to make a provision for the younger branches of the family who otherwise would have been wholly unprovided for. At all events, £200 only can be recovered by the Plaintiff. He cited Pulvertoft v. Pulvertoft (18 Ves. 84), Antrobus v. Smith (12 Ves. 404), Stearns v. Jones (1 M. & C. 226), Jefferys v. Jefferys (Cr. & Ph. 138), Holloway v. Hopley (8 Sim. 324), Ward v. Audland (Ib. 571).

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

No. 12. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill is filed for the purpose of enforcing an equitable mortgage; and being merely equitable, it is necessary to ascertain the consideration for which it was given, and for that purpose to go into the prior transactions.

He found that the mortgagor voluntarily executed a post-nuptial settlement, by which he assigned to trustees certain bonds and notes, and the monies thereby realised to the amount of £600. The securities were deposited with trustees, but it did not appear that any notice whatever was given to the debtors upon that point.

[65] Now, if the matter had rested there, and those monies had afterwards been realized by the trustees, a state of things would have arisen very different from the which now exists.

As to £400, part of the £600, nothing was ever received, and the securities do not appear to have been delivered back to the settlor; but as to the other sum amounting to £200, the case is very different. It being possible and desirable to recover the sum, the trustees placed the two securities in the hands of the settlor, who actually received the money and signed the memoranda, and identifying the sums, and acknowledging that he had received them in terms which, I own, appear to me to affect him with the trust which he had himself created in respect of those sums. True, the sums which were subject to the trust which he had voluntarily created were in his hands; but, I think, after he had so received those sums, the dealing with them was no voluntary matter upon his part. It appears he laid out the £200 together with other sums in the purchase of the property, which is the subject of the equitable mortgage. What passed precisely on the occasion of his depositing the deeds does not appear, but I infer that all he did upon that occasion was entirely voluntary, that he did not consider that he was submitting to an enforcement of right; he gave instructions for the mortgage which was to extend, not only to the sums which he received, but to all the other sums comprised in the voluntary arrangement. Finding that arrangement more expensive than he at first anticipated, he refused to perfect it. The obligation, if any there was, was not then sought to be enforced against him, but the trustees accepted that which he voluntarily offered, namely, this equitable mortgage. I think that that equitable mortgage cannot extend further than the good consideration which was retained for it, namely, those two sums of £100 each, [606] which, I think, he held affected with the trust which he created, and which he had no right afterwards to dispute at his own pleasure. Plaintiff is therefore entitled to an equitable charge to the extent of £200.

In a suit for specific performance, a purchaser who set up a defence which prevented the Plaintiff obtaining on motion a reference as to title, and failing in establishing it, was ordered to pay the costs up to, and inclusive of, the hearing. Observations on special conditions of sale.

In 1839 the Plaintiffs put up an estate for sale by auction, subject to special conditions of sale. By these, the vendors were to deliver an abstract within four days, and objections were to be taken within twenty-one days after, or the purchase was to be held to have accepted the title. The vendors were to be at liberty within ten days after the return of the abstract with observations thereon, to rescind the contract, on repayment of the deposit and interest in full of all demands.

The sixth condition was as follows:—"All the statements and recitals in any order or document abstracted, or recited in a deed or document abstracted, shall be conclusive evidence of the facts and circumstances, and of the contents of the statements stated and recited; and the vendors shall not be required to produce further evidence of the same, or to deduce the representation to any trustee, in case a term or other legal estate has been vested, or to get in any such legal estate, or procure the concurrence, in the sale or conveyance, of any parties interested in the equity of redemption of the property sold, or to produce any deed or document in their (the vendors') possession; and all certificates of births, burials, and marriages, and all declarations [607] and copies of deeds or documents and assignments, renders and conveyances of outstanding legal estates, shall be at the expense of the person requiring the same, and the completion of the purchase shall not be delayed till such outstanding estate can be got in."

The Defendant became the purchaser for £2700, and signed a contract written the conditions of sale, by which it was agreed, "that the said particulars and conditions of sale should be taken as the terms of agreement for the said sale and purchase respectively, and be observed and fulfilled by the said J. S. Hyde and H. Dallaway respectively in all things."

The principal question between the parties was, whether, under the terms of the condition, that "the purchaser should not require the concurrence of the parties interested in the equity of redemption," the purchaser could be compelled to take a mortgage which a mortgagee had acquired under 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 40.

The vendors filed a bill for specific performance, and the Defendant set up the following defences:—First, that the Plaintiffs had not shewn a good title. Secondly, that both the auctioneer and Mr. Gregg (the vendor's solicitor), repeated several times at the sale that "a good and marketable title could be made;" and that the Plaintiffs were consequently bound to make "a good and marketable title." And, Thirdly, that the Defendant "was the only real bidder," and that the "other biddings" were not real or bona fide, but were made by the auctioneer on behalf of the Plaintiffs." In consequence of the two latter defences, the Plaintiffs were unable to obtain, on the usual reference as to title, and at the hearing, the Defendant failed to rebut the two latter defences.

[1808] The cause came on for hearing, when

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Dunn asked for a decree for specific performance with costs up to and including the hearing, on the ground that the conduct of the Defendant prevented the usual reference. Taylor v. Brown (2 Beav. 180).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Ramsden, contra, contended, that having regard to the conduct of the vendors, and the oppressive nature of the conditions of sale, (1) the Court ought not to decree a specific performance.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held, that the Defendant must pay the costs as had been occasioned by the allegations that the Plaintiffs were bound to make a good and marketable title, and that the Defendant was the only real bidder, including therein the costs of the hearing; and that there must be a reference to the Master to inquire whether a good title could be made according to the conditions, and if so, when it was first shewn.

The Lordship afterwards observed on the difficulty which the Court sometimes has in dealing with special conditions of sale. On the one hand it was hard to say that parties should not enter into contracts suited to their convenience and to the nature of their titles, but, on the other hand, conditions of sale were sometimes of a nature, that it was scarcely practicable to carry them into execution, consistently with the settled principles of Courts of Equity.

A testatrix devised a real estate, and afterwards sold it. The purchase was not completed till after her death. Held, that the purchase-money belonged to the personal representatives, and not to the devisees of the testatrix, notwithstanding her lien on the estate for the purchase-money, and notwithstanding the 1 V. 26, s. 23, which directs "That no conveyance or other act made or done subsequently to the execution of a will of or relating to any real or personal therein comprised, except an act by which such will shall be revoked as aforesaid shall prevent the operation of the will with respect to such estate or interest in real or personal estate as the testator shall have power to dispose of by will at the time of his death."

The question in this case was, whether a sum of £2250, 3s. 9d. belonged to the legal personal representatives or to the devisees of the testatrix Ann Chapman.

She made her will, dated the 17th of December 1834, and thereby devised certain freehold estates to trustees, for a term of 500 years, on certain trusts; and as to the term, and to the trusts thereof, to the use of the Petitioners Charlotte Chapman, Catherine Chapman, and Jane Chapman, for their respective lives, as tenants in common, and after the death of any one, to the surviving two for their respective lives, as tenants in com-[2]-mon, and after the death of two, to the surviving one for life; with remainder to Adolphus Cottin, in fee; and she appointed the Petitioners executrices of her will.

She made a codicil of the same date, and by another codicil, dated the 2nd of June 1838, reciting that Adolphus Cottin was dead, she devised the same freehold estates (subject to the trusts to take effect antecedent to the use in favour of Adolphus Cottin in fee), to the use of the Earl of Winterton for life, with remainder to any of his children.

On the 8th of January 1839 the testatrix entered into a contract with Farrar and others; and thereby, in consideration of the sums of £2250 and £250 to be paid as therein mentioned, she agreed to sell to them the freehold estates therein described (being part of the freeholds devised by the will and codicil); and it was agreed, that on receiving payment of the purchase-money, the testatrix or on or before the 26th day of June 1839, execute a conveyance of the land to the purchasers and their heirs.

The purchase was made by or for the trustees of a Wesleyan chapel, and purchase-money was to be paid out of certain funds standing in the name of the accountant-General of the Court of Exchequer; and by an order of that Court, dated 22d of April 1839, it was referred to the Master, to inquire whether the contract was a fit and proper contract to be carried into execution.

The Master, by his report dated the 29th of June 1839, certified, that the contract was a fit and proper contract to be carried into execution, and that it would be proper to invest part of the funds in Court in the [3] purchase; and he found that good title could be made to the estate.

The report was confirmed on the 5th of July 1839, and it was then ordered that the Master should settle a proper conveyance; but some of the trustees having died, trustees were appointed, and before the draft conveyance had been settled or proved, Ann Chapman, the testatrix, died, without having revoked her will and codicils.

At the date of the will and codicils and of the contract, and at the time of the testatrix's death, the legal estate in the freeholds comprised in the contract was held in Elizabeth Wegg, who, after the death of the testatrix, conveyed it to the trustees of the will.

A bill was afterwards filed by the trustees of the chapel, against the trustees and persons under the will and codicils, praying for a specific performance of the contract; by a decree of the Court of Exchequer, dated the 27th of March 1841, it was ordered that the contract ought to be performed, and a conveyance was ordered to be made to the purchasers; but a question having arisen as to whom the purchase-money belonged, it was ordered that the purchase-money should be carried over to an account, to be entitled, "The account of the personal representatives or devisees of Chapman, deceased."

Certain costs were to be paid out of the funds standing to that account, and the trustees or any other persons were to be at liberty to apply touching the residue of the fund, after paying such costs, as they should be advised.

The Petitioners who were, as already stated, the legal personal representatives of the testatrix, now applied to have the residue of the fund transferred to them.

The argument turned principally on the effect of the recent Statute of Wills (1 & 2 Vict. c. 36), which was applicable to the present case. By the nineteenth section, it is enacted, "that no will shall be revoked by any presumption of an intention, on the ground of an alteration in circumstances."

The twenty-third section it is enacted, "that no conveyance or other act, made subsequently to the execution of a will of or relating to any real or personal estate therein comprised, except an act by which such will shall be revoked as afore-said, shall prevent the operation of the will with respect to such estate or interest in real or personal estate as the testator shall have power to dispose of, by will, at the time of his death;" and by the next section, the will is to speak as from the death of the testator.

Tinney and Mr. G. Law, in support of the petition. The fund belongs to the personal representatives, and not to the devisees. By the contract for sale, the testatrix parted with her estate, and must, constructively, be considered a trustee of the fund for the purchaser, and the latter as a trustee of the purchase-money for her; see Bright (1 Jac. & W. 500). The testatrix became entitled to the purchase-money, but had no beneficial interest in the estate at her death. The statute does not apply, for, by the sale, the devise was adeemed, and became inoperative. The effect of the twenty-[5]-third section was this: before this act, a devise was frequently defeated by the testator's taking a new limitation of the property to himself, and thus changing the nature or quality of the estate was held to operate as a revocation; the twenty-third section was intended to prevent this effect, and not to abridge the power of a testator of dealing as he pleased with his property. If the words be taken literally, the property would pass to the devisee in a case in which the testator, after making and conveying to the purchaser, took a mortgage on the property or acquired an interest therein.

The most absurd consequences would follow if it be held that the devisee is to have the equitable estate has passed to the purchaser, and would descend to his heirs; it would be strange to hold that it passed also to the devisee of the vendor. If the devisees take anything, they must hold in the same way as the testatrix; viz., as trustees only for the purchaser. The words of the statute will be satisfied by holding that the legal estate passed to the devisees in trust for the purchaser. They also referred to Knollys v. Shepherd (cited 1 Jac. & W. 499; affirmed in the House of Lords, 1 Sug. V. & P. 291, note z (10th ed.)) as deciding that the devise of an estate contracted to be sold, was not entitled to the purchase-money beneficially.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Dixon, for the devisees. Before this statute, a contract to sell revoked the devise in equity, but not at law. The Legislature has now interfered and expressly declared the contrary, and declares that nothing but a revocation under the Act shall prevent the operation of the will on a devised estate, or, survivorship estate and interest, in such real estate as the testator may, at his death, have power to dispose of by will. [6] The consequence is, that both the legal and equitable interest passed in the same way as if the testatrix had expressly devised them. The lien on the estate for the unpaid purchase-money, which was a beneficial interest in the estate which the testatrix had the power of devising at the time of her death, therefore passed to the devisees, who can only be compelled to part with the legal estate, upon payment to them of the unpaid purchase-money. There can be no redemption while there is an interest on which the will can operate; Knollys v. Shepherd depended on the particular terms of the devise.

Mr. J. H. Law, for another party.

Mr. Tinney, in reply, referred to Arnald v. Arnald (1 B. C. C. 401); and an unreported case of Curre v. Bowyer (1)

Feb. 23. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (after stating the circumstances of the case) said: The Petitioners, who are the legal representatives of the testatrix, now apply to have the residue of the fund transferred to them. They allege that by the contract, the testatrix in equity revoked or annulled the devise; that she ceased in equity to have any interest in the property sold, and that the purchase-money due to her became a part of her personal estate, and was such at the time of her death.

On the other hand, the devisees, stating, as the fact is, that the provisions of the Act for the amendment of the laws with respect to wills, are applicable to the will and codicils of the testatrix, in consequence of the last codicil being executed in the month of June 1838, insist, that according to the provisions of that Act, the will is not revoked:—that, in fact, an interest which would carry with it the purchase-money remained in the testatrix, and make that the subject of the devise.

By the Act, the will speaks from the death of the testator, and all property which a testator possesses at the time of his death passes by the will; and moreover, there are express enactments, that no will shall be revoked by any presumption of intention on the ground of an alteration in circumstances, or otherwise than as in the Act is mentioned, or by another will or codicil, or some writing declaring an intention to revoke the same.

(1) Curre v. Bowyer.

A. contracted to sell an estate; the contract was valid at his death, but the purchaser lost his right to a specific performance, by subsequent laches. Held, that the estate belonged to the next of kin, and not to the heir at law.

This case was thus stated by Mr. Tinney, who had been counsel in the cause. A party entered into a contract for the sale of a real estate, and afterwards died before it had been completed. After the lapse of many years, the purchaser filed a bill for specific performance. This was resisted on the ground that the contract had been improvident, and had been obtained at an under-value, and by undue influence. John Leach, however, held that the contract was binding at the death of the vendor, but that by the lapse of time, and by his laches, the purchaser had lost his right to have a specific performance, and that the estate belonged to the next of kin, and not to the heir at law.

The testatrix entered into a contract, by which she agreed to alienate her whole interest in the estate; but she did not, in any of the ways pointed out by the Act, revoke the will and codicils; and because she has not done so, the argument is, that the purchase-money, as representing the estate, passed by the devise; but revocation, in the manner directed by the Act, is not [8] the only mode in which a will may be rendered inoperative.

If she had conveyed the estate, and thereby completed the alienation, the will could have had no operation upon it, or upon the purchase-money; and it was necessarily admitted, that the will could not, by the devise of the land, have any operation upon that part of the purchase-money, which was actually paid to the testatrix in her lifetime.

The question, whether the devisees can have any interest in that part of the purchase-money which was unpaid, depends on the rights and interests of the testatrix at the time of her death. She had contracted to sell her beneficial interest in the equity she had alienated the land, and instead of her beneficial interest in the land, she had acquired a title to the purchase-money. What was really hers in right and equity was, not the land but the money, of which alone she had a right to dispose; and though she had a lien upon the land and might have refused to convey the money was paid, yet that lien was a mere security, in or to which she had no right or interest, except for the purpose of enabling her to obtain the payment of the money. The beneficial interest in the land which she had devised was not at her disposition; but was, by her act, wholly vested in another, at the time of her death; and the case is clearly distinguishable from cases, in which testators, notwithstanding revocations made after the dates of their wills, have retained estates or interests in property which remain subject to their disposition.

Being of opinion, that by the contract, the testatrix must, in this Court, be deemed to have alienated the whole of her beneficial interest in the estate:—that at the time of her death, she had no beneficial interest in the land at her disposition, and that the will only passes that which was at her disposition, I am of opinion, that the devisees of the land have no interest in the purchase-money, and that the prayer of this petition must be granted. [9] LANGTON v. HORTON. Dec. 7, 20, 1841; Jan. 14, 15, April 18, 1842.

of sale of a whaler, then absent on a fishing adventure, together with all masts, keels, boats, oars, and appurtenances. Held, not to pass the cargo of oil, &c., acquired during the adventure.

of sale of a ship, though absolute in its terms, may, notwithstanding the Ship Registry Acts, be, in equity, held a mortgage, if such appears to have been the real intention of the parties.

mortgagee out of possession of a whaler is not entitled, as against the mortgagor or his assignee of the cargo, to an allowance for the use of the ship.

In the beginning of the year 1837 the Defendant Mr. Birnie, trading under the name of Alexander Birnie & Co., was considerably indebted to the Defendant Mr. Horton. The debt was secured by acceptances of Birnie which were then running, and Birnie, having occasion for further advances, requested Horton to afford him the accommodation.

At that time Birnie was the owner of a moiety of the ship "Ann" and stores, which he then on a whaling adventure in the South Seas, and with a view to the further accommodation which Birnie required, he addressed to Horton a letter, which was in the words:—

"London, 27th January 1837.—Dear Sir,—From the difficulty at present existing in the money market, I am desirous of making the following arrangement with you : to grant you a bill of sale of the moiety I hold of the ship "Ann" and stores, and deposit with you a policy of insurance for £3000 effected in the Marine Insurance Company on that vessel, and to value on you in bills, to the extent of £4200, which bills I engage to provide for when at maturity, and I propose to pay, out of the bill drawn on you, my acceptances falling due as under :—

£1230	7	6	due 1st of February.
496	5	0	13th of March.

Your further putting me in funds for £850 as soon as you may be able to do, say the 1st of March," &c.

The proposal made by this letter was acceded to by Mr. Horton, and was the foundation of the transaction, the effect of which was the subject of contest in this cause. Mr. Horton accepted four bills of exchange, which were drawn upon by Birnie for several sums amounting in the whole to £4200, and which were payable at three and four months. Mr. Birnie executed a bill of sale, dated the 1st of January 1837, whereby it was purported, that in consideration of £4200 paid by Horton to Birnie, he, Birnie, granted and sold to Horton, his thirty-two and fourth parts of the ship "Ann," then on a voyage to the Southern Whale Fishery, together with thirty-two sixty-fourth parts of all and singular the masts, sails, yards, anchors, cables, ropes, cords, guns, gunpowder, ammunition, small arms, tools, apparel, boats, oars, and appurtenances whatsoever to the ship belonging, or in any way appertaining, to hold the same to Horton, his executors, administrators, and assigns, to his and their own use, and as his and their own proper goods and chattels forever. He covenanted for further assurance. Birnie at the same time deposited a policy of assurance with Horton, who, on [11] the 1st of February 1837, caused a bill of sale to be duly registered at the Custom House.

The four bills were not paid when they came to maturity, but were renewed several times, the stamps, interest, and commission being charged to Birnie.

On the occasion of the last renewal, Horton became the drawer and Birnie the acceptor of the bills. In June 1838 Birnie became insolvent, and he neither paid the bills nor provided funds for their payment.

Down to his insolvency Birnie acted as the owner of the ship, and he, with the knowledge of Horton, made payments on behalf of the seamen, and for keeping the insurance on the ship.

After the insolvency Horton claimed to be the absolute owner. On the 2nd of June 1838 he wrote to the captain stating that he had become the owner, and that time continued to make the different payments on behalf of the ship, and the insurance, and, in short, acted as the absolute owner.

In July 1839 Birnie assigned the same half of the ship, and also of the cargo to the Plaintiffs for securing £3000, and they immediately gave notice to the Defendant. The Plaintiffs tendered their mortgage at the Custom House for registration, but the comptroller refused to register it, on the ground that the Defendant Horton appeared on the register to be the absolute owner of the ship.

The ship having arrived in London on the 9th of July 1839, the Defendant took possession of it and of the cargo, and he afterwards sold them, and retained the produce.

[12] The Plaintiffs, alleging that the bill of sale of the 27th of January 1837, though absolute in form, was intended to operate only by way of mortgage, or as a security for payment of the bills which had been accepted by Mr. Horton, and that the bill of sale comprised only Birnie's moiety of the ship, tackle, and appurtenances, and that they gave to Mr. Horton any interest whatever in the cargo, filed this bill against Horton and Birnie, whereby they prayed for an account of the cargo brought home by the ship "Ann," and of the monies received in respect thereof by the Defendant Horton, and that Horton might be decreed to pay to the Plaintiffs, as trustees under the indenture of July 1839 executed by the Defendant Birnie, a moiety of the proceeds of such monies, after deducting a due proportion of payments made by Horton on account of the master and crew of the ship, and of the insurances; and that agreed to deliver up to the Plaintiffs any part or the moiety of the cargo which might remain unsold; and that an account might be taken of the money due to Horton on mortgage of the moiety of the ship, and for other relief.

The Defendant Horton by his answer stated that a sale was intended, but that Mr. Birnie provided cash to meet the acceptances for £4200, he should be entitled to have a retransfer of his moiety of the ship; and on the other hand, that if Birnie should fail to provide cash to meet the acceptances when the same became due, Horton was to become absolutely entitled to Birnie's moiety of the ship, tackle, and appurtenances, including therein Birnie's moiety of the cargo of the ship; and he also said "that though he consented that the said bills should, from time to time, be renewed, yet he so consented on the express understanding and condition with Birnie, that if Birnie should fail to provide funds to meet the said renewed bills respectively, when they [13] ultimately became due, he should not be entitled to a retransfer of his moiety of the ship called the "Ann." And he submitted, and humbly insisted that if Birnie failing to provide such funds as aforesaid, he lost all right or title to call on the Defendant to retransfer the said moiety."

There was some parol evidence entered into as to the intention of Birnie and Horton when they entered into the arrangement of the 27th of January 1837; but it is not necessary to state, as the Court, as will be seen in the judgment, deduced from the whole of the circumstances, that a mortgage and not a sale was intended by the parties.

The amount of the debt due from Birnie to Horton, was admitted to exceed the value of the half of the ship and appurtenances, exclusive of the cargo.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. C. Hall, for the Plaintiffs. The letter of the 27th of January 1837, the evidence in the cause, and the conduct of the parties throughout the transaction, shew that the ship was conveyed to Horton by way of mortgage to secure the payment of the bills, and not by way of sale. Why should Birnie engage, by that letter, to provide for the bills when at maturity, if the transaction was a sale? Why should he pay the seamen, keep up the policy, and incur the expense of renewing the bills, if the ship were the property of Horton? The whole conduct of the parties, until after the insolvency of Birnie, is consistent with the idea of mortgage, but quite inconsistent with a sale.

The bill of sale to Horton did not profess to pass the cargo acquired or to be sold. The words "all [14] masts, &c., and appurtenances" are insufficient for a bill of sale, and the expression "appurtenances," must be construed with reference to other words with which it is associated, and which relate to the equipment of the ship.

Again, cargo acquired by a ship, will not pass as incidental to a ship; it is freight which is the mere rent for the use of the ship, but is the result of a speculation of the owner. A test of Horton's being absolute owner is this, liable for the expenses of the undertaking? Would he have been personally liable if the speculation had been a losing one? He clearly entered into no such speculation. At all events, the Defendant, as mortgagee, can only be entitled to the possession of the ship from the time he took possession, which was in July 1839.

The Plaintiffs have an assignment of the freight and are entitled thereto, and the Registry Acts do not affect the question, for freight and à fortiori cargo is payable quite independently of the ship, Douglas v. Russell (4 Sim. 524), and is not affected by the Registry Acts, Davenport v. Whitmore (2 Myl. & Cr. 177). The policy of the law was to prevent foreigners having an interest in British ships. The Act is retrospective only; Heath v. Hubbard (4 East, 110), Underwood v. Miller (1 Taunt. 387); the non-registration of the Plaintiffs' mortgage, is the consequence of the Plaintiffs not accurately stating the effect of their bill of sale on the registry.

G. Turner, Mr. J. Russell, and Mr. E. R. Adams, for the Defendant Horton, submitted that the transaction was one of conditional sale, and not of mortgage; see v. Grierson (2 Ball & B. 275), Tasburgh v. Echlin (2 B. P. C. 265), [15] Sevier v. May (19 Ves. 413), and Perry v. Meddowcroft (4 Beavan, 197). That the subsequent circumstances were quite consistent with this view of the case, and that upon the failure of Birnie to provide funds, the ship, &c., became the absolute property of the Defendant. That this Court would not relieve against the strict effect of the condition, Davis v. Thomas (1 R. & M. 506).

Secondly, that the oil and other cargo passed by the assignment, as one of the "appurtenances"; The Dundee (1 Haggard, 121); Gale v. Laurie (5 B. & C. 186), where it was held, that whatever is on board a ship for the object of the voyage and adventure on which she is engaged, belonging to the owner, constitutes a part of the ship and her "appurtenances" within the meaning of the 53 G. 3, c. 159; and independently of which, it would pass to the legal owner of the ship, as incident thereto, in the same way as accruing freight would; Morrison v. Parsons (2 Taunt. 407), Case v. Davidson (5 M. & S. 79, and 2 Bro. & B. 379; but see Stephenson v. Down 3 Beavan, 343). That even a mortgagee taking possession before the conclusion of the voyage was entitled to accruing freight; Dean v. McGhie (4 Bing. 45), Kerrwill v. Bishop (2 Cr. & Jer. 529); and here the Defendant must be considered in possession from the date of his letter to the captain.

Thirdly, that the registry was conclusive evidence of the ownership; Ex parte Yallop (15 Ves. 60); and that, on principles of public policy, the Court could not give relief against the evidence of the registry; Mestaer v. Gillespie (11 Ves. 626) [16] Speldi v. Lechmere (13 Ves. 588), Thompson v. Leake (1 Mad. 39), Battersby v. Smyth (3 Mad. 110; and see Slater v. Willis, 1 Beavan, 354).

They also argued that the claim in this suit, was a matter for the decision of the Court of law; and that the Plaintiffs, who were mere assignees of a legal right, could not sustain a suit in equity, unless they shewed that their assignor would not lose his name to proceedings at law; Hammond v. Messenger (9 Sim. 327).

Mr. Rolt, for the Defendant Birnie, supported the Plaintiff's case.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

April 18. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. As it is admitted that the debt due from Birnie to Horton exceeds the whole value of Birnie's moiety of the ship and appurtenances, exclusively of the cargo, it is clear that if there were a question as to the cargo, it would be immaterial to either party whether the transaction ought to be deemed a sale or mortgage, because, in either case, Horton would be entitled to the whole value of Birnie's moiety of the ship and appurtenances.

I have, however, thought it right to consider what was the intention of the parties, and the nature of the contract between them independently of the mere legal effect of the bill of sale.

From the claims which they respectively make, it is plain that the bill of sale does not constitute, or is not [17] evidence of the whole contract which subsisted between them. Even the case of Mr. Horton requires him to go out of the bill of sale, to support his proposition that the sale was conditional; and on considering the transactions which took place between Mr. Birnie and Mr. Horton, from the date of Birnie's letter the 27th day of January 1837 until the time when Birnie's embarrassment became fully known, I have no doubt the transaction was intended to be, and was both parties understood to be, a security or mortgage, and not otherwise a sale, absolute or conditional. If, as Horton says, the ship was intended to be Horton's, unless Birnie provided cash for the bills when at maturity, and if cash was not provided for them, then, according to his case, the moiety would have become absolutely his, on the bills becoming due and not being paid; but no such claim was then made by Horton. Birnie wanted cash to take up the bills, and he obtained it upon renewed acceptances granted by Horton himself. In one view of this case might be considered, that Birnie having provided cash, though with Horton's assistance, had performed the alleged condition, and so was entitled to a retransfer of his moiety of the ship, and that the bill of sale was continued, or a retransfer of it was made, in order that there might be security for the payment of the renewed acceptances; but there is no evidence of any new agreement, and Birnie was from time to time charged with commission, with stamps, and with the expense of renewals; his insurance was continued in his name, and he made payments and allowances to the families of the sailors. All these acts are consistent with his being owner, subject to a mortgage, or security, but wholly inconsistent with the notion of Horton becoming the owner by breach of condition; and having regard to them, and the evidence in the cause, I am of opinion that this was intended and [18] understood to be, not a sale absolute or conditional, otherwise than as a sale for the purpose of a mortgage or security is to be considered as a conditional sale; and even if the in-tion were to be considered as a conditional sale in the sense that the ship might be deemed only in a limited time and by the performance of a particular condition, I incline to think, that by the transaction which subsequently took place between the parties, the condition ought to be considered as waived, and that Birnie was entitled to redeem on payment of what was due on the bills.

But it was argued, that whatever might be the intention of the parties, the transaction must, under the Ship Registry Acts, be deemed to be an absolute sale entitling Birnie to the property as purchaser, notwithstanding any contract of his to permit Birnie to redeem, and that this Court ought not to interfere in such a case as this, and indeed in any case, however fraudulent.

The statute of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 55, ss. 35, 42, 43, provides, that the bill of sale of a ship or any share thereof, after the particulars have been entered in the book of registry, shall be valid and effectual to pass the property thereby intended to be transferred, against every person and to all intents and purposes, except subsequent purchasers and mortgagees, who shall first procure an indorsement to be made on the certificate, as in the Act mentioned; and further provides, that in the case of mortgages, the collector and comptroller of the port where the ship is registered, shall, in the entry in the book of registry, and also on the certificate of registry, express that the transfer was made only as security or by way of mortgage; and that in such cases, and except for certain purposes, the mortgagor and the mortgagee shall be deemed to be the owner of the ship, [19] and that the rights of the mortgagee are not to be affected by the bankruptcy of the mortgagor, notwithstanding his reputed ownership.

When the transfer is not expressed to be by way of mortgage and security, the protection, which the Act intended to afford to the mortgagees against the creditors of a bankrupt shipowner, is not obtained, and the vendee, appearing on the registry as owner, may be subject to all the liabilities which belong to him in that character; but it may, I think, well be doubted, whether, under the provisions of the Act, there can be any valid mortgage, in any case, in which the parties do not secure themselves the protection which the statute gives by the mode of proceeding which therein directed. I do not, however, think that the circumstances of this case make it necessary for me to express any opinion on the subject.

As I have already stated, the only question which is to be decided with a view to relief prayed, is, whether Mr. Horton has any interest in the cargo.

The bill of sale purported to grant the moiety of the ship masts, sails, tackle, apparel, boats, oars, and appurtenances.

It is admitted, that independently of special contract, the sale or mortgage of a ship will carry freight accruing due at the time of the sale, or after possession is taken by the mortgagee. And upon the hypothesis of sale it is argued, that by the word "appurtenances," all stores would pass, and that the ship and stores having become the property of Horton, he became entitled to the subsequently acquired cargo. It is said, that in the voyages or adventures of whale ships, the cargo [20] constitutes the whole earnings of the ship; that such earnings are incident to the ship as much as freight, and that no distinction can be made between subsequently acquired cargo and subsequently earned freight.

The case upon the ship "Dundee," upon which we have judgments by Lord Gifford (1 Hagg. 109, 126) and by Lord Tenterden (5 B. & C. 162), has only gone to the extent of establishing, that under the Act 53 G. 3, c. 159, in the expression, "the ship and her appurtenances," the word "appurtenances" must be construed to extend to anything belonging to the owners, which is on board a ship, for the accomplishment of the object of the voyage and adventure on which she is engaged. But the cargo is not the object and purpose of the adventure, not something provided as a means for the attainment of the object. I cannot construe the cargo as something appurtenant to the ship, although it is that which the ship carries, and for the attainment of which the ship and its appurtenances were provided. And I cannot consider cargo of this kind as freight incident to the employment of the ship, and as necessarily passing by the transfer on sale.

Freight is the reward which the law gives for carrying goods. It arises upon a contract for the conveyance of merchandize, which is said to be in its nature an entire contract, so that, as a general rule subject to some exceptions and to special agreements, until the contract is completed by the delivery of the goods at the place of destination, nothing can be demanded for the freight. When a ship at sea is sold, the seller is subject to an obligation, as well as entitled to a profit, in respect of the freight accruing due. And the duty and the profit [21] may well be held to pass together with the ship, by means of which the duty is to be performed, and the profit to be acquired. Nevertheless, the title to the freight and the title to the ship are often separate, and the argument founded on analogy to the case of freight does not rest on a sure foundation.

The cargo of a whale ship is an acquisition, from time to time, made by the employment of the ship and of the crew; but there is nothing in the nature of the contract for the conveyance of merchandize; the employment of the ship is not governed by a contract with other persons, but subject to the directions of the owners who may be under no obligations to complete the voyage, or to continue the employment of the ship, any longer than suits their own convenience or interests. Suppose that, at the time of sale, the ship is engaged on her adventure, such, if any, part of the cargo as is then acquired is already the property of the owners, and if intended to be sold, ought to be expressly named or described in the transfer; and as to the parts of the cargo as may be afterwards acquired, it is acquired under the direction and by means of liabilities of the owners, which, as it appears to me, do not necessarily enure to the benefit of the purchaser, without an express stipulation for the purpose. Between the inconveniences of determining, in the absence of express contract, what may be due to the purchaser for the employment of the ship, in acquiring a cargo from the seller after the sale, and the inconvenience of giving to the purchaser, under the description of the ship, the uncertain cargo acquired at the time of the sale, and which may afterwards be acquired, I incline to think that the first is the least; but independently of that, it does not appear to me that the cargo of a ship, or that which it carries, can [22] be considered as part of, or as an incident to the ship itself.

I am therefore of opinion, that it does not pass by an assignment of the ship and its appurtenances without any specification or allusion to the cargo. And that the Plaintiffs are entitled to the account which they ask of the moiety of the cargo.

Mr. Turner asked that an allowance might be made to the Defendant for the use of the ship during the whaling expedition.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. That claim would depend on the transaction being a sale. I am of opinion that it was a mortgage. If it becomes necessary, I must decide it.

[S. C. affirmed on appeal, sub nom. Cookson v. Cookson, 12 Cl. & Fin. 121; 8 E. R. 1344 (with note); 9 Jur. 499.]

A sum of money directed to be invested by an executrix "in land or some other securities," for the benefit of one for life, with remainder to his children, "but in failure of these, to A. and his heirs for ever," and which had not been invested in land, held to have been originally impressed with the character of real estate; but by the subsequent dealing therewith by the parties beneficially interested, to have acquired the quality of personalty.

The question in this case was, whether a sum of money ought, in equity, to be considered as real or personal estate; in other words, whether it belonged to the testator or personal representatives of Isaac Cookson.

The testator John Cookson the elder by his will dated in 1774, after giving to his eldest son and his heirs a [23] real estate, gave his residuary real and personal estate to his wife; and he appointed her sole executrix "with the tuition and education of all and every such younger children, and to provide for them with regard to their fortunes as they might deserve and merit."

He executed another testamentary paper which was as follows:—"Instructions or advice to my wife with regard to my younger children. As to my son John, I intends for the law, I would have £250 per annum paid him until a sum of £10,000 be invested in land or some other securities, which is to be invested in trustees for his use, as to the interest of such money or produce of such lands for his natural life, and if he marries with your consent and approbation first obtained in writing, and not otherwise, that he make such settlement on such wife as he may marry as you judge proper, and that the remainder shall go to such child or children he may have lawfully begotten; but in failure of these, to my eldest son Isaac and his heirs forever. As to my son Thomas, I propose that he should have the same sum, but with the same limitations as my son John. As to Joseph, I would have him brought up to business, and to give the amount in some business I am concerned, in the like manner, to prevent its being spent, to fix the like £10,000 in the same manner above mentioned," &c.

In 1784 the testator's son John married with the consent of the widow; and by the settlement made on his marriage, dated in February 1784, to which the widow as a party, after reciting his father's will, John Cookson the younger covenanted that he would procure the £10,000 to be raised out of the assets of his father, and paid to the trustees of the settlement, on trust that they should, with the approbation of himself and wife or the survivor of them, testified in writing, when [24] and so soon as a convenient purchase could be found, lay out the £10,000 in the purchase of lands, to be conveyed to the trustees, to the use of John Cookson for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the use of the testator's wife for life in lieu of dower, and after her decease, "to the use of such child or children as the said John Cookson the younger might have lawfully begotten, in such estate and in such manner as the said testamentary paper so signed by the said testator John Cookson, in its true construction, directed, with such limitation as was in the said testamentary paper was mentioned." The settlement contained a power for the trustees, with the approbation of John Cookson the younger and his testator's wife, "in the meantime and until the purchase should be made, or in case, by the true construction of the will and testamentary paper, the sum of £10,000 might not be laid out or invested in the purchase of lands," to invest the same on public or private securities; and a declaration, that the interest should belong to the person who would be entitled to the rent of the land, if purchased, by "virtue of the settlement and the testamentary paper so made by the testator John Cookson."

John Cookson paid the sum of £10,000 pursuant to the covenant contained in the settlement, and £5000 part thereof was lent to him on mortgage; and by the mortgage deed, dated in February 1785, it was recited, "that no convenient purchase had yet been found whereon to lay out and invest the said sum of £10,000." The other sum of £1000 was afterwards lent to him on the same security.

In 1792 new trustees were appointed, and the trust funds were transferred to them. By the deed of appointment the mortgage for £6000 was recited, and [25] that the sum of £4000, the residue of the sum of £10,000 so paid by John Cookson, the trustees had been, by them, laid out in the purchase of £5325, 19s. 8d. 4 per cent. annuities until a proper purchase of messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments could be found, whereon to invest the same, upon the trusts of the will of the said John Cookson, the testator, and of the settlement made previous to the marriage of John Cookson the younger." The new trustees were to hold the trust property in and for the several intents and purposes, and subject to the several provisos and covenants mentioned, expressed, and declared of and concerning the sum of £10,000, the recited indenture of settlement of the 23d day of February 1784, and to or for no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever."

There was no child of the marriage. John Cookson the younger died without issue in the year 1802, and there being no child, Isaac Cookson and the widow of John were then the only persons interested in the property.

New trustees were afterwards appointed by Isaac Cookson and Hannah Jane, the widow of John Cookson the younger, by a deed dated in July 1804. The deed recited the will and codicil of John the father, the settlement and the various investments of parts of the £10,000. It then recited as follows:—"And whereas the said John Cookson the younger, some time ago, departed this life without leaving lawful issue, by reason whereof the said Isaac Cookson, or his representatives will, upon the death of the said Hannah Jane Cookson, become entitled to the actual receipt of the said sum of £10,000 trust monies. And whereas the said Charles Wren " (who was a former trustee) "some time ago departed this life, leaving the said Samuel Castell" (his co-trustee) "him surviving. And whereas the said Samuel Castell [26] hath received payment of the said two several sums of £5000 and £1000 secured on mortgage of the hereditaments and premises hereinbefore described and before mentioned and recited, which he doth hereby acknowledge and declare, and doth now admit the same to be in his hands, testified by his sealing and delivering them presents. And whereas the said sum of £5325, 19s. 8d. 4 per cent. annuities are now standing in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England in the sole name of him the said Samuel Castell. And whereas the said Hannah Jane Cookson and Isaac Cookson, being the only persons at the time of the execution of these presents interested in the said sum of £10,000 trust monies, have, with the concurrence and approbation of the said Samuel Castell, testified as aforesaid, agreed and determined to nominate and appoint two other persons, to act in conjunction with the said Samuel Castell in the several trusts now remaining unexecuted and capable of taking effect, relative to the said sum of £10,000, which are in and by the said hereinbefore recited indenture of settlement of the 23d of February 1781 mentioned, expressed, and declared of and concerning the same; and they the said Hannah Jane Cookson and Isaac Cookson have in consequence requested "two other persons "to accept the same trusts and to act therein in conjunction with the said Samuel Castell, which they have respectively agreed to do," it was witnessed that Isaac Cookson and Hannah Jane Cookson directed the surviving trustee to transfer the £5325, 19s. 8d. into his name jointly with the new trustees; and they did also thereby further direct and appoint the said Samuel Castell, his executors or administrators, forthwith and as soon as conveniently might be, to place out and invest upon real or Government securities the said sum of £6000, so lately received by him, and then in his hands, in the joint names of them the said Samuel Castell, [27] Joseph Cookson and Anthony Surtees; and it was then declared and agreed between the parties thereto, that the stock and the £6000, when so placed out, and all interest, dividends and proceeds thereof, respectively, in the meantime, should be upon such and the same trusts and to and for such and the same intents and purposes, and under and subject to such and the same provisos, conditions, covenants, and agreements, as were mentioned, expressed, and declared of and concerning the said sum of £10,000 in the indenture of settlement and for no other intent or purpose whatsoever; and then there was a provision that the trustees should only be charged with such monies as they should respectively actually receive, and they were not to be accountable for the insufficiency or deficiency of any securities.

The stock was afterwards fraudulently sold out by a trustee, but it was got back and paid into Court. On the application of the widow, an order was made for payment to her of the dividend, with liberty to apply on her death.

Both the widow and Isaac Cookson being dead, the question was, whether the fund which had never been invested in land and now consisted of £8500 3s. 8d. 3 per cent. belonged to the heir at law or personal representatives of Isaac Cookson.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. James Mitchell, for the personal representatives of Isaac Cookson, contended, first, that the testator's will contained no imperative trust to lay out the money in land, that the direction was to "invest in land or some of the securities," and meant an investment in landed or other securities, or that the money was to be laid out on mortgage of land or other [28] security, for an absolute purchase could not be considered a "security." That the subsequent gifts shewed that the parties were to take in the character of personality. Thomas was to have the said "sum" with the same limitations as John, Joseph was to have £10,000 to be "fixed" in the manner above mentioned; and the amount was to be given in some business. How, then, they asked, could Joseph have the sum in the business, if it was to be "fixed" in the manner above mentioned, that is (as contended by the other side), it was to be invested in land.

Secondly, they argued that even if the property were to be considered as real estate, still by the subsequent dealing therewith by the parties interested they shewn an intention of taking it as personality.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Goodeve, and Mr. Greening, contra, for the heir at law of Isaac Cookson. First, it was the intention of the testator that this sum should be invested in land; the investment "in other securities" was intended as a temporary arrangement until a prudent investment in land could be found. The limitation over Isaac "and his heirs for ever," shews that the testator considered he was dealing with real estate; and how could the words "produce of such lands" have been used in reference to the purchase of a real estate?

Suppose the words implied an option, still the authorities shew that the trustees must alter the quality of realty attached by the general intention of the testator to money. Thus in Johnson v. Arnold (1 Ves. sen. 169) the trust was to lay out in "if G. I. should be willing and desirous to have it laid out in lands." In Earlom v. Saunders (Ambler, 240) the direction was to trustees to lay out £400 "in a purchase of land or any other security or securities as they should think proper and convenient;" in Cowley v. Hartstonge (1 Dow. 361) the trust was to lay out a sum of money "in the purchase of lands of inheritance, or at interest as the trustees should think most fit and proper." In all these cases the fund was in equity considered as invested with the quality of real estate.

Thirdly, the subsequent mode of dealing with the property was such as to retain the very quality with which it was impressed by the will of the testator.

Wheldale v. Partridge (5 Ves. 388, and 8 Ves. 227) was also cited. (See Davies v. Shaw, 6 Simons, 585.)

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question in this case is whether a sum of £8500, 3s. 8d. 3 per cent. Bank annuities belongs to the heir at law, or to the executor of Isaac Cookson deceased.

The stock in question represents part of a sum of £10,000, which John Cookson father, by his codicil, dated in March 1774, directed to be applied for the benefit of his son John and his children, with a limitation over to the testator's son Isaac and his heirs.

It is contended by the heir of Isaac, that by the terms in which the codicil is expressed, the character of real estate was given to the £10,000, and that no act was done to alter that character; and the heir, therefore, claims under the limitation

For the executor it is contended, that it is consistent with the codicil to consider the £10,000 as personal estate; but that if the character of real estate was impressed upon it, an intention to alter that character is shewn by an act of the testator; that at the time of Isaac's death it was part of his personal estate, and that it now belongs to his personal representative.

The testator John Cookson having, by his will, given to his wife his residuary with the tuition of his younger children, and to provide for them, by a codicil and testamentary paper which he entitled, "Instructions or advice to my Wife," he directed, &c.

Upon the authorities of Earlom v. Saunders (Ambler, 240), and Cowley v. Hartstonge (1 Dow. 361), I incline to think that the testator ought to be deemed to have intended that the money should be laid out in the purchase of land, and that the intention to invest on some other securities, should be considered to have reference to a time which might elapse before a purchase of land could be procured. The testator has not so expressed himself, as clearly to shew the nature of the investment intended, or what interests the children of John were to take, or in what way the provision for their benefit was to be effected; and I think that the difficulty which has been raised in that respect had a reasonable foundation; but it seems to me more probable, that whatever benefit the children were to take was to be in the form of an interest in real estate.

That the testator's widow and her son John had considerable doubt on the subject, but, for on the marriage of John, a settlement, to which the widow was [31] made, was made on the 23d of February 1784; and thereby John covenanted, &c.

The marriage was duly solemnized. No land was ever purchased pursuant to the covenant in the settlement, and the securities on which the money was invested, from time to time, changed; but nothing appears to have been done, during the life of John, to alter the character, whatever it was, which was impressed on the money by the codicil, and by the settlement.

John Cookson died without issue in the year 1802, and there being no child there was an end of all questions respecting the interest which the children were to take, or the limitations which were to be made to them.

Mrs. Cookson, the widow, and Isaac Cookson were now the only persons interested in the property, whether to be considered as land or money. They had, together, power to do with it what they pleased. An investment in land might have been made by the trustees, with the approbation of Mrs. Cookson, as the survivor of her husband and her husband; and even if it is considered independently of any act done by Isaac, the money ought, for the benefit of his heir, to be considered as land, after the death of John; yet, as the property was his, he had a right to dispose of it, or to treat it as money, and any act of his shewing an intention to alter its character, or to treat it as money, would be considered sufficient to remove the character of real estate which had previously been impressed upon it.

In July 1804 there was only one trustee of the £10,000 or of the securities which it was invested; [32] and Isaac Cookson and the widow of John, who were the sole owners of the property, thought fit to appoint a new trustee. The occasion required consideration how the property was to be dealt with, and the question whether it is to be collected from the deed appointing new trustees, that Isaac Cookson intended to treat the £10,000 as money to be invested in land, and to be considered the character of land, or as money which was to remain on security, and to be received by him as money, after the death of the widow of John.

Now it is to be observed, that in these recitals, it is particularly noticed, that Isaac Cookson is to become entitled to the actual receipt of the £10,000 trust money upon the death of Hannah Jane Cookson; there is notice taken here, that the sums of £5000 and £1000 in money were in the hands of the surviving trustee; here is an intention expressed that the £10,000 trust monies were to be in the hands of the new trustees, who were to act in conjunction with the survivor of the surviving trustees of the trusts then remaining unexecuted and capable of taking effect.

Those trusts were for the sole use of Mrs. Cookson for her life (as previously noticed), with the actual right to receive the money vested in Isaac when she died.

How is it then that they have disposed of this by the settlement? "This indenture witnesseth, that it shall be lawful for the surviving trustee to transfer into the names of all the trustees." What were they to do with it? "They further do hereby direct, and appoint [33] Samuel Castell, his executors or administrators forthwith, as soon as conveniently may be, to sell out and invest upon real and Government securities the sum of £6000 so lately received by him, and now in his hands, in the joint names of Samuel Castell, Joseph Cookson, and Anthony Surtees." There was £6000 in the hands of the surviving trustee, and that was to be laid out forthwith and invested upon real or Government securities; there being, in the express words here mentioned, no reference whatever to an investment in the purchase of land, then it was "declared and agreed between the parties to these presents, that the sum of £6000 when so placed out, and all interest, dividends, and proceeds thereof, respectively, in the meantime, should be upon such and the same trusts, and for such and the same intents and purposes, and under and subject to such and the same provisos, conditions, covenants, and agreements, as are mentioned, expressed, and declared of and concerning the same sum of £10,000 in the indenture of settlement; and for no other intent or purpose whatsoever." And then there was a provision that the trustees should only be charged with such monies as they respectively actually receive; and they were not to be accountable for the deficiency or deficiency of any securities.

Now to say that this is perfectly clear, when there is such a reference to the trusts (amongst which is the trust for laying out in the purchase of land), we think, be expressing an opinion which could hardly be formed upon this instrument, but seeing that all the words, directly used, tend solely to the actual receipt of money, and the investment of the money upon real or personal security; and the only persons who had any interest in the settlement, were then dealing with money, I do not think that the [34] words which have general reference to the trusts of the settlement, are sufficient to outweigh the effect which ought to be given to the first words; and without saying that this matter is perfectly clear, it does appear to me that even if it were originally impressed with the character of land, it ceased to be by the act of Isaac, who at the time he executed this deed, had a perfect right to that he considered it either as land or as money.

I think, therefore, that the intention was to convert it into money. (NOTE.—See Reford v. Ravenhill, 5 Beav. 51.)

able bequest to the Rector and Corporation of W. W. being a vicarage, payment was ordered to be made to the vicar and corporation.

A testator bequeathed to the rector for the time being of the parish of New Windsor, and to the Mayor, Aldermen and Burgesses of the Borough of New Windsor, the time being, the sum of £1000 to be held on certain charitable trusts.

It appeared that New Windsor was a vicarage, and that the lay rector or proprietor was entitled to the rights, &c., of the rectory. The incumbent "for the time being" was the vicar who was living on the spot. It was proposed to pay the sum to the Vicar and the Corporation of New Windsor.

Mr. K. Parker and Mr. Kindersley, for parties to the suit.

Mr. Jemmett, for the vicar,

And Mr. Wray, for the Attorney-General, not objecting.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] ordered payment to the Vicar and Corporation of New Windsor.

[35] ACEY v. SIMPSON. March 5, 1842.

by to a widow in lieu of dower or thirds at common law, or by custom, has no priority over other legacies, where the testator leaves no real estate.

A testator gave his widow a legacy of £50, and an annuity of £100 for life; and directed that the said annuity should be paid without any deduction, "and should be paid and taken by his said wife in lieu and full satisfaction of and for all dower at common law or by custom, which she might otherwise claim from or upon any of his real estates."

There was a deficiency of assets to pay all the legacies; and the question was, whether the usual rule was to prevail, that the widow's annuity should take in priority of the other legacies. (Burridge v. Bradyl, 1 Peere Wms. 127; Blower v. Morret, 10 Ch. 420; Davenhill v. Fletcher, Ambler, 244; Heath v. Dendy, 1 Russ. 543.)

It appeared that there were no real estates out of which the widow was dowable. Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Mylne, for the Plaintiff, insisted that the widow was not entitled, as there were no real estates, and that she ought to come in pari passu with the other legatees.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Symthe, for the widow, admitted that they could not successfully maintain the contrary.

[36] UNDERWOOD v. HATTON. Dec. 24, 1841; March 9, 1842.

An estate was administered under the Court, and all claims being provided for, the devisee was let into possession. A further claim was afterwards made against the estate. Held, that the trustees of the will were not justified, of their own authority, in taking possession to provide for it.

Where the Court administers the assets, the trustees are protected against all claims on the testator's estate, but legatees still remain liable in respect of their beneficial interest.

This petition was presented by William Underwood, the devisee, and Elizabeth Arrowsmith, the annuitant under the will of William Underwood, deceased, and it prayed that John Hatton, one of the trustees under the same will might pay to Elizabeth Arrowsmith a half-year's payment in respect of her annuity, and to the Petitioner William Underwood the remainder of the Michaelmas rent received by Hatton, and that the trustees might be directed not to interfere with the possession of the house, or the receipt of the rents of the house.

The testator, William Underwood, died in February 1830, having made a will, whereby he gave and devised his estates to John Hatton and John Craven, on trust to pay his debts and legacies, and out of the rent of a copyhold house at Cheltenham to pay £50 a year to Elizabeth Arrowsmith for life; to maintain the Plaintiff out of the residue of the rents, till he attained the age of twenty-three years, to accumulate the remainder for his benefit, and after he attained that age to suffer him to receive the rents for his life, subject to the payment of the annuity of £50 to Elizabeth Arrowsmith, and, after his death, upon certain other trusts.

[37] By a decree in the Court of Exchequer pronounced in 1833, the will was established, the usual accounts were directed to be taken, and a receiver of the rents and profits of the copyhold estate at Cheltenham was appointed.

The Master reported that no debts had been proved before him, but that certain sums were due to the Defendants Hatton and Craven and to certain legatees. By the decree on further directions dated the 18th of February 1834, directions were given for payment of the costs of suit, and of the sums due to Hatton and Craven, and it was ordered that the receiver should be continued, and declared that William Underwood, on attaining his age of twenty-three years, would be entitled to the accumulations of the personal estate, and to the accumulations of the rents of the real estate; and subject to the annuity to Elizabeth Arrowsmith, would be entitled to the rents and profits of the real estate for his life.

The Plaintiff having attained his age of twenty-three years on the 5th of April 1834, an order was made by the Court of Exchequer in the following month of June whereby certain sums were ordered to be transferred to him and the receiver was discharged, and soon afterwards the trustees Hatton and Craven let the Plaintiff in possession of the estate, and he remained in quiet possession up to the month of September 1841.

It appeared that Underwood, the testator, was the executor of the will of Thomas Wallace, and in April 1841 the Petitioner Underwood was informed by the solicitor of Hatton and Craven, that a part of the funds which had been transferred to the Plaintiff, under the order of June 1834, as being part of the estate of Underwood the testator, did, in fact, belong to the estate [38] of Wallace; and the Plaintiff being on investigation, satisfied that the information was correct, submitted to the claim and paid the amount.

But whilst that inquiry was pending, the solicitor of Hatton and Craven called on the Plaintiff Underwood to make good other claims, amounting to nearly £120, which they alleged to be due from the testator Underwood to persons claiming under the will of Wallace; and the Plaintiff having disputed these claims and refused to satisfy them, Hatton and Craven gave notice to the occupying tenant to pay the rent to them, and prevailed on her to do so; and they procured themselves to be admitted to the copyhold premises, with the view of enforcing the claims which they alleged to be just debts; and they insured the premises for £1060. A half-year's annuity payable to Elizabeth Arrowsmith, not having been paid, this petition was presented by Mr. Underwood and Mrs. Arrowsmith, praying for payment of what was due for the annuity to Mrs. Arrowsmith, and payment of the remainder of the rent to Mr. Underwood, and that the trustees might be directed not to interfere with the possession of the house, or the receipt of the rents of the house.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Hall, in support of the petition, said, that the account of the testator's debts had been taken under the decree of the Court of Exchequer, and that no such debt as that now claimed had appeared to be due; that if any such debt ever was due (which they did not admit), it had long since ceased to be recoverable. That the decree of the Court of Exchequer had declared Underwood to be entitled to the rents of the house, subject to the annuity to Elizabeth Arrowsmith, which he had duly and regularly paid; that pursuant to the decree and the right thereby declared, the receiver had been discharged, and Underwood had [39] been let into possession, and that his possession could not now be disturbed by the trustees, without violating his rights as declared by the decree; and that if they had any just demand against him in respect of the estate, they should have applied to the Court for relief, and to have the receiver reappointed.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Geldart, for the Defendants Hatton and Craven, alleged, that a debt was really due from the estate of Underwood the testator to the estate of Wallace; and that it was their duty and right, as trustees of the will of Underwood, to pay the debt, and for that purpose to take and hold possession of the property till they had been enabled to pay the debt and the expenses of admittance and insurance.

March 9, 1842. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. As the right of the Petitioner Underwood has been declared by the Court, in a suit between him and the trustees Hatton and Craven, his possession, founded upon that right, is not to be disturbed without lawful cause.

It must be admitted, that notwithstanding the accounts which have been taken, and the declaration which has been made, there may still be subsisting lawful and just claims against the estate of the testator Underwood; and if the persons entitled under the will of Wallace have just subsisting claims against the estate of Underwood, there is nothing to prevent them from prosecuting these claims, for although Hatton and Craven, the trustees of Underwood, are protected (Knatchbull v. Fearnhead, Myl. & Cr. 126), the Petitioner Underwood the devisee is not. (Greig v. Somerville, Russ. & Myl. 338; Gillespie v. Alexander, 3 Russ. 130.)

[40] But the claims, if contested by the Petitioner, must be established against him; and under the circumstances which have taken place, I do not think that it is enough for the trustees to say, we are satisfied that the debt is due, and you must pay it. I think that the Petitioner is not bound by the admission of the trustees as executors, and if he has a just defence to the claim, I think that they have no right to use their powers, arising from the possession of the legal estate, in such a manner as to deprive him of that defence.

Although the accounts have been taken, and the fund was cleared to the satisfaction of the Court, I will not venture to say that all duty of the trustees, except to the Petitioner, terminated; because I conceive that circumstances might occur, which, notwithstanding all that has taken place, it might have been proper, and the duty of the trustees to apply to the Court for directions upon some unexpected contingency; but I am of opinion, that after the proceedings which took place, the trustees had no right, of their own authority, for the purpose of enforcing claims which could not be established against themselves, and by means which would deprive the Petitioner of any just defence which he may have, to take the matter into their own hands, and use the legal estate, which ought to be the protection of the Petitioners, against them, for the purpose of enforcing an adverse claim.

I must, therefore, order the Respondents to account for the rents which they have received; order them not to interfere further with the possession, or with the receipt of the rents of the house; and order them to pay the costs of this petition.

[41] BRETHAM v. BERRY. Feb. 10, 1842.

To entitle a Plaintiff to an order for leave to enter an appearance for a Defendant, it must be shewn, by affidavit, that the copy of the subpoena served contained the memorandum directed by the 14th Order of August 1841.

Mr. Keene made an application, under the 8th General Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 165), for leave to enter an appearance for the Defendant.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held, that the affidavit in support of the application must shew, that the copy of the subpoena which had been served, contained the memorandum required by the 14th Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 168). (NOTE.—See Tatham v. Williams, 1 Hare, 159.)

[41] WILLIAMS v. FLIGHT. Feb. 19, 1842.

Where there are alternative allegations of facts, the opposite party is entitled to adopt, as against his opponent, whichever of the alternatives he pleases. A bill was filed for relief in respect of a lost bond, which was alleged to have been altered after its execution. Held, that the doctrine laid down in Simpson v. Lord Howden did not apply, for the bond being lost the objection would not, at law, appear on the face of it.

This case came before the Court on general demurrer.

According to the statements of the bill, the Plaintiff Mrs. Williams, in 1835 executed to the Defendant Mr. Flight a bond for £1000, conditioned for indemnifying him against any sum which he should pay, by reason [42] of any guarantee entered into by him for the firm of Papps & Co., in which her brothers were partners.

The Defendant brought an action on the bond against the Plaintiffs Mr. and Mrs. Williams. The bond being stated to be lost no proferat was offered by the declaration.

The Plaintiffs then filed this bill, alleging, first, that the bond had been altered and varied since its execution; secondly, that it had been framed in a manner conformable to the actual agreement between the parties; and, thirdly, that the Plaintiffs were relieved as to part of the liability, in consequence of time having been given to the principal debtors, without the concurrence of the surety; the decision of the Court did not, however, rest on the third objection. The charge in the bill particularly relied on, in the argument of the demurrer, was as follows:—"That either the said bond or instrument hath been altered or varied since the execution thereof by the Plaintiff Caroline Williams, or the execution thereof by the Plaintiff Caroline Williams was obtained by fraud, and such bond is not according to the real terms of the guarantee agreed to be given by the Plaintiff Caroline Williams and under the circumstances aforesaid, the said bond of indemnity ought either to be delivered up to be cancelled, or the same ought to be reformed so as to be conformable to the actual agreement entered into by Caroline Williams, and should stand as a security, to the extent of £1000 only, for such sum and sums of money as, under the circumstances, the Plaintiffs shall appear to be justly bound to pay."

The bill prayed that the bond might be delivered up to be cancelled or reformed and limited in a parti-[43]-cular way, and for an injunction to restrain proceedings at law.

To this bill the Defendant filed a general demurrer.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Wood, in support of the demurrer. The allegation that the bond was either altered since its execution or was obtained by fraud. Where a Plaintiff states facts in the alternative, the Defendant has a right to adopt such of the alternatives as he thinks fit. Balls v. Margrave (3 Beav. 284), Vernon v. Vernon (2 Myl. & Cr. 145). The Defendant has therefore a right to say, that the bond has been altered. If so, the Plaintiff would have a good defence at law; if (11 Rep. 47); and the bond being void on the face of it the Plaintiffs have no right to come into equity, Simpson v. Lord Howden (1 Keen, 583, and 3 Myl. & Cr. 37), except by bill of discovery at their own expense.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Bennett, contra. Taking either alternative the Plaintiffs are entitled to some relief in equity. Suppose the bond altered, then if it is lost, the objection will not appear on the face of it, and having been fraudulently dealt with the Court has jurisdiction; Simpson v. Lord Howden. On the other hand, if the bond was not prepared according to the agreement there is a clear equity to have it reformed; but quite independent of this objection, it is distinctly alleged that time was given to the principal debtors, and in equity, the surety is bound; the bond, however, [44] being under seal, the Plaintiffs could not avail themselves of that defence in a Court of law, for at law, an instrument under seal can only be discharged by force of an instrument of equal validity, it cannot be set by parol. Davey v. Prendergrass (5 Barn. & Ald. 187).

Mr. G. Turner, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am of opinion that this demurrer is not to be overruled, notwithstanding the ingenious argument by which it has been attempted to be supported.

The Plaintiffs admit that they were under certain obligations, but they allege that the bond was either prepared in a form different from that agreed upon, in other words, that it was obtained by fraud, and that on this ground they are entitled to relief, or if not, then, that it has been altered since its execution, and on this ground, that they are entitled to relief. Moreover they say they are discharged from their liability, because the Defendant has delayed his remedies against the principal debtors without their concurrence.

On the other hand, the Defendant says, that the allegation being that the bond was either obtained by fraud, or has been altered since its execution, he has a right to take it either way. I quite agree, that where there are such alternative allegations, the Plaintiffs would be entitled to relief if one be admitted, but would not, if the other be adopted, then the Defendant has a right to take his choice of the allegations; if the Plaintiffs are entitled to relief either way, how is it possible that [45] this will assist the Defendant on this demurrer? I am bound by the decision in Simpson v. Lord Howden so long as it stands unaltered by higher authority; but I think it does not apply to this case, for how will this bond appear void at law, on the face of it, when the Defendant admits it is lost and cannot be produced. There is nothing on the face of it to shew the alteration, and it is only by other evidence that it can be proved. Saying nothing as to the other objection, I am of opinion that there is equitable relief stated on the bill which the Plaintiffs would not obtain by demurrer: I must therefore overrule the demurrer.

A fund was given to A. B. until some child of his should attain twenty-one, £1000 consols was to be paid thereout to each of his children as they attained twenty-one. The fund was insufficient to provide for all the children. A child died twenty-one. Held that he was, notwithstanding the deficiency, entitled to 1000 consols.

Had issue at the death of the testatrix. Held, also, that the children born after her death were also entitled.

The testatrix, by her will, dated in 1819, gave to trustees the sums of £6000 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, and £5000 4 per cent. Bank annuities, upon trust to pay the dividends to her nephew Solomon Harris during his life or until his child of his should attain his or her age of twenty-one years, and when and as long as his children should attain his or her age of twenty-one years, to pay or to each such child the sum of £1000 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, and the principal of the said trust funds, and the dividends of the residue of the said trust funds were to be paid to her said nephew for his life. And from and after his decease, in case he should leave at his decease any child or children under the age of twenty-one years, [46] to set apart for each such child the sum of £1000 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, and apply the dividends thereof towards their maintenance during minority, and to transfer the principal to each such child, when and as he should attain twenty-one years. And in case of the death of any such child before he attained twenty-one, to fall into the residue of the said trust fund.

The testatrix directed the dividends of the trust fund, after satisfying the above legacies, to be paid to the wife of Solomon Harris for life, if living at his death, and after their deaths, she directed the principal to be divided between all the children of Solomon Harris who should be then living.

The testatrix died in 1820. At the time of her death, Solomon Harris had one child living; he afterwards had ten other children, of whom seven were now living, the remaining four having died in their infancy. The Plaintiffs were two of the children who, having attained twenty-one, claimed by this bill to be entitled to receive the legacy of £1000 consols each out of the trust funds, which now consist of £5760 3 per cents., and £5000 3½ per cents.

The trustees declined making the payment, on the ground that there would remain sufficient to provide £1000 consols for each of the other children now living and any other children which Solomon Harris might have during his life. There was also a question, whether the children born after the death of the testatrix were entitled.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Tennant, Mr. Nichols, and Mr. R. W. H. Smith, for the Defendants.

[47] Mr. Rogers, in reply.

Deftis v. Goldschmidt (19 Ves. 566, and 1 Mer. 417), Butler v. Lowe (10 Sim. 120) were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case there seems to be a serious difficulty, which the Court must contend with, and get over in the best way it can. I have no doubt at all that this testatrix fully intended that each and every child down to the very last should have £1000 upon attaining twenty-one.

If, as in the case cited, she had directed a sufficient fund to be provided for answering the gifts to the whole family, then there would have been no difficulty. The difficulty which arises in this case is, that she has provided a limited fund for answering an unlimited object.

What I think ought to be done in this case is, to follow the first directions, which are clear and distinct, and pass over the difficulty which arises from the inference of intention which arises in the case.

There is a most distinct direction to pay the sum of £1000 consols out of the trust fund when each child attains twenty-one, and this must be followed. I therefore I ought to order the payment of £1000 consols to each of the two children who have attained twenty-one.

[48] KENT v. JACOBS. May 23, 1842.

Where husband and wife are Defendants, and the suit does not relate to the separate estate, service of a copy of the bill on the husband alone, under the 23d General Order of August 1841, is good service.

A husband and wife were parties to this suit; and on a motion for an adjournment under the 24th General Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 171), a question was mooted, whether service of a copy of the bill under the 23d General Order upon the husband alone was good service, so as to be a sufficient foundation for the adjournment under the 24th General Order.

The suit did not relate to the separate estate of the feme covert.

Mr. Shebbeare, for the motion, observed that the service of a copy of the bill ought to be similar to the practice in cases of a subpoena; and if a subpoena be served on the husband and wife, service on the husband is good service on him and his wife. (Reg. 402, 403; Hinde, 85; and 1 Daniel's Pr. 216.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] was of opinion that the service of one copy on the husband alone was sufficient.

[49] ROBINSON v. MILNER. March 11, 1842.

An application made at the Rolls, in a V.-C.'s cause, to discharge an order to sue in forma pauperis, obtained of course at the Rolls, can only be founded on irregularity; if merits are relied on, the application must be made before the V.-C.

The Plaintiff, in a V.-C.'s suit, obtained as of course at the Rolls, an order to sue in forma pauperis upon the usual affidavit that he was not worth £5, the matters in question in the cause only excepted. A motion to dispauper on the ground that he was in possession of the property in question of considerable value, involves the merits, and ought to be made to the V.-C., and not to the M. R.

This was a bill filed by a vendor, for the specific performance of a contract for sale of an estate for £1000. The Plaintiff, having made the usual affidavit that he was not worth in the world the sum of £5 after payment of his just debts, his wearing apparel and the matters in question in the cause only excepted, obtained the Rolls an order of course to sue in forma pauperis.

It was now moved on behalf of the Defendant, that this order might be discharged with costs.

The cause was one attached to the Vice-Chancellor's Court.

It did not appear by the bill who was in possession of the estate, but an affidavit was filed on behalf of the Plaintiff, stating on information and belief that the Defendant was in possession; on the other hand, it was sworn positively on the behalf of the Defendant, that the Plaintiff was and had been since 1836 in possession of the property.

Mr. Phillips, in support of the motion, cited Spencer v. Bryant (11 Ves. 49; and Wy. Pr. Reg. 320, 321; and Perry v. Walker, 1 Y. & C. (N. C.) 677), and contended that the Plaintiff ought not to be allowed to sue in forma pauperis, he being entitled [50] either to the £1000 purchase-money, or to the estate of that value, and moreover he being in possession.

Mr. Bichner, on behalf of the Plaintiff, objected that this motion ought to have been made before the Vice-Chancellor, to whose Court the cause was attached. 9th Order of May 1837 (Ord. Can. 114).

Mr. Phillips, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff has obtained this order upon the usual affidavit that he is not worth £5 after payment of his just debts, &c., the matters in question in this cause only excepted. It might happen that this affidavit is perfectly consistent with the Plaintiff's being a very wealthy man, because the matters in question may be of very great value, and the Plaintiff may be in possession. This may be the ground for applying to discharge the order on the merits; but I cannot say that the Plaintiff who has complied with all that is required of him by the practice of the Court, has been guilty of any irregularity, or that the order has been irregularly obtained; in such a case alone I have authority to interfere in a cause attached to the other branch of the Court. (See 6th Order of May 1837, Ord. Can. 137.)

I am of opinion that the order is not irregular, and if it is to be discharged, it must be done by a proper application on the merits in another place.

[51] HEREFORD v. RAVENHILL. March 12, 1842.

The testator directed his trustees, with the consent of his widow, to invest his personal estate in freehold, leasehold, or copyhold messuages, tenements, or hereditaments, and to settle them upon certain trusts which were applicable to realty. Held, that a conversion into real estate was intended.

The testator directed a part of his personal estate to be converted into realty, and settled on certain trusts. These being exhausted, and no investment having been made: Held, that the residuary legatee was entitled to the fund, and took it in the character of personalty.

This case again (1 Beav. 481) came before the Court for further directions on the Master's report.

Subject to the life-estate of his wife, the testator, Howarth Crooke, had absolute power of appointment over estates at Holmer, Dilwyne, and Lingen.

By his will he devised these estates to his son Charles for life, with remainder trustees to preserve, &c., with remainder to the first and other sons of Charles in fee, with remainder to the daughters of Charles as tenants in common in fee, with similar limitations to his son John and his sons and daughters; and in default thereof, the testator devised the estates to certain persons in fee, but which subsequent devolution failed by the death of the devisees in the lifetime of the testator; it is, therefore, unnecessary to state them. The testator also gave his ready money, and money which should be due and owing to him to trustees, in trust, as soon after his decease as convenient purchase or purchases could be found, by and with the consent and approbation of his wife if she should be then living, signified in writing, otherwise their own discretion, to lay out and dispose of all such residue and overplus of ready money, and money which should be so due and owing to him, save as aforesaid, either together or in parcels, in one or more purchase or purchases of freehold, leasehold, or copyhold messuages, lands, tenements, or hereditaments in the county of Hereford, and thereupon settle, convey, [52] and assure them "to the use and behoof of his loving wife Mary Crooke for and during her life, and after her decease, to, for, and upon such or the same and the like uses," &c., subject to such powers, as were thereinbefore expressed, &c., of and concerning the hereditaments then before mentioned to be situate in the parishes of Holmer, Dilwyne, and Lingen; he thereby directed his trustees, "with the approbation of his wife, whilst living, in case of her decease, at their own discretion, in the meantime and until such purchase or purchases could be procured, to lend and place out all such residue and overplus of his ready money, and money which should be due and owing to him, upon any public or private security at interest, or invest the same, or any part thereof, in the purchase of stock in any of the public funds, subject to the trusts aforesaid." And he directed that until the ready money, &c., should be laid out in the purchase of hereditaments, &c., the interest thereof should, from time to time, be paid to and received by any person or persons as and to whom the rents and profits of the premises so purchased as aforesaid, if purchased and settled would for the time being belong, appertain by virtue of that his will.

And the testator gave and bequeathed the residue of his goods, chattels, and personal estate to his wife absolutely.

The testator died in 1788, leaving Mary Crooke, his widow, John Crooke his son at law, and Charles Crooke his only other child, him surviving. John died in 1802 without issue; the widow died in 1802; and Charles died in 1838, without issue.

The testator's ready money had never been laid out in land by the trustees, but had been invested on mortgage [53] and Government securities, and the interest had been paid to the widow during her life, and afterwards to Charles Crooke until the time of his death, and the question now was, to whom the fund belonged.

The Plaintiff, the heir ex parte maternâ of Charles Crooke the heir at law of the widow, claimed the fund as realty.

The Plaintiff and his five sisters, who were made Defendants, were the next of kin of Charles Crooke the sole next of kin of the widow. The Defendants claimed the fund as personalty.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Stinton, for the Plaintiff, the heir, contended that the will of the testator the fund had, in the consideration of equity, been converted into realty, and belonged to the heir at law, and not to the next of kin. The Defendants contended that the limitations were applicable to real estate only, and that the word "leasehold" either meant leaseholds for lives or leaseholds to be settled to the same uses as real estate. That the trust imperatively required the investment in land; and that no subsequent event had occurred to change its quality.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Romilly, contra, for the next of kin, argued, that no absolute conversion had been intended; for the trust was not imperative, the trustees having the option of investing in leaseholds, or personalty; and on that point it was held by Lord Loughborough in Walker v. Denne (2 Ves. jun. 170; and Van v. Barnett, 19 Ves. 102) that personalty directed to be so invested was not converted into realty. That if, however, an absolute conversion was intended, it only applied to those persons taking under the limitations of the real estate, and the purposes for which the conversion was directed having been satisfied, the residuary trustees took the fund in the character of personalty; Cogan v. Stephens (1 Beav. 322). That it could not be realty, for then it would belong to the heir of the testator, and not to the heir of the residuary legatee of the personal estate.

They also contended that if the property were considered as real estate, still the subsequent mode of dealing with the property by the widow, who had received the lands and adopted the investment, had the effect of reconverting the property into personalty.

They referred to Cookson v. Reay (5 Beav. 22) and Earlom v. Saunders (Amb. 240). Mr. Collins and Mr. Bacon, for other parties.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, admitted the principle of Cogan v. Stephens, but said that decision only proved the exclusion of the heir at law of the testator, and did not decide in what character the residuary legatees took the property, or profess to determine the rights of the real and personal representatives of the residuary legatees. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The first point which is raised here whether there was a trust for conversion. I am of opinion there was. This case is from Walker v. Denne in this respect, that the leaseholds to be purchased were expressly directed to be for "very long terms of [55] years;" and that instance accounts for the decision. Considering, however, the object for which conversion was to be made in this case, and having regard to all the words which are to be construed, I think a conversion was intended.

There being a trust for conversion, this carries us a very little way in the solution of the real question in this cause; because the conversion being for certain purposes distinctly stated in the will, which have been satisfied, and others which have failed, the rule that the conversion is only to be to the extent to which the purposes can be carried into effect then comes into operation; and it has been generally admitted, that to the extent to which the limitations cannot take effect, the property remains personalty of the testator, and being so, belongs to the residuary legatee under the will.

If there had been an actual investment in real estate, the ultimate limitation would have been such as to have given the residuary legatee a right to it, and she might have had it to be limited and disposed of as she thought fit, either to her or her heirs, or any other way. Unfortunately nothing was done; and we have therefore to consider what are the rights of the parties independent of any act done by them to carry out their intention. Being personal estate in the first instance, as regards the residuary legatee, and nothing having been done to alter its quality, I see no reason to conclude, that it was to devolve in a form different from that in which it was left by the testator, or that its character was altered. It must, therefore, be considered as personalty, and consequently belongs to the next of kin, and a declaration of effect must be accordingly made.

11 L. J. Ch. 344; 6 Jur. 447. See White v. Cox, 1876, 2 Ch. D. 396; Wrigg v. Pike, 1882, 7 P. D. 64. For subsequent proceedings, see Harnett v. McDougall, 1845, 8 Beav. 187.

On marriage of a female infant, her reversionary interest in choses in action was vested under the Court for her separate use for life, with remainder to her children. Afterwards contracted two subsequent marriages, but no further settlement was made on those occasions. Part of the reversionary interests fell into possession during the first coverture, and part during the second, and were transferred to the trustees. Held, first, that although the deed made during infancy was not binding in respect of the reversionary interests, as against the wife surviving, still she might, while discoverer, adopt it if for her benefit. Secondly, that the wife having survived, and not having called for a transfer of the fund, must be deemed to have acquiesced in and adopted it, as it was for her interest to do so. Thirdly, that she must be deemed to have married her second husband on the faith that her property was protected by the settlement, and that he was bound by it. Fourthly, that the third husband, who had notice of the settlement previous to his marriage, and had for some years after acquiesced in it, was bound thereby, and had no interest in the settled property; and, fifthly, that the arrears of separate estate due at the time of the third marriage also belonged to the wife as her separate estate.

The question in this case was, whether the third husband of a lady, who at the time of her first marriage was an infant, took any interest in her property settled on that occasion, part of which consisted of a reversionary interest in choses in action. The facts which gave rise to the question were as follows:—

The Defendant, Mrs. Ashton, whose maiden name was Susannah Eliza Paddon, was one of the four children of Elizabeth Paddon, a daughter of the testator John Stacie, who, by his will, dated the 3d day of October 1812, gave to Trimby and Redman

A freehold tenement at Bath, on trust to pay the rents to Sarah Russell for life, with remainder in trust for the sole use and benefit of Susannah Eliza Paddon, if living at her death,

The sum of £5000 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, on trust to pay the dividends to Sarah Russell, for her life, and after her death, to transfer the capital to his granddaughter Susannah Eliza Paddon for her sole use and benefit,

A house in Lamb's Conduit Street, on trust to receive the rents and pay them to Susan Wright during her life, [57] if the lease so long lasted; and if she died (the lease continuing), on trust to sell the lease, and stand possessed of the money arising from the sale thereof, on trust to invest the same for the benefit of the children of his daughter Elizabeth Paddon, of whom Susannah Eliza was one,

The sum of £5000 3 per cent. annuities, on trust for the separate use of Susan Wright for her life, and after her death for Susannah Eliza Paddon,

A house in St. John Street, and a house in Howland Mews, after the death of Susan Wright, to the children of his daughter Elizabeth Paddon,

The residue of his estate, on trust to pay the income thereof to the children of Mrs. Paddon, to whom he also gave £2000 3 per cent. annuities, and a sum of £400 long annuities.

He appointed the trustees executors of his will, and died on the 16th of March 1815. Trimby alone proved the will. At the testator's death, Mrs. Russell, Mrs. Wright, Mrs. Paddon, and the four children of Mrs. Paddon, were living.

Soon after the testator's death, a suit was instituted, by a legatee of the name of Gullan, against Trimby the executor, for payment of the legacy, and in that suit the usual accounts of Mr. Stacie's estate were taken.

On the 8th of June 1818 Susannah Eliza Paddon, being then between seventeen and eighteen years of age, married her first husband James Harnett. Soon after the marriage, a bill was filed on behalf of three other children of Elizabeth Paddon against the trustees of Mr. Stacie's will, and Mr. and Mrs. Harnett, for a general administration of the estate, and by an order, made in the two causes of Gullan v. Trimby and Paddon [58] v. Trimby on the 8th of December 1818, it was referred to the Master to approve of a proper settlement to be made of the fortune of Mr. Harnett.

A settlement, bearing date the 12th day of July 1819, and made between James Harnett and Susannah Eliza his wife of the one part, and Alexander M'Dougall and Thomas Dobson of the other part, was afterwards executed, in pursuance of the Master's report.

The settlement recited the will of Stacie, the institution of the legatee's suit, the taking of the accounts; and that, upon taking the accounts, it appeared that the general personal estate was insufficient to pay the general pecuniary and stock legacies.

full, and that an apportionment had been made; that the sum of £117, 7s. 1d. sterling, which was invested in the purchase of £151, 13s. 4d. 3 per cent. annuities, had been apportioned to Mrs. Harnett in respect of her share of the legacy of £2000 per cent. annuities, given to the children of Mrs. Paddon, and was carried to the account of Susannah Eliza Paddon; and that by several orders made in the cause of Ashton v. Trimby, the sum of £5000 3 per cent. annuities had been carried over to the account of Sarah Russell for her life, and another sum of £5000 had been carried over to the account of Susan Wright for her life, and the sum of £100, part of £400 long annuities, had been carried over to the account of Susannah Eliza Paddon; and after reciting the order of reference, and the Master's report, it was witnessed, that James Harnett covenanted with the trustees, that if his wife should attain twenty-one years, and his wife would, by fine or otherwise, convey the house at Bath to the trustees of the settlement, upon the trusts therein mentioned; and it was witnessed, that James Harnett and wife sold and assigned the £5000 3 per [59] cent. annuities standing to the account of Sarah Russell for life, and Mrs. Harnett's share of the money to arise from the sale of the house in Lamb's Conduit Street, and the £5000 3 per cent. annuities, standing to the account of Susan Wright for her life, and the sum of £1, 13s. 4d. 3 per cent. annuities, and the sum of £100 long annuities respectively standing in the name of Susannah Eliza Paddon, and all right and interest of Harnett's wife and each of them in the premises, to hold to the trustees on the trusts therein mentioned. The trusts were, to raise £500 for the use of Harnett, either when Mrs. Harnett's attaining the age of twenty-one years, or otherwise upon the death of Mrs. Russell or Mrs. Wright. And subject to that, during the life of Mrs. Harnett, to pay the rents of the freehold house and the shares of the messuages therein assigned, and the interest and dividends of the monies, stocks, and funds, or any part thereof as should be, from time to time, vested in possession, to such person for such purposes, as Susannah Eliza Harnett should, notwithstanding her present coverture, from time to time, when and as the same should become due, but by way of anticipation, direct or appoint, and in default of appointment, into her proper hands, for her own sole and separate benefit, free from the controul or interference of the said James Harnett, or any future husband; and after her decease, to be paid, if there should be any child or children by Harnett or any future husband or husbands, with whom she might marry after the decease of Harnett, for the benefit of such children.

On the 24th of December 1821 Mrs. Harnett attained her age of twenty-one years; a fine was levied, to the uses of the settlement, of Mrs. Harnett's reversionary interest in the freehold house at Bath, and on the 22d day of January 1822 an order was obtained, upon the [60] petition of James Harnett, who claimed the benefit of the settlement, for the sale of so much of the long annuities then standing in the name of Susannah Eliza Paddon, as would be sufficient to pay the costs of the application, and the balance of the fine, and the sum of £500 to be paid to Harnett for his own use.

On January 1823 Mrs. Russell, the tenant for life of one of the sums of £5000 3 per cent. annuities, died, whereby the interest of Mrs. Harnett in that sum became vested in possession; and on the 29th day of April in the same year, the trustees of the settlement, upon a petition, in which they stated the marriage of James Harnett with Susannah Eliza Paddon, and the settlement which had been made, obtained an order for the transfer of the £5000 3 per cent. annuities, which then stood to the account of Sarah Russell for her life, to the account of Susannah Eliza Paddon; and it was ordered, that the dividends, subject to the costs of the application, should be paid to the trustees of the settlement. The stock was not carried over under the order, but by virtue of a subsequent order of the 14th of November 1828, made after the marriage of Mrs. Harnett with a second husband, the stock was carried to the account of the trustees of the settlement.

James Harnett died on the 16th of August 1828. Very soon afterwards (viz., on the 1st of October 1828) Mrs. Harnett married Charles Edward Birch.

On the 15th of May 1829 an order was made for payment of the dividends on the sum of £54, 17s. 8d. long annuities to M'Dougall and Dobson, as trustees of the settlement, during the life of Susannah Eliza Harnett, therein described as then Susannah Eliza Birch, the wife of Charles E. Birch. And by a subsequent [61] order, dated the 19th of December 1829, and obtained on the petition of M'Dougall Dobson, it was ordered that the long annuities should be transferred from the account of Susannah Eliza Paddon to M'Dougall and Dobson the trustees of the settlement.

On the 12th of June 1830 Susan Wright, who was entitled for her life to one of the sums of £5000 3 per cent. annuities, died; and on the 1st day of July 1831 order was made on the petition of M'Dougall and Dobson, entitled in a cause in which Charles Edward Birch and Susannah Eliza his wife, late Susannah Harnett, were stated to be Defendants, for the transfer of the £5000 3 per cent. annuities from the account of Susan Wright for her life, to M'Dougall and Dobson upon the trusts of the settlement of the 12th of July 1819.

In the year 1830 the leaseholds, in which Mrs. Birch was interested, were sold, and in respect of them, a sum of £142, 15s. 3d. 3 per cent. annuities had been transferred into Court since the institution of this suit.

On the 30th of March 1831 Mr. Birch died. At this time the real estate had been subjected to the settlement by the fine which had been levied in the lifetime of Harnett the first husband; the two sums of £5000 3 per cent. annuities and the leaseholds had been transferred to, and become vested in, the trustees of the settlement, and were, if the settlement was valid, held by them, on trust for the separate use of Mrs. Birch, with remainder to her children, of which she had four by her marriage; and the trustees were responsible for the money arising from the sale of the leaseholds.

Mr. Birch having died on the 30th of March 1831, his widow, on the 18th of April following, married [62] the Plaintiff. No settlement was executed on their marriage, but the Plaintiff had notice of the settlement made in 1819, and by his conduct acquiesced therein, and after his marriage concurred in the appointment of a trustee thereunder; he also joined his wife in a power of attorney to enable the agents to receive the dividends from the trustees of the settlement.

Mrs. Ashton had children by her first and third marriage. Differences arose between Mr. and Mrs. Ashton they separated, and, in June 1838, Mr. Ashton filed this bill, praying in substance, for a declaration that the Plaintiff, Robert Ashton, was entitled, in right of his wife during the marriage, to the rents and dividends of the property comprised in the settlement of 1819, which the Plaintiff insisted was binding upon him; and the bill, charging that in respect of the estate and the annuities alleged to be subject to the trusts of the settlement, there had been several breaches of trust, prayed for relief in respect thereof against the Defendant, Alexander Henderson M'Dougall, as representative of the deceased trustee of the settlement.

It should also be stated, that the Plaintiff made a claim to certain dividends of interest on the property which had accrued between the second and third marriages, and which he alleged had not been paid over by the trustees.

The Defendants insisted that the settlement of 1819 was a valid and subsisting settlement; that by the trusts thereof, the Defendant, Mrs. Ashton, was entitled to the income of the property therein comprised for her separate use; that the Plaintiff had no interest therein, and that his bill ought to be dismissed with costs.

[63] The question in reality was, whether the Plaintiff Mr. Ashton took an interest in the property settled on the first marriage.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Hubback, for the Plaintiff. Mrs. Ashton was alive at the time of the execution of the settlement on her first marriage; the settlement, therefore, was a nullity as far as it purported to be the contract of an infant; Doe v. Lane (1 Bro. C. C. 106), Stamper v. Barker (5 Mad. 157). At the utmost it was binding only to the extent to which the first husband could bind his wife's property; Simson v. Jones (2 Russ. & Myl. 365). As to the wife's reversionary interest, it is clear that the husband had no power of binding them as the wife surviving, as he had not the power of reducing them into possession; v. Jackson (1 Russ. 1), Honner v. Morton (3 Russ. 65; and Stiffe v. Everitt, 1 Cr. 37). As they did not fall into possession during the first coverture, the Plaintiff in right of his wife is entitled to the amount, subject to his wife's equity to a settlement. As to the arrears, they belong to the wife absolutely, and the husband is entitled thereto in her right.

It is said that the Plaintiff acquiesced in the settlement; even if he did so ignorance of his rights, and that will not affect him; Murray v. Palmer (2 Sch. & 474), Groves v. Perkins (6 Sim. 576).

The words "sole use" in the testator's will, are not sufficient to limit the property to the wife's separate use; Stanton v. Hall (2 Russ. & Myl. 175), Tyler v. Lake (183).

[64] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Purvis, for Mrs. Ashton, and Mr. Tinney and Mr. Shaw, for the trustees. First, as to the leaseholds, it is clear that the settlement binding both on the husband and wife; Trollope v. Linton (1 S. & St. 477), Donne v. Hart (2 Russ. & Myl. 360); and according to the decision in Harvey v. Ashley (11 610), even the wife's contingent interest would be bound. The settlement binding on the husband; Middlecome v. Marlow (2 Atk. 519); and being made with the sanction of the Court it was binding also on the wife. Even if it were otherwise still if it were for the interest of the wife so to do, she might, while discoverd, resist it. From her subsequent conduct when she was no longer under coverture, it appears that she adopted and confirmed this settlement, and it was not competent for her or her after-taken husband to defeat it.

Again, by the will of the testator, the property was settled to her separate use; the words used were sufficient for that purpose; Adamson v. Armitage (19 Ves. 416), Wright v. Bay (1 Mad. 199). Admitting she could not, while an infant, affect the property of her separate estate, still it remained separate estate upon her subsequent marriage; Johnson v. Johnson (1 Keen, 648), Tullett v. Armstrong (1 Beav. 1, and 11 & Cr. 377). The arrears of separate estate are subject to the same qualification and are held independent of the husband's marital right.

Whatever may be the effect of the settlement, the Plaintiff has repeatedly acted in it, and dealt with [65] the property on the faith of its validity, he cannot, therefore, now dispute it. The Plaintiff has, therefore, no interest in the property, and the bill ought to be dismissed with costs.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Austen, Mr. Wood and Mr. Lewin, for other parties.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. The settlement of an infant's property under the Statute has no greater efficacy than one made by an infant with the consent of her parents or guardians. In neither case can a power of contracting be given to an infant. The settlement is only good as the settlement of the husband; and as to those interests which he has not the power to affect, the settlement is wholly inoperative. The property or some portion of it, at least, belonged to the wife at the time of her third marriage, and the Plaintiff has entered into no contract to surrender or limit his marital rights. Acquiescence is not sufficient to defeat a vested claim. Even if the Plaintiff be wrong, this is not a case for costs: the bill was filed after the decision in Massey v. Parker (2 Myl. & K. 174), and before that in Tullett v. Armstrong.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I do not find anything, which, as it appears to me, ought to induce a Court to consider the settlement as invalid for the protection of Mrs. Ashton. The first marriage took place during her infancy, and the interests to which she was entitled and which formed the subject of the settlement, were, for the most part, reversionary, and the reversionary interests of a married woman are [66] not assignable as against herself surviving her husband; but the assignment of a reversionary interest which falls into possession during the husband's life may be valid, and there seems to be no reason why she may not adopt an assignment made during her coverture, for her own benefit during the whole of her life, and for the benefit of her children after her death. A part of the reversionary interests fell into possession during the life of her first husband, who claimed and enjoyed the benefit of the settlement, and was bound by it. After his death, I think the wife surviving him, and not claiming to have the funds transferred to herself, was deemed to have acquiesced in and adopted the settlement, as it was for her benefit so to do. I conceive that she ought to be deemed to have married her second husband, Mr. Birch, on the faith that her property was protected by the settlement, and that he was bound by it. The remainder of her reversionary interests fell into possession during his life, and became subject to the settlement, and so continued to be at the time of his death, when the lady again became a widow.

Within three months after the death of Birch, viz., on the 18th of June 1831, she married the Plaintiff; and if she had practised any fraud upon him by misrepresentations respecting the property, or given reason to suppose that he would become entitled to it in her right, or, if a single woman, entitled to property limited to her sole use free from the control of any husband she might marry ought to be deemed by the act of marriage, to have conferred such property on her husband, Mr. Ashurst might have been entitled to relief: but the case is entirely different; Mr. Ashurst before his marriage, was perfectly well acquainted with the settlement. He married his wife, knowing that her property was limited to her separate use, and for many years after the marriage he entirely acquiesced in it. Under the circumstances, I am of opinion, that the Plaintiff is not, in right of his wife, entitled to any part of the property which he claims, and that the whole foundation on which he asks relief entirely fails.

It was argued, that the Plaintiff, if not entitled to more, was at least entitled to such part of the income as became due between the death of Birch and Mrs. Ashurst's marriage with the Plaintiff: but I am of opinion, that any sums to which she was entitled when she married, were due to the trustees for her benefit, and were payable to the trusts, and payable to her for her separate use.

As the Plaintiff appears to me to have no interest in the property comprised in the settlement, I can give no relief in respect of the breaches of trust which have been committed; and the bill must be dismissed with costs against all Defendants.

[67] BAMPTON v. BIRCHALL. April 19, 1842.

An ejectment bill filed in 1842, stated that the Plaintiff's alleged right to the property accrued in 1812, that a bill had been filed in 1824 to recover the property, and an ejectment had been brought in 1832, which was stayed until the Plaintiff paid the costs of a former ejectment; but it did not state the result of the action. Held, that it must be inferred that they had failed, and that they did not prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

The Defendant having obtained liberty to file a double plea (4 Beav. 558) the Plaintiff amended his bill. The Defendant thereupon filed a general demurrer, and now came on for argument.

The amended bill stated, that Sir Frank Standish died in May 1812, leaving certain real estates, leaving [68] Thomas Standish his heir at law; and, after setting out the pedigree, it stated, that, at the time of the death of the said late Sir Frank Standish, there were outstanding, certain terms for years of the estates of which he died seized, which had been in his lifetime satisfied, and that the same still remained outstanding, and also certain mortgages of, and incumbrances upon, the said estates and premises, for small sums of money, and also leases of the said estate and premises which were not yet expired. That upon, or soon after the death of the said Sir Frank Standish, Frank Hall entered into possession or into the receipt of the rents and profits of the whole of the said estates and premises, and remained and continued in such possession or receipt up to the time of his death, which happened in or about the month of December 1840, without having any title thereto; and upon his death the Defendants entered into possession under his will, and continued and were in such possession and receipt, without having any actual title thereto. That in order to protect such possession, Frank Hall, during his life, procured some of such terms as aforesaid and some of such leases to be assigned, to or upon trust for the Plaintiff and the Defendants or some or one of them did also procure some of such mortgages or incumbrances as aforesaid, to be assigned to or upon trust for them or some of them; but that other of such terms, mortgages, and leases then remained and continued vested in other persons, so that the Plaintiff, who was entitled to the real estate of Thomas Standish, as his assignee, was unable to proceed at law recover the possession of the said estates and premises. It stated that the mortgages assigned to Frank Hall and the Defendants had been paid off.

That Thomas Standish took the benefit of the Insolvent Act in October 1820, and died about the 13th of [69] July 1836. That Blackburn and Johnson had been originally appointed his assignees; and after their decease, and on the 5th of April 1841, the Plaintiff was appointed assignee, and as such became entitled to the estates.

The bill alleged that the Defendants pretended that the Plaintiff was barred by the Statute of Limitations; whereas the Plaintiff charged the contrary, and that he was entitled to recover the lands, &c.

And the Plaintiff charged, as evidence of the matters aforesaid, that, on or about 15th of June 1824, Blackburn, as the then surviving assignee of Thomas Standish, deceased, exhibited his bill of complaint in this Court against Frank Hall, deceased, for the purpose of recovering from him the possession of the said lands, &c., and for account and payment to him of the rents and profits of the said estates, &c., and for such other relief as therein mentioned. And the Plaintiff further charged, as evidence of the matters aforesaid, that the said Frank Hall, deceased, appeared to the bill, and did, on or about the 12th of April 1825, put in his answer to the said bill, by which he admitted the seisin of the estates by Sir Frank Standish at his death, and his death, and certain specified parts of the pedigree, and that there were outstanding terms, and submitted and undertook not to set up or avail himself of the said terms, in any proceedings at law which Blackburn might take respecting the said estates; and he admitted the insolvency, and that he had no claim on the estate in respect of any mortgage.

The bill also charged, as evidence of the matters aforesaid, that, in the month of June 1832, various actual entries were made upon the estates, by Thomas Standish, his assignee, and by his agent duly authorised, and [70] that shortly after such entries were made, and in or as of Easter term 1832, an action of ejectment was commenced on the several demises of Thomas Standish and Blackburn, in the Court of the Bench, against Frank Hall, deceased, and the several tenants of the estates. On or about the 7th of June 1832, a rule nisi was obtained from the Court of the Bench in the said action of ejectment, which rule was in the words and figures, to the purport and effect hereinafter mentioned, viz. :—

Doe demises Standish, &c., v. Roe.—Upon reading the affidavit of Bethel Robinson, the Plaintiff's attorney, it is ordered, that the lessors of the Plaintiff, upon notice of this rule to be given to their attorney, shall, upon Wednesday the 13th day of June instant, shew cause why the proceedings in the ejectments served upon Frank Hall, Esq., in the said affidavit named, and his tenants, should not be stayed, until the taxes due on the former ejectments are paid, and that in the meantime proceedings be taken.

The bill also charged that the rule nisi was, some time in the month of June 1832, absolute (5 Barn. & Ad. 878), and that by reason of the said Thomas Standish being unable to pay the costs in the said rule mentioned, and of Blackburn having taken the estates of Thomas Standish in his hands to meet such costs, no further proceedings were taken in the ejectments, and the ejectments were pending, at the time of the death of Frank Hall, but upon such death became abated.

The bill prayed a declaration of the right of the Plaintiff to the estates, or that an injunction might be directed. [71] That the Defendants might be restrained from setting up any outstanding terms; and if the Defendants had a mortgage title, that the same might be let in to redeem.

On this bill the Defendants filed a general demurrer for want of equity.

Turner and Mr. Emsley, in support of the demurrer. The Plaintiff has not shewn any right to relief. His right of action accrued on the death of Thomas Standish in 1812, or thirty years ago. By the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, s. 2, no action can be brought to recover any land twenty years after the right to bring the same has accrued, and this applies to equity. (Sect. 24.) Not only is the remedy taken away, but the right has become extinguished. (Sect. 34.) The defence of the Statute of Limitations may be raised by general demurrer; Hoare v. Peck (6 Simons, 51; and Wheat v. Pole, 3 Y. & Coll. 266).

The bill seems to rely on three grounds as preventing the operation of the Statute of Limitations. First, on the bill filed in 1824 against Frank Hall, but that suit has in fact, been, and must be assumed to have been, dismissed, and this bill is not a continuance of that suit. Secondly, it is said that entries were made in 1832; but by the above statute an entry is wholly ineffectual to prevent the operation of the statute. (Sect. 10.) Thirdly, the action at law, which is wholly abated, and cannot be revived. The allegations in the bill are uncertain, and must be taken most strongly against the Plaintiff.

[72] Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Bilton, and Mr. Johnson, contra.

The bill contains a charge that the Plaintiff is not barred by the Statute of Limitations, and he will therefore be enabled to enter into evidence as to that at the hearing. This, being a general demurrer, cannot be allowed, unless it is quite clear that the bill would be dismissed with costs at the hearing; Brooke v. Hall (3 Ves. 253).

The Statute of Limitations cannot apply to a case of this description, where proceedings both at law and in equity were commenced within the proper time; mere accident of the death of a party pending a suit cannot have the effect of destroying his rights, and upon the statements in this bill neither the action nor the suit have yet been determined. In the former a conditional rule delayed the proceedings, but did not admit the operation of the Statute of Limitations; in the latter an answer has been put in, containing an undertaking and submission not to set aside the outstanding terms: this is binding on the present Defendants, and the Plaintiff would, at least, be entitled to a decree restraining the Defendants from setting aside in an action at law.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (without hearing a reply) said: The question is, not whether I am to stop any proceedings at law, for notwithstanding any decision that I may make here, the Plaintiff will be perfectly at liberty to go on with his legal proceedings if he can support them; but the question is whether I am to afford the assistance of this Court in giving equitable relief to the Plaintiff.

[73] Sir Frank Standish died in the month of May 1812. The Plaintiff in this cause claims in the right of a person in the name of Thomas Stanley, and alleges that at the time of the death of Sir Frank Standish, Thomas Stanley was his heir at law, and that Sir Frank Standish having died intestate, his right to the estate accrued at that time, that is, in May 1812. He has stated in his bill grounds for equitable relief, which, if he had come in due time, would have been sufficient to entitle him to the assistance of this Court; for he says that he has a legal right to the estate, that he is prevented from taking the benefit of that legal right by outstanding debts which he seeks to have removed; he also states that some of those outstanding debts are held as a security of money, which has been entirely or nearly paid; (supposing that to be the case) then, upon payment by him of what is due, he would be entitled to the equitable relief which he has asked.

It has not been disputed, in the course of this discussion, that there are grounds on which equitable relief might be claimed, if the Plaintiff had come in due time. But the right having accrued in the month of May 1812, this bill is filed in the month of January 1842, within a few months of thirty years, during which time either the Plaintiff or Stanley, through whom the Plaintiff claims, had been entitled to this right, they ought to have enforced it. In answer to this claim it is said only is your remedy barred, but your right is extinguished by the Statute of Limitations; prima facie it is so; the statute says that if the action or suit be not brought within a certain time the right is to be extinguished. What then are the circumstances by which the operation of the statute is to be excluded? Let us look a little into the history of the case so far as it appears on this bill, for it is on the bill alone that the Court is [74] to proceed on this occasion, and I cannot in any way go out of it.

In the year 1812 the right accrued. In the year 1820 Thomas Stanley became insolvent. There was no suspension or interruption of the right by that, because whatever right was vested in the insolvent was transmitted to his assignee, and the assignee had just the same right of proceeding to recover any interest which this person was entitled as the person himself had. Nothing was done to month of June 1824; and in the month of June 1824 the then assignee under the insolvency filed a bill, which seems, from the nature of it, as it is stated here, to be very much in the character of the present bill. Mr. Frank Hall who was at that time in possession of the estate, was made a Defendant to the bill, and in the month of April 1825 he put in an answer; in which answer he is stated to have admitted certain things, and on this demurrer I must take it that those things were so admitted by him. Now it is most extraordinary that the bill does not state anything more about that proceeding. There is an end of it in the year 1825. From the year 1825 to the year 1842, it does not seem that any step whatsoever has been taken in that suit. The Plaintiff leaves me entirely in the dark on the subject, and leaves me to draw such inferences as the circumstances of the case warrant. It is perfectly true, as stated by the Defendants' counsel, that you are to presume against the pleader. I cannot presume that the Plaintiff in that case, having a continued right, and being able to support that right by the admissions contained in the answer to that bill, thought fit to suspend all proceedings whatever from 1825 downwards. But when I connect with that fact, which is of itself extremely strong, the circumstance that this bill is in no way founded on any [75] of the proceedings which took place in that case, and does not ask for the benefit of them, and though stating those admissions, does not ask the benefit of the admissions, or of any proceedings in that cause, I think the necessary inference is, that that suit has failed. I take no notice of the statement made at the Bar, that the bill is dismissed. I know not whether it is so or not, but I necessarily assume from the facts here stated that that is not an efficient case.

The next thing that took place was in the month of May 1832, when entries were made. Now I do not collect very distinctly from this record, on what day in May those entries were made; but I will suppose that the entries were made within twenty years from the accrual of the alleged right. The Act expressly states that an entry of itself is not to have any effect in such proceedings. Those entries were allowed by an action, which, it seems, the Plaintiff had no right to prosecute, because he had not paid the costs of a prior action, and there a conditional order was made in the first instance to prevent him prosecuting that action unless he paid those costs, and that order was afterwards made absolute. The effect of making the order absolute was this, that the party was restrained from going on with the ejectment until payment of costs; but by paying the costs, or by an act of his own, he might have been at liberty to go on. It was his own omission that he did not perform it; it is said it arose from poverty; that is to be regretted if he had a right to maintain; but he did not pay the costs, and, the consequence was, that he was precluded from going on. The action being stayed in the manner I have stated, I am of opinion that the proceedings in that action do not exclude the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

[76] What happened next? Thomas Stanley died on the 13th of July 1836, but, I think, made no difference at all in the matter. Frank Hall died in the month of December 1840. What was done in the proceedings of the insolvency does not appear until the month of April 1841, when the Plaintiff was appointed assignee under the insolvency. Now I quite agree with the Plaintiff in this, that there was an extraordinary delay from April 1841 to January 1842, when this gentleman was appointed; but that is by no means the question; the question is this, when did the right accrue, when ought the party to have prosecuted his right? on the other hand, how long have the parties who claimed adversely in 1812 been left undisturbed in possession, undisturbed by any effective proceeding? I must say I am clearly of opinion there is nothing to exclude the operation of the Statute of Limitations in this case.

A question was rather mooted about the propriety of taking advantage of the Statute of Limitations by means of a demurrer. I really do not see any substantial objection to it; and I do not know how I could refuse to give effect to that branch of the clause of the statute which says that the right is to be barred. It is not a matter of remedy only, but there is actually an extinction of the right. It appears to me that this demurrer must be allowed.

[S. C. 6 Jur. 403. See Westcott v. Culliford, 1844, 3 Hare, 275.]

A testator passing over his heir at law (the son of his deceased eldest brother), £1000 to the testator's father for life, and after his death to be continued to testator's younger brother, and proceeded thus:—"And after his death to be continued to my next nearest heir, and so on. This property is not meant to be disposed of by any of the family." Held, that the ultimate limitation was void for uncertainty.

In a suit to obtain the decision of the Court on a very doubtful will, the Plaintiff turned out to have no interest. The Court, upon making a declaration of rights ordered the costs of all parties out of the fund.

The question arose on a bequest contained in the will of the testator Thomas Moses, which was as follows:—"There is £1000 sterling, lodged in the hands Messrs. Ease & Bond, merchants, London, I wish my attorneys at home to receive as soon after my decease as possible. I wish it to be put out on interest in England and secured on landed property, the interest thereof to be received by my son during his natural life, and after his death to be continued to my brother Henry Moses during his natural life, and after his death, to be continued to my next nearest heir and so on. This property is not meant to be disposed of by any of the family."

The testator died in 1813, leaving his father and the issue of his deceased brother Richard, and two other brothers, Henry and John, him surviving.

At the time of his death, Richard, the son of Richard, the deceased eldest brother was the testator's heir at law, and John Moses, the testator's father, was his next of kin.

John Moses, the father, died in 1822, and Henry Moses, the brother, died in 1832, having respectively received the interest of the £1000 to their deaths. At the death of Henry, Richard the son of Richard, was the heir at law of the testator; the children of Richard, Henry and John were his next of kin. The question was, whom, under the circumstances, the £1000 now belonged.

[78] There were several claims advanced for this fund.

First, it was claimed by Richard the younger, the heir at law of the testator, on the ground of the money being given to the heir as a persona designata; Gwynne v. Muddock (14 Ves. 488).

Secondly, it was claimed by the daughters of Henry, the testator's second brother, as co-heirs, on the ground of their being the "next and nearest heir" to Henry, the father, it being argued on their behalf that the testator had passed over Richard his issue; that the bequest could not revert back to that line so as to confer "the next and nearest heir;" and that the word heir did not always mean the heir at law strictly, but might be qualified; Chambers v. Taylor (2 Myl. & Cr. 376).

Thirdly, it was claimed by the persons who were the next of kin of the testator at the death of Henry, on the ground that the word "heir," having reference to personalty, must be construed next of kin; Holloway v. Holloway (5 Ves. 404); Vaux v. Henderson (1 Jac. & W. 388), Gittings v. M'Dermott (2 Myl. & K. 69); that the class must be ascertained at the death of Henry, the tenant for life; Moss v. Blamire (4 Russ. 384).

Fourthly, it was claimed by persons representing John, the father of the testator, on the ground that he was sole next of kin at the testator's death, and who in that case the gift was void for uncertainty, and went to the father as next of kin; Waite v. Templer (2 Sim. 524); Hayes v. Hayes (4 Russ. 311).

[79] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rolt, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. K. Parker,

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Rogers,

Mr. Walker, for other parties.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, referred to Lord Deerhurst v. The Duke of St. Albans (5 Mad. 232, 8 Bli. 547, 2 Cl. & Fin. 611).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question in this cause depends on the construction of the words "to be continued to my next nearest heir, and so on." The testator, at the time of his death, had a father and two brothers, Henry and John, who were living, but his eldest brother Richard had previously died, leaving children. In this situation of things he made his will, containing this expression of his wishes; without any doubt he intended a perpetuity. The heir of the testator, at the time of his death, being the eldest son of Richard, he adopted this particular mode of succession; he gave it first to his father for life, then to his younger brother for life, and then "to be continued to his next nearest heir." These words seem relative, and refer to what went before, and he seems to have intended the persons next to those whom he had treated as heirs by the preceding gifts. The difficulty is this, did he mean the heir properly so called, or some other persons? And I have considerable difficulty in imputing to him that he meant the person who, as heir at law, would have succeeded to his real estate.

The first gift is to the father, who was not his heir, and the next gift is to the younger brother, who was [80] not heir, and then it is to be continued to his next nearest heir; next to whom? It is contended, that it must have been the next heir, including all those passed over. On the other hand, it is said he meant it to go to all his brothers, and then to revert back to the child of the deceased brother.

There is so much difficulty and uncertainty, that I think it impossible to give the words a satisfactory construction. If that should be the case, the gift will be void, and belong to the next of kin. I will give the point further consideration.

April 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Having further considered this case, I remain of the opinion which I before expressed. The testator, intending the legacy of £1000 to be continued in his family, seems to have contemplated a peculiar line of succession in which he meant the legacy to devolve.

His father was to take first.

After the death of his father, his brother Henry, who was his eldest surviving brother, was to take.

After the death of Henry, the legacy was to be continued to the testator's "next nearest heir, and so on."

The words "continued to my next nearest heir, and so on," appear to me to have relation to the preceding limitations. They seem to mean a continuation to the testator's nearest heir, in some way next after him who has before enjoyed the legacy, and so on in like order of succession.

[81] What then is the succession, which, beginning with the father, and after the father's death passing over the heir, and children of the testator's eldest brother, vests in the eldest surviving brother, and is then to be continued in like succession to the testator's next nearest heir?

I think it quite uncertain who was meant to be designated by the word "heir."

In the ordinary sense of the word, the father was not the testator's nearest heir; nor was the eldest surviving son nearest heir, or heir next after the father. How then are we to determine, from the words, who is the next nearest heir, in a succession, which, having thus commenced, was to be continued "so on?"

The testator may have contemplated a line of succession, capable of being, within proper limits, carried into effect by apt words: but the word "heir," which he has used, imports, in some sense or other, the right of legal succession; and he has at the same time so expressed himself, as to shew that he did not intend the order of legal succession; and under these circumstances, it appears to me, that the persons intended to take after Henry are wholly uncertain, and that the legacy belongs to the next of kin under the statute.

Mr. Turner. The Plaintiff has therefore no interest, and the bill must be dismissed.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. This is a proper case for payment of the costs of all parties out of the fund. There was once a doubt whether [82] the costs could be ordered to be paid in such a case, but it has been held otherwise. There must necessarily be a declaration of the rights.

Mr. Turner said, he remembered a case, in which Lord Eldon said, that he would make no decree, unless the parties would consent that the costs should be paid according to the equity of the case.

[82] WILLIAMS v. DOUGLAS. April 19, 21, 26, 1842.

A stranger to a cause cannot, as of course, except to and refer a pleading alleged to be scandalous as to him, and impertinent as between the parties, but he may be authorised so to do upon making a special application to the Court.

A. R. S., a solicitor, who was not a party to the cause, conceiving the Plaintiff's bill, and an affidavit in support thereof, to be scandalous and impertinent, took exceptions in writing thereto, which were signed by council, and were delivered to the Plaintiff's clerk in Court.

He then applied for an order of course, referring the exceptions to the Master, but the officer of the Court, entertaining a doubt as to the regularity, declined drawing it up without the directions of the Court.

Mr. Elderton now applied to the Court to have the order drawn up, and have referred to several of the authorities after stated.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, as the order of reference must be obtained within six days from the filing the exceptions (Ord. Can. 7), it had better be now made, to enable [83] the parties to discuss its regularity. The applicant must undertake not to act on the order until Thursday next, and give immediate notice thereof to the Plaintiff, who must have liberty to move the Court on that day without notice (Reg. Lib. 1841, B. fol. 628), to discharge the order.

April 21. Mr. George Turner, on behalf of the Plaintiff, now moved to discharge the order referring the exceptions.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Elderton, contra.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

The following authorities were referred to: 1 Daniels Pr. 460, Lord Bacon's Order (Beames, 25), Lord Clarendon's Order (Ibid. 165-7), Abergavenny v. Abergavenny (2 P. Wms. 312), Bishop v. Willis (1), Fell v. Christ's College (2 Bro. C. C. 2), Coffin v. Cooper (6 Ves. 514), Ex parte Simpson (15 Ves. 476), Erskine v. Gardiner (18 Ves. 114), Anonymous (4 Mad. 252), which appears from the Reg. Lib. to have been a case of Porter v. Ewors, Ex parte Morgan, and [84] came on upon the 4th and 5th of April 1818, so that the Vice-Chancellor seemed to have had the opportunity of communicating with Lord Eldon in the interval.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I will take time to consider the case. It is a matter of serious consideration, whether it can be possible for a party to introduce on the record scandalous matters greatly to the prejudice of a stranger to the suit; and that such party is not to have an opportunity of applying to be relieved from the imputation. If that be so, he and his memory may be injured all time. This is a state of things which I cannot think is likely to be sustained. It may, however, be, that the practice can only be settled by a general order of the Lord Chancellor on the subject.

As to the objection for impertinence, I may observe, that if the statement relative to the issue between the parties, and necessary for the determination of the rights, then, though it may happen to be reproachful or scandalous to a person a party to the suit, it may be said he has no right to complain. With respect to a stranger, the whole of the statements in a bill are impertinent. But the matter complained of may be at the same time impertinent as regards the issue.

(1) Bishop v. Willis.—11th of July 1749. Petition by Plaintiff and Francis Leicester, his solicitor, setting forth, that Defendant had put in his answer, and that Petitioners apprehended was scandalous as to Petitioner Leicester, and impertinent as to Plaintiff; and therefore they prayed, that it might be referred for scandalous and impertinence, which was ordered.

This answer was reported scandalous as to Petitioner Leicester; and it appeared that the Defendant's solicitor, one Owen, had inserted the scandalous matter, and counsel's name to the answer, without having any authority for so doing, the Court committed him, and ordered him to pay the costs of the scandal, which the Master taxed at £150. Deaves, Rolls MSS. 118.

scandalous towards a stranger. It is alleged, in this case, that the matter is scandalous; and I can scarcely reconcile myself to the notion that a person, not a party to the suit, has no remedy unless by action; he may however, according to the decisions, be left in that unfortunate situation. I shall look at the authorities, and in the meantime postpone my decision.

[86] April 26. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The question in this case is, whether a person who is not a party to the cause, alleging that the bill contains matter which is at the same time impertinent as between the parties, and scandalous against him, is, of course and without leave, entitled to file exceptions for scandal and to obtain an order to refer the exceptions to the Master, with a view to have the scandalous and impertinent matter (if it be so found) expunged.

There is but little authority on the subject: but from the terms in which Lord Eldon's Order is expressed, from the dicta of Lord Eldon, expressed in a manner to show that he had considered the subject, and from the apparent necessity of the case, there being, as I conceive, no other way of doing effectual justice to an injured party, it would seem that the Court must have jurisdiction and authority to expunge scandal from the record, at the instance of a person who may not be a party to the cause.

Effectual justice to a person aggrieved by such scandal cannot be obtained by means of an action, or any succession of actions. Whilst the record remains unaltered there is scandal, a perpetual reproach and shame, for which no just damages can be assessed, no just compensation ever given, and which can only be removed by the authority of this Court. I own that I cannot attribute much weight to the objection which the Court could by its own order so easily remove, that a person not a party to the cause has no right to an office copy of the bill. And I see no hardship in compelling a party who has introduced into the record contumelious matter amounting to scandal to show that it is material to the purposes of justice. It is not denied [86] that the Court could, by its own order, made mero motu, direct apparent scandal to be expunged. If this were done, it would be in the discharge of a public duty; and why the Court would accept the suggestions of any stranger to enable it to perform a public duty.

But assuming, on this occasion, that the Court might order scandal or contumelious matter, not material or pertinent to the matters in question between the parties, to be expunged, at the instance of a person who is not a party to the cause, it does not follow that the whole proceeding is of course.

The case of Ex parte Morgan, in the cause of Porter v. Evans, which is anonymously reported by Mr. Maddock (4 Mad. 252), amounted to no more than the refusal of an application, in which respect I conceive it to have been right; and although words attributed to Sir John Leach express a general proposition, that no application can be made by a stranger to the record to refer a bill for scandal, yet it was not referred to by the particular application; the order of Lord Bacon was not referred to, although the learned Judge had communicated with Lord Eldon, the proposition being in variance with his reported opinion on other occasions.

Upon consideration, I think that a person not a party to the record cannot adopt a proceeding without special leave; he requires the assistance of a special order, which enables him to prosecute the reference with effect, and to compel the party whom he accuses of scandal to prove the materiality of the allegations so characterised; and I think that the order now in question ought to be discharged, on the ground of its not having been obtained ex parte.

[87] An application to the Lord Chancellor to discharge the order I now make, or to give the solicitor leave to except, with such special assistance as a person not a party to the cause may require, will bring the whole question under the consideration of the Court. (NOTE.—Discharge the order of the 19th of April, but without costs.—Lib. 1841, B. 675.)

[87] RICHARDSON v. HORTON. March 24, April 26, 1842.

A party having obtained and served the order nisi to confirm the Master's report, afterwards file exceptions thereto; and the time within which this may be done, is unlimited until the order to confirm absolute is made; but it may be limited by an order nisi obtained by any other party on the neglect of the party having the carriage of the report.

In the computation of time, the rules which prevail in the registrar's office and Clerks' office are different.

Where the draft report is altered, upon objections carried in after the warrant to set aside, new objections may afterwards be carried in, and exceptions founded thereon regular.

Where the draft report has been varied on the consideration of objections disposed of after the warrant to sign is attended, it is competent to any party, before the expiration of the warrant to sign the report on the objections, to carry in objections to new matter introduced into the draft, or to any part of the original draft, which has been affected, to the prejudice of the party, by any alteration made in the draft by way of addition or omission.

This was a motion, that exceptions exhibited by the Plaintiffs to the Master's separate report might be taken off the file; or that the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth exceptions might be expunged for irregularity, or that the same might be heard or might not be proceeded on.

The Plaintiffs, on the 22d of January 1842, obtained an order nisi, to confirm the Master's report, whereby it was ordered, that the report should be confirmed, unless the other parties, having notice of the order, should, within eight days after notice, shew good cause to the contrary. This order was served on the Defendants [88] on the 24th of January. On the 31st of the same month the Defendants took exceptions, and on the same day obtained and served an order to set them down. The order was served on the 3d of February, and the exceptions were set down on the 4th. The Plaintiffs also took exceptions, and on the 1st of February obtained an order to set them down to come on with the Defendants' exceptions.

In support of that part of the motion which asked that all the exceptions might be taken off the file, it was contended first, that the Plaintiffs, having obtained an order nisi to confirm the report, were not, themselves, at liberty to except to the report, or at least were not at liberty to do so without leave. Secondly, that if they were at liberty to except, they were bound to do so within eight days after the date of the order, when they who obtained it, of course had notice of it.

On the other hand, the Plaintiffs relied on what they stated to be the practice of the Court, which entitles a party who has the carriage of the report to obtain an order nisi to confirm the report, and afterwards to except to it; and entitles any party to except until the order to confirm absolute is obtained.

The other part of the motion, viz., that the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth exceptions might be expunged for irregularity, depended on the following circumstances:—

On the 28th of May 1841 the Plaintiffs regularly took in the objections on which the first eleven exceptions were founded. The warrant on signing the report was returnable and attended on the 7th of June. On the same day the Defendants took their objections, and [89] nothing could be done till the objections on both sides had been disposed of. Various proceedings took place on the objections, and warrants were attended. In the result the draft of the report was varied. Some matter was introduced, and the references to an answer and to an affidavit, which were contained in the draft as it first stood, were struck out.

The Plaintiffs then took in objections, on which their twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth exceptions were founded.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Koe, for the motion, cited Manners v. Bryan (5 Sim. 1 and 1 M. & K. 453), and Ex parte Baz (2 Ves. sen. 388).

Mr. Turner and Mr. Rogers, contra, cited 2 Daniel's Pr. 944, 947, (Moseley 305).

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I will inquire into the practice before giving my opinion.

April 26. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The books of practice cited, to shew that the order nisi did not prevent the party who had obtained it excepting, but the only authority referred to was an anonymous case in Moseley's Reports, p. 305.

That case was Pollard v. Collins; and it appears by the registrar's minute book (1) on a motion being [90] made for an act to be done by the Defendant on payment of money reported due to him, the Court stated, that both sides were to be at liberty to report to the report, and thereupon the Plaintiff moved, and an order was made to confirm the report nisi. The only order entered in the registrar's book is the order to confirm the report which was made on the motion of the Plaintiff. The Defendant afterwards filed exceptions, and then exceptions were filed by the Plaintiff, and on motion the order nisi had been obtained. Both sets of exceptions were set to be heard; and the Defendant waiving one of his exceptions, it was referred to the Master to review his report on all the rest of the exceptions on both sides. In consequence of its being entered in the registrar's minute book, that both sides to have leave to except, this is not a clear authority, that a party who has obtained the order nisi may nevertheless except without leave.

I have therefore made inquiries as to the course of practice, and the information I have received is, that a Plaintiff or other party having the carriage of a case has always been allowed to obtain an order nisi to confirm such report, and to file exceptions thereto. And as to the time within which this may be done, it is unlimited till the order to confirm absolute is made, but it may be obtained by an order nisi, to be obtained by any other party, on the neglect of the party having the carriage of the report.

It being the course of practice, which I have no authority to alter, I can make no order on that part of the motion which asks that the exceptions may all of them be struck off the file.

On this occasion, it has become unnecessary to consider the mode of computing the number of days to elapse between the service of the order nisi and the time when the order absolute may be obtained. Upon the question, however, as to the computation of time, I find, on inquiry, that the established rules which prevail in the Master's office and in the Six Clerks' office are different. I hope that a proper arrangement will be found to reduce them to uniformity by competent authority.

The other part of the motion, which asks that the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth exceptions may be expunged for irregularity, is supported by an allegation that they are founded on objections which were carried into the Master's office after the warrant on signing the report was attended.

Generally, objections are not to be taken into the Master's office after the warrant on signing the report has been attended. The question is, whether the general rule may be applied, under such circumstances as took place in this case.

And that there has been some difference of opinion upon the question, whether, under these circumstances, new objections might be carried in: but the effect of excluding any party from objecting to new matter introduced into the case after the first attendance on the warrant to sign, appears to me obvious; and I am of opinion, that when the draft report has been varied on the consideration of

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. Mr. Thomas Bennett. Mr. Elde.
 6th die. Martis 1729.—Pollard v. Collins.—Mr. Lutwych, p. quer., moves that the Defendant may forthwith transfer to the Plaintiff 150 shares in the Welsh Company, on payment of the money reported due to him, and that the Plaintiff may be discharged out of custody.

objections disposed of after the warrant to sign was attended, it is competent to a party, before the expiration of the warrant to sign the report on the objections, carry in objections to new matter introduced into the draft, or to any part of the original draft which has been affected to the prejudice of the party, by any alteration made in the draft by way of addition or omission.

It therefore appears to me that this motion must be refused altogether. I will give costs if the point had depended wholly on the first point.

[92] ANONYMOUS. May 6, 1842.

The Masters have no jurisdiction, under the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 94, s. 13, to enlarge publication after it has passed.

By the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 94, s. 13, the Masters in Ordinary are to hear and determine all applications for enlarging publication.

In this case publication passed on the 15th of April, and a warrant being taken on the 16th, the Master on the 20th had enlarged the time for passing publication. Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Kindersley, for the several parties.

[93] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] referred to Carr v. Appleton (2 Myl. & Cr. 476); and said that the Master had exceeded his jurisdiction; that the motion had come on alone he should have discharged it without costs: but being now a cross-motion to enlarge publication, that indulgence must be granted for payment of the costs.

[93] HUNTER, on behalf, &c. v. CAPRON. May 6, 1842.

An objection to the production of documents must be properly raised by the Defendant's answer, where the bill seeks their production.

Pending exceptions to an answer for insufficiency, the Plaintiff may move for production of documents admitted by that answer to be in Defendant's possession.

In November 1825 Mr. Bradley executed a creditor's deed, whereby he conveyed certain reversionary property to the Defendants Capron and Duckett, in trust for the scheduled creditors. Mr. Temple executed the deed, as a creditor for the sum of £3012.

This bill, which was filed by the Plaintiff on behalf of himself and all the persons entitled under the deed against Capron and Duckett alone, stated, that on the 10th of October 1841 Temple had assigned his debt to him, the Plaintiff, in consideration of £400. The bill charged in the usual way that the Defendants had in their possession documents "relating to the matters aforesaid," and asked for a schedule; and that the Defendants might produce and leave such of them as were in their possession in the hands of their clerk in Court, for the usual purposes. The bill prayed that the deed might be carried into execution, that the accounts might be taken, and the money paid.

The Defendants, by their answer, admitted the deed of 1825, but knew nothing of the alleged assignment from [94] Temple to the Plaintiff. The answer set out a schedule of documents relating to the matters in the bill stated or alleged; made no express objection to their production. The Defendants, however, submitted that Temple was a necessary party to the suit.

The Plaintiff took exceptions to the answer for insufficiency; and before the answer had been disposed of, he gave notice of motion for the production of the documents and the schedule.

Mr. Steers, in support of the motion.

Mr. Schomburgk, contra, contended, first, that the Plaintiff could not move for production of documents admitted in the answer, while exceptions to the answer were pending: that he could not allege in the same Court, and at the same time, that the answer was insufficient and no answer, and adopt it as an answer for the purpose of moving for production of documents.

he admission. That if the exceptions succeeded, a further answer would be put in, and a second motion for production might then become necessary, on further admission, thus rendering two applications necessary.

Secondly. That Temple, the assignor, being no party to the suit, and the assignment not being admitted by the answer, the Plaintiff was in the situation of a mere stranger, and had no right to the inspection of documents in which, in the present state of things, he had no interest; that there was no privity between the Plaintiff and the Defendants, and that therefore the Plaintiff was not entitled to a production. Adams v. Fisher (2 Keen, 754; 3 Myl. & Craig, 526), A. and other parties entitled to a testator's estate, by power of attorney, appointed B. to collect and manage the estate; [95] B. employed C., a solicitor, for that purpose, who received the assets, and deducting the amount of his untaxed bill of costs, paid over the balance to B. and a bill against B. and C. for an account, and for the delivery up of documents relating to the testator's estate. It was held at the Rolls and on appeal that A. was entitled to the production of documents relating to the testator's estate, though assigned by C. to be in his possession.

Thirdly. That the Defendants, being trustees for the other scheduled creditors, could not be called on to produce the deed and documents in their absence.

Mr. Steere, in reply. The exceptions form no objection to the production of the documents. (See Lane v. Paul, 3 Beav. 66.) As to the assignor not being a party, this is not raised by the answer as an objection to the production of the documents; never he will be made a party by amendment. It is necessary that the deed should be produced to give the discovery sought by the bill, of whether it does not contain a covenant to insure the life of the debtor, and which by his death has become very important.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think that the exceptions for insufficiency form no objection to the present motion; I cannot agree that an answer may be taken as no answer on the mere allegation of its insufficiency. It is often that an insufficient answer is no answer, and that may be true for some purposes; there is the record and the oath of the parties, which for very many purposes is treated as an answer.

The other point is attended with more difficulty; and if the objection had been made by the answer, I think I [96] must have allowed it. The answer merely states that Temple is a necessary party to the suit; but that fact is not stated as an objection to the production of the documents. I think that if it had been so, I must have allowed the objection; but, under the circumstances, I must make order for the production of the documents.

A further question arose, in this cause, under the following circumstances:—The writ being filed on the 16th of March, the Plaintiff, on the 5th of April, took depositions thereto, and on the 16th of the same month obtained the usual ex parte order referring them to the Master. This order was not served until the 20th of the 5th Order of 1828 (Ord. Can. 6) it is ordered, "That when exceptions to an answer for insufficiency are not submitted to, the Plaintiff may, at the expiration of eight days after the exceptions are delivered, but not before, unless in special causes, refer such answer for insufficiency; and if he do not refer the same within the next six days, he shall be considered as having abandoned the exceptions; and in latter case such answer shall be thenceforth deemed sufficient."

On the 23d of April the parties attended a warrant upon the exceptions before Mr. Brougham, when the Defendants' counsel objected that he was not the Master on the matter ought to be heard. The objection being allowed, the parties obtained a further warrant before Master Senior, on the 26th of April, when it was ordered that Master Duckworth was the [97] proper Master; and that, objection being allowed, a warrant was taken out to proceed before Master Duckworth, returnable on the 28th: but on that day the Defendants gave notice of motion to discharge the order of the 16th of April 1842 with costs, on the ground of irregularity in its

Schomberg, in support of the motion. It has been settled, that an order for the production of an answer for insufficiency must be served as well as obtained before the expiration of the six days allowed by the 5th of Lord Lyndhurst's Orders; Peace v. Hodgson (7 Sim. 347); Taylor v. Harrison (8 Sim. 21; affirmed 1 Myl. & Cr. 77). Carrying the order in the Master's office, and applying for a warrant to proceed on is not sufficient without notice to the Defendant; The Attorney-General v. Clark (1 M. & Cr. 367).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Steere contended that the Defendants, by their conduct, had acquiesced in the irregularity, if any, and could not afterwards complain of it. In Davis v. Franklin (2 Beav. 369) it was held that where, in a proceeding before the Master, "the Defendant, by acquiescence or omission to object, permits the other party and the Master to proceed as if he did acquiesce, he comes too late if he does not come at the first opportunity to complain of the irregularity."

And, secondly, that there was no necessity to come here by motion to set aside the order which had been regularly obtained, but had become inoperative in consequence of the delay of the Plaintiff in prosecuting it.

[98] Mr. Schomberg, in reply. Davis v. Franklin is an authority for the Defendants; for, so far from acquiescing, the Defendants have protested against the irregularity of the proceedings from the beginning, and have taken the objection to the Master's office. (See Becke v. Whitworth, 3 Beav. 350.)

The second point is set at rest by the cases of Peace v. Hodgson and The Attorney-General v. Clark, where the motion was made in the same form, and was granted by the Vice-Chancellor and upon appeal.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The order of the 16th of April was quite regularly obtained, and if it had been served on the 19th it would have been valid, but unfortunately it was not served till the 20th, a day too late.

I must own that if the point had been res integra, I should not have thought it necessary to make an application to the Court to discharge the order of reference. The 5th Order declares that the Plaintiff shall be considered as having abandoned his exceptions unless he proceeds within a certain time; and I cannot but think that it had been called to the attention of the Master, that under the General Order the Defendant was entitled to have his answer considered sufficient; he would have thought that it was not competent for him to proceed on the exception; however such applications to discharge the orders of reference have been made before, and orders have been made on them, which have been confirmed on appeal, and I must therefore rest on these decisions. They are perhaps founded on this, that there being a final order on the Master to proceed [99] to examine the sufficiency, it is not for the Court to decide whether he ought to proceed on it.

A series of blunders seem to have taken place with respect to the Masters, which I have never witnessed; but I do not think that the Defendants can be taken to have acquiesced in the proceedings. In Davis v. Franklin there had been an acquiescence all through; and if I had found an acquiescence in this case I must have refused to grant the motion; but seeing that there is none, I think I am bound to make the order as prayed, and with costs. (The order was reversed on the last point by the Lord Chancellor, Dec. 8, 1842.)

One exception having been taken to an answer was allowed, and a further answer was given, in the Plaintiff referred back the answer on the first, second, &c. exceptions. The order was discharged for irregularity, with costs.

One of the Defendants having filed his answer, the Plaintiff took one exception thereto for insufficiency, and which the Master allowed.

The Defendant then put in a further answer; whereupon the Plaintiff obtained an order, referring the answer and further answer for insufficiency on the first, second, and twenty-sixth exceptions.

The Defendant now moved to dismiss the order for irregularity.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rolt, for the Defendant.

[100] Mr. Keene, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] was clearly of opinion that the order was irregular, and discharged it with costs.

[100] MORRALL v. SUTTON. Feb. 24, March 11, May 10, 1842.

[8 C. 4 Beav. 478; 1 Ph. 533; 41 E. R. 735; 14 L. J. Ch. 266; 9 Jur. 697.]

Test of leaseholds to A., her executors, administrators, and assigns, for her life. Held on the context to give a life-estate only.

This case, reported ante (4 Beav. 478), was now reargued.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. G. Russell, as before, contended, that Sarah Calcott took a life-estate. On the other hand,

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Dixon insisted, that under the will she was entitled to an estate interest. They were also desirous that a case should be sent to a Court of law and cited Sherratt v. Bentley (3 Myl. & K. 149), in addition to the cases referred to the former hearing.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, opposed the proposal of having a case sent for the decision of a Court of law, contending that it would be impossible to frame one which did not give an undue advantage to the other side. He referred to Clark v. Smith (one of Lords, 5th of August 1842).

March 11. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I still remain of the opinion as to the construction of the will; but there appears so much doubt, [101] I would willingly give the parties a case for the opinion of a Court of law; but, however, be careful not to send such a case as would give either party an advantage.

May 10. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question which in this case depended on the construction of the will of Edward Lloyd. After the reargument I expressed my opinion that, upon the true construction of the will, Sarah Calcott the younger was entitled to an estate for life only in certain leasehold estates. I stated at the same time that the case appeared to me to be subject to great doubt. The case was afterwards reargued; and in a case which appeared attended with so much difficulty, and to depend on the construction, I was desirous, if practicable, to obtain the assistance of a Court of law, and for that purpose to state a case in such manner as to obtain the opinion of a Court of law as to the real effect of the will.

The course was acceded to on the part of the Defendants, but opposed by the Plaintiff, who contended that the case could not be stated in such a manner as to reduce the question to a mere legal question, without prejudice to the argument which was advanced in favour of his construction.

On the reargument I saw no reason to change my opinion as to the very true construction of the will, or as to the conclusion which, in a case of so much doubt, I found myself bound to adopt; but with respect to the practicability of stating a case which might not prejudice either party, I took time to consider.

[102] And after again perusing the will, and considering the case which has been stated by the Defendants, and the practicability of removing all objections to it, I am of opinion that on the whole I ought to make a decree according to the opinion I have formed upon the subject; and admitting the case to be very doubtful, it is sufficient to me to know that the case may be reconsidered before another Judge, and that he thinks it necessary or proper, may himself obtain the assistance of the opinion of a Court of Common Law.

[102] DAVIS v. PROUT. May 23, 1842.

In an order under the 24th General Order of August 1841, it is necessary to state an affidavit that no account, &c., is sought against the Defendant.

One of the Defendants having been served with a copy of the bill, under the order of August 1841,

Mr. Rogers, on behalf of the Plaintiff, moved, under the 24th General Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 171), for an order for leave to make an entry at the Clerks' Office of a memorandum of such service, and of the time when such service was made. A question was raised as to how it should be made to appear to the Court "that no account, payment, conveyance, or other direct relief" was sought against the party in question.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that as the Plaintiff had no office copy of the bill to produce to the Court, from which that fact would appear, the only way in which the Court could know it was by an affidavit, which must therefore be produced.

[103] BATTY v. CHESTER. May 25, 30, 1842.

A bill to be relieved from a security, first, on the ground that it was given for an immoral consideration, and, secondly, because it was not drawn in conformity with the agreement between the parties, cannot be sustained. This Court has authority to relieve against an instrument, which, although legal upon the face of it, was in fact executed for an illegal and immoral purpose.

But where a party to the illegal or immoral purposes comes himself to be relieved from the obligation he has contracted in respect of it, he must distinctly and exclusively state such grounds of relief as the Court can legally attend to; and must not accompany his claim to relief, which may be legitimate, with claims and complaints which are contaminated with the original immoral purpose.

This cause came before the Court upon a general demurrer to the whole bill.

The bill stated, that the Plaintiff became accidentally acquainted with the Defendant Eleanor Suter, who previously had lived under the protection of various gentlemen. That she proposed to cohabit with the Plaintiff, but insisted that the Plaintiff should make a provision for her. That the Plaintiff unguardedly assented to the said proposal, but upon the express condition that any provision that he should make for her should cease upon her quitting him. That, in alleged pursuance of the said agreement, the said E. Suter caused an indenture to be prepared and tendered for the Plaintiff's signature; and that he, acting under the influence and persuasion of the said E. Suter, executed the same. The bill then alleged that the deed was executed previous to any improper connection having taken place; and that the only consideration for the same was the prospective cohabitation to be entered into between the Plaintiff and the said E. Suter; and that the same was, as the Plaintiff was advised, wholly void.

The bill then set forth the indenture, which was dated the 1st of May 1841, and made between the Plaintiff of the first part, E. Suter of the second part, and trustees of the third part, whereby, after merely [104] reciting that the Plaintiff determined to make a provision for the said E. Suter, and had for that purpose agreed to enter into the covenants thereafter contained, the Plaintiff covenanted to give to the trustees an annuity of £300 a year during the joint lives of the Plaintiff and the said E. Suter, in trust for the said E. Suter, and also to keep up certain policies of assurance for £6000 for her benefit.

The bill stated that the deed so executed was not in conformity with the agreement made between the Plaintiff and the said E. Suter, inasmuch as the provision was to cease upon the said E. Suter ceasing to cohabit with the Plaintiff; the deed was obtained from the Plaintiff, who was ignorant of the effect thereof, who never agreed or intended to execute any deed to the effect of the deed of the 1st of May 1841. The bill further stated, that after the execution of the deed the said E. Suter cohabited and lived with the Plaintiff until the month of December 1841, when she placed herself under the protection of another gentleman; and that, by the conduct of E. Suter, the Plaintiff, according to the terms of the agreement entered into between him and E. Suter, became wholly released from every legal and moral obligation towards the said E. Suter. That E. Suter, relying on the omission provisions contained in the deed, had insisted on the Plaintiff continuing to pay the annuity or yearly sum of £300, and on his keeping up the policies for her benefit; that she had instigated and persuaded the trustees to take proceedings at law on the deed to compel the Plaintiff to pay the amount of the annuity, and to keep up the policies.

It stated that the trustees had commenced an action at law on the deed against the Plaintiff for recovery of the [105] annuity; and it charged that the deed was void and for an immoral consideration, and was void, and that the Plaintiff executed the deed in ignorance of the effect of the same, and that the same was intended to be in accordance with the agreement entered into by the Plaintiff, though the same was contrary to the fact.

The bill prayed "that it might be declared that the said deed was in equity void, that the Plaintiff was not liable thereon, and that the same ought to be delivered up to be cancelled;" and for an injunction.

To this bill the Defendants put in a general demurrer for want of equity.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Shadwell, in support of the demurrer, argued, first, that the deed were given pro turpi causa, the Plaintiff might have relief at law; Walker v. Rimes (3 Burr. 1569); and that there was no necessity to have recourse to this Court for relief. Secondly, that a party to the immoral contract could not come into Court to set it aside, and no case existed where the party himself had obtained relief. In Matthew v. Hanbury (2 Vern. 187) the bill was by the executor, and the Court said, "Though where the party himself, who was the person culpable, comes to Court, the Court may justly refuse to interpose; yet, where the Plaintiff is another only, as in the principal case, that varies the matter;" Bainham v. Manning (10 Ves. 241). In Franco v. Bolton (3 Ves. 368) a bill was filed for a similar purpose as the present, and a general demurrer thereto was allowed; and so in Gray v. Mathias (10 Ves. 286), and Dillon v. Jones (cited 5 Ves. 290).

[106] Thirdly, the case made by the bill is, that the deed is not in conformity with the agreement, and prays a declaration that the deed is void in equity, so that the Plaintiff required will be to reform a deed between a man and his mistress. "This bill will not be a Court to examine such matters;" Bodley v. — (2 Ch. Ca. 15).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Beavan, in support of the bill, argued, first, that whatever might have been the law formerly, it was now clearly settled, that unless the signature of a deed appeared on the face of it, this Court had jurisdiction and power to order it to be delivered up. That here the nature of the transaction and the identity did not appear on the face of the deed, so that in a Court of law it might appear valid. Secondly, that if an executor could come into Court to have the deed set aside, there was no reason why the party whom he represented should not have the same right. That Matthew v. Hanbury did not decide the contrary; and Whaley v. Norton (1 Vern. 483), which was a bill instituted by a party himself, was decided on a point of pleading, the Master of the Rolls admitted, that if the deed had been properly charged in the bill, "he thought it reasonable the Court should grant relief."

In Robinson v. Cox (9 Mod. 263) relief was given in a case like the present. Lord Hardwicke there admits the jurisdiction: he observed, "In the case of the Countess of Annandale v. Harris (1 Eq. Ca. Ab. 31, 87, 1 B. P. C. 250, 2 P. W. Ch. 15) also Cray v. Rooke, Forrester, 153) it was admitted upon the argument (for the counsel both here and in the House of Lords), that if Mrs. Harris had been a woman, or a common whore, there would have been relief against the security; but she was [107] a modest woman until debauched, the Court decreed her the return thereof as pretium pudoris; and the late marquis was neither a young gentleman nor a doting old one, but a very sensible, shrewd man. And the ground whereon the Court relieves against these securities is from a presumption, that as women are full of design and artifices to impose upon people, that they therefore make use of such artifices, and are guilty of some fraud or imposition in such notes; and this presumption is made from general principles of policy, to maintain the offence, and to destroy the credit of such securities: and, to prevent women of the town taking any advantage of their artifices, the law, such a general presumption shall run against them, that they may take advantage of such securities." Franco v. Bolton was after a verdict at law, in which the Plaintiff might have had the benefit of the objection; and in Gray v. Mathias, the first bond was held valid, and the objection to the second appeared on the face of it; there was, therefore, no necessity for coming into equity; it was, therefore, like the case of Simpson v. Lord Howden (1 Keen, 583, and 3 Myl. & Cr. 2). That the Court, in many instances, interfered, on public grounds, at the instigation of one who was particeps criminis, as in cases usurious and gaming securities and marriage brokerage-bonds. (1 Mad. Ch. 285.)

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I will look into the cases but I decide, and I must consider whether the Plaintiff can have any relief independent of them.

[108] If this bill should appear founded on this, that the instrument executed not in conformity with the contract, which is illegal, I do not think that any relief can be had on it; but if it be considered as entitled to relief only because altogether illegal, if that be the only ground, then the case will require other consideration. A decision on the first ground against the Plaintiff would not prevent him from obtaining some other relief.

May 30. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. This will prays, that a deed, dated 1st of May 1841, may be declared to be in equity void, and may be delivered up to be cancelled; and that the Defendants, the trustees named in the deed, may be restrained from prosecuting an action against the Plaintiff. The bill states in substance, that the Plaintiff formed an illicit connection with a woman of immoral conduct; that, with a view to that connection, and in consideration of prospective cohabitation, he agreed to make a provision for her during the cohabitation, to be longer; that the deed, which was prepared, and which he executed, was so framed to secure a permanent provision for the woman, and was, in that respect, contrary to the Plaintiff's agreement; that sometime after the execution of the deed the woman left the Plaintiff to live with another man; that by such her conduct, the Plaintiff, according to the terms of the agreement, became wholly released from every obligation to her; but that she, relying on the inaccuracies in the deed, had prevailed on the trustees to proceed at law against the Plaintiff, to compel him to perform his covenants. The Plaintiff complains of this; and in a letter to the woman, which he has annexed in his bill, he alleges that "reciprocity was a positive and substantial essential" of the arrangement. The meaning of this and the grounds of complaint are obvious, and although the Plaintiff has occasionally, in the course of his bill, stated that he was voluntarily made for an immoral consideration, and void, yet it is plain that the bill and the Plaintiff's title to relief rests, in part at least, upon the supposed injury of his being required to perform his covenants after he has lost the consideration which he entered into them. In substance, the Plaintiff alleges, that he ought not to be required to perform his covenants, because he has lost the cohabitation and reciprocity, that is, the immoral connection or services which the woman agreed to afford him. The bill does not appear to me to be quite consistent with itself. If the Plaintiff alleges, that by the woman's conduct he has been released from his obligation to her, must he not be considered as saying, that if she had pursued a different conduct, that is, if she had not ceased to live an immoral life in connection with him, there would have been a valid and subsisting obligation, or, in other words, that the agreement would not have been void?

I reserved this case for the purpose of looking at the cases which were cited from any doubt which I entertained as to the result. I consider that this Court has authority to relieve against an instrument which, although legal upon the face of it, was in fact executed for an illegal and immoral purpose: but where a party, who has contracted for an illegal or immoral purpose comes himself to be relieved from the obligation contracted in respect of it, he must state distinctly and exclusively such grounds of relief as the Court can legally attend to; he must not accompany his claim with other grounds which may be legitimate, with claims and complaints which are contaminated by the original immoral purpose.

[110] In this bill the Plaintiff claims relief, in part at least, upon the ground that he is released from his obligation by the woman having ceased to live an immoral life in connection with him; and I am of opinion, that upon a bill so framed the Plaintiff can have no relief. Let the demurrer be allowed.

[110] THE BARON DE FEUCHERES v. DAWES. May 25, 1842.

ing a litigation as to administration in the Ecclesiastical Court, a bill was filed praying a receiver, and that upon the administrator being appointed and brought before the Court the rights of the parties might be declared, and the estate administered: a demurrer to the latter part of the relief was allowed.

The bill was filed by the husband of the Baroness de Feuchères, deceased, against alleged next of kin, and in effect stated, that under the settlement, made in the usual form, on the marriage of the Plaintiff with the late baroness, the Plaintiff was, as survivorship, entitled to such part of the property of his wife as had been brought into the settlement; that she died domiciled in England, leaving very considerable personal estate: and that the Plaintiff was advised, that, as her surviving husband, he was entitled to the whole of her moveable property, and to have administration granted of her estate and effects.

The bill stated that the right to the administration was in litigation in the Ecclesiastical Court, between the Plaintiff and the Defendants, and it prayed, that, pending the said proceedings in the Spiritual Court, the personal estate and effects of the said Sophia Baroness de Feuchères might be secured by this Court, and that a receiver thereof might be appointed, by and under the order and decree of this Court, with directions as to the outstanding estate of the said Sophia Baroness de Feuchères, and that the same might be paid into Court, [111] and invested and secured; and that the Defendants might be restrained by injunction from receiving and intermeddling there-with, and that upon the appointment of a legal personal representative of the said Sophia Baroness de Feuchères, and upon such representative being brought before the Court, the rights of all parties to the said estate of the said Sophia Baroness de Feuchères might be ascertained, and declared by and under the order and decree of the Court, and that the same might be applied in a due course of administration. A receiver had been appointed in the cause.

The Defendants demurred to so much of the bill as sought, that upon the appointment of a legal personal representative of Sophia Baroness de Feuchères, and upon such representative being brought before the Court, the rights of all parties to the said estate of Sophia Baroness de Feuchères might be ascertained, and declared by and under the order and decree of the Court, and that the same might be applied in a due course of administration; but they answered the rest of the bill.

A demurrer now came on for argument.

Kindersley and Mr. Glasse, in support of the demurrer. The form of this bill is wholly unauthorized by authority. (See Froud v. Baker, 4 Beav. 76.) It asks for a decree in respect of a state of circumstances which may never exist. The decision in the Ecclesiastical Court will determine the questions between the parties, and it may be wholly unnecessary for this Court to make any decision on the matter. The Defendants have demurred for this reason, and because [112] they are unwilling to incur the expense of going into evidence on those points of relief now demurred to.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Beavan, in support of the bill. No decision in the Ecclesiastical Court will determine the rights between these parties. The only thing that will be there determined will be the right to administration; and the question as to the right to the property under the French settlement, and the effect of the divorce, must afterwards inevitably have to be decided in this Court. The decision may be different in the two Courts, as to the effect of the French divorce decree in the bill, and also as to the question of domicile. If the next of kin be admitted to the general residue, still the Plaintiff is entitled to the property brought into the settlement. It is a mere question of convenience, and it will be manifestly more convenient and less expensive to raise the questions, which must inevitably arise between the parties, in the present form, than to render a new independent bill on the appointment of an administrator.

Kindersley, in reply. If the Plaintiff succeeds in obtaining administration by virtue of his marital right he will be accountable to no one; then what rights will there be to determine? This is a mere prospective bill.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. This bill has two objects—first, to protect the property during the litigation in the Ecclesiastical Court, and until the appointment of a legal personal representative. That object has been attained, and is by no means objected to. The second object is to have the rights of the parties to the property determined after the legal personal representative should be appointed; [113] that is, to have the rights of parties not now known or existing determined, there being no means of knowing whether the legal personal representatives, when they have been appointed, and have possessed the property, will not properly distribute it, and it being at this moment totally unknown whether they will make any resistance whatever to the demands made on it.

If the fate of this demurrer depended on the question whether the right to the property could be decided by a determination of the right to the representation; or whether it would not become necessary, after the right to administration had been decided, to have the right to the property discussed here, and to have evidence entered into for the purpose of ascertaining who are the parties entitled, I think that this demurrer would not succeed; but it does not depend on that. The question is, whether this bill is not now asking for something which this Court cannot grant against parties not now known to exist, and in truth, not now existing, since their character has not been determined, and that, in the absence of any information whatever, whether, when the Ecclesiastical Court has appointed an administrator, he will refuse to administer the estate in a manner in perfect conformity with the rights of all the parties. It may be quite necessary hereafter to go into all the evidence which the Plaintiff seems now desirous of going into, and it may become necessary to have an adjudication of the rights of the parties to the property, but the necessity for it doing does not now, in any degree, appear. I think therefore that this demurrer must be allowed. (NOTE.—See Lowe v. Farlie, 2 Mad. 105; and Wood v. Hitchings, 3 Beavan, 504.)

[S. C. 11 L. J. Ch. 349; 6 Jur. 380. See Viscount Downe v. Morris, 1844, 3 Hare, 398; In re Hyatt, 1888, 38 Ch. D. 620.]

A testator died without heirs, seised of freeholds which he had not charged with debts. Held, that as against the lord claiming by escheat, they were assets for the payment of the testator's debts.

Whether such freeholds are liable to the debts in priority to or pari passu with land specifically devised, quære.

Thomas Llewellyn Parry, but his will dated the 16th of June 1834, after devising an estate in Cardigan to Thomas Parry Thomas, gave all his other real estates in Cardigan, Carmarthen, or elsewhere to Judith Parry for life, with remainder to trustees to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to the sons of Judith Parry in tail male, with remainder to the daughters of Judith Parry as tenants in common in tail, with remainder to the right heirs of the testator.

The testator died on the 13th of November 1836. He left no heir at law, and a creditor's suit having been instituted, and the usual accounts having been taken under a decree dated the 4th of August 1837, it appeared by the report of the Master of the Rolls of June 1839, that the personal estate was insufficient for payment of the testator's debts, and that the testator died seised of several estates in the counties of Cardigan and Carmarthen, other than the estate devised to Thomas Parry Thomas.

The Attorney-General was a Defendant to the cause, and when it came on to be heard for further directions, on the 10th of July 1839, the will was established, and it was declared, that the reversion of the testator's real estates by his will expressed to be devised to his own right heirs, was the primary fund applicable, in aid of his personal estate, in payment of his debts; and liberty was given to the Plaintiff make such application to the Crown as they should be advised, relating to such reversion.

[115] According to the leave thus given, a memorial was presented to the Lords of the Treasury, stating the reversion had escheated and devolved to Her Majesty, and praying a grant thereof, to the end that the same might be sold, and the proceeds applied, in aid of the testator's personal estate, in satisfaction of his debts.

In consequence of this memorial, and under a warrant duly issued, an inquisition was taken on the 7th of August 1839, and thereupon it was found, that the testator, at the time of his death, seised in fee-simple of, or otherwise well entitled to, several estates therein mentioned and described, and that the reversion thereof in fee-simple expectant on the death without issue of Judith Parry, devolved unto His late Majesty, and had since descended and then belonged to Her present Majesty in right of the Crown, and had been seised into the hands of the Crown.

The Crown afterwards, in January 1840, granted the reversion to the four first-named Defendants in this cause, on trust to sell the same, as this Court should direct, and stand possessed of the purchase-money, on trust to pay certain costs and expenses, and then in trust to apply the monies to arise from the sale, in such manner as this Court should direct, in aid of the testator's personal estate, for payment of his debts, in the same manner as if the reversion had not escheated.

This bill was filed for the purpose of having the trusts of that grant carried into execution; and it was alleged, that the suit had become necessary, in consequence of Defendant Edward Hamlyn Adams claiming to be entitled to the reversion of some of the estates in question as were situate in the county of Cardigan, as the lord of certain manors, under which the estates were held; [116] and the bill charged, that Mr. Adams sometimes alleged, that the reversion of these estates had escheated him discharged of the testator's debts, and sometimes alleged, that the testator's personal estate was not insufficient for the payment of his debts.

The Defendant Adams, by his answer, stated that on the 18th of December 1829 two manors of Gwynioneth Iskerdin, and Caerwedros were granted to him in fee of the Crown; that part of the real estates of the testator were held of the said Defendant Adams, and that certain mortuaries and chief rents were payable to him lord of the said manors; that the mortuaries and some arrears of chief rents were due to him, and he submitted that the same ought to be paid to him, out of the sums received and paid into Court by the receiver. He then submitted, that he, as lord of two manors, was entitled to the reversion in fee expectant on the death without issue of Judith Parry, of and in such parts of the aforesaid hereditaments mentioned as devolved to her, as were held of the said respective manors. He insisted, that the reversion now vested in him, was not applicable, at all, to the payment of the testator's debts, and that if the same were so applicable, it was only so, in case the real estates of the said testator and the other reversions granted by the Crown in fee for the creditors, should be found insufficient. And, finally the Defendant, Mr. Adams, insisted that the Plaintiffs had no equity against him.

The parties admitted that the Plaintiffs were creditors of the testator, and that Defendant Adams was grantee from the Crown of the two manors of Gwynioneth Iskerdin, and Caerwedros; but it did not appear to be ascertained or admitted, which lands devised to Judith Parry for life, were comprised in those two manors.

[17] By the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 104, after reciting, "that it was expedient that the payment of the debts of all persons should be secured, more effectually than was provided by the laws then in force," it was enacted, that when any person should die testate, or be entitled to any estate or interest in lands, "which he should not, by his will, have charged with or devised subject to the payment of his debts, the same should be assets, to be administered in Courts of Equity, for the payment of the just debts of such persons, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty; and that the heir or heirs at law, customary heir or heirs, devisee or devisees, of such debtor should be liable to all the same suits in equity, at the suit of any of the creditors of the debtor, whether creditors by simple contract or by specialty, as the heir or heirs at law, or devisee or devisees of any person or persons who died seised of freehold estates, were, before the passing of that Act, liable to, in respect of such freehold estates, at the suit of creditors by specialty in which the heirs were bound."

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Pitman, for the Plaintiffs in the supplemental suit, who were creditors of the testator.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. W. Hislop Clarke, for the Plaintiffs in the original suit.

Mr. Spence and Mr. Wood, for the infant T. P. Thomas.

Mr. K. Parker and Mr. Bevir, for R. L. Lloyd and J. Parry.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bates, for E. H. Adams. The lord's estate by escheat quite independent of the estate of the tenant which has expired; the right of the former is by a paramount title; it is not the devolution of the estate which belongs to the tenant, but that [118] which was reserved by the lord in the original grant to the tenant. To pay the debts of the tenant out of the escheated reversion, would be to pay the debts of one person out of the estate of the other. The 3 & 4 W. c. 104, does not apply to the superior lord, but only to the heirs and devisees of parties dying indebted. The heirs and devisees are to be liable, as the heirs and devisees would, before the passing of the Act, be liable at the suit of special creditors, but no new liability is imposed upon the lord; and if the lord is to be considered a trustee for the creditors, he may be left without a tenant, and thus deprived of his rents and services until the estate has been fully administered.

Again, if the reversion is subject to the debts, still it is not to be applied in priority of the other devised estates, and the other reversions granted by the Crown.

The Defendant Adams has improperly been made a party to the suit, which is to have the trusts of the grant from the Crown carried into execution, and with which he has no concern.

Mr. Wray, for the Attorney-General. The rights of the Crown in this case have been used merely as an instrument to assist the creditors of the testator; if the finding of the inquisition be wrong, the proper course would be to sue out a writ of facias, and traverse the inquisition. The question cannot be decided as between Co-defendants.

Mr. G. Turner, in reply. The terms of the Act are positive, that, when a person shall die seised of lands which he shall not have charged with his debts, they shall be assets for their payment. There is no hardship on the lord, for the testator had the power of devising his estates so as to [119] prevent the escheat, and he has a tenant to pay the chief rents and perform the services due in respect of the tenure.

The Defendant Adams claimed adversely, and, prevented the execution of the trust, he is therefore properly made a party to the suit; Talbot v. The Earl of Rutland (3 Myl. & K. 252).

May 6. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Mr. Adams, having been made a party to the original cause, is not bound by any of the proceedings therein, either by the Master's finding, from which it appears that the personal estate was insufficient to pay the testator's debts, or by the declaration that the reversion of the estate devised to the testator's right heirs was the primary fund for the payment of the debts. He claims to be entitled to the reversion of such only of the testator's lands as are held of the two manors which were granted to him. The reversion of the other lands he does not claim.

The principal question in this cause is, whether lands of which a testator died seised, without having charged them with his debts, are assets for the payment of his debts, in the case of his dying without an heir.

The statute of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 104, expressly declares, that when any person shall die seised of or entitled to any land, which he shall not have charged with his debts, the same shall be assets, to be administered in Court of Equity, for the payment of the just debts of such person. This part of the Act [120] is, in itself, large enough to take in every case. Whether the real estate shall be assets, is, in this part of the clause, made to depend on the seisin or the death of the debtor at the time of his death, and on his neglect to charge the estate with his debts. But the Act proceeds, in the same clause, to provide that the heir or devisee of the debtor shall be liable to all such suits by creditors, as the debtor or devisee of any persons dying seised of land was previously liable to, in respect of such land, at the suit of creditors by specialty, in which the heirs were bound. It is argued, that this notice of a remedy against the heir and devisee is to be an indication, that the preceding enactment ought to be limited, and that instead of reading the words generally, as they stand, "the same shall be assets," we ought, in effect, to read them as if they read thus, "the same, as against the heir and devisee respectively, shall be assets to be administered," &c.

It has been held, that by the statute of the 3 & 4 W. & M. c. 14 (by which it was provided, that devises should be void as against creditors, and that the remedy of a creditor should be by action of debt against the heir and devisee jointly), no remedy was given in the case of a debtor by specialty dying without an heir. (Wilson v. Mabley, 7 East, 128.) So that there being a devisee and no heir, the creditor had no remedy under the statute of W. & M. That defect was supplied by the statute of G. 4 & 1 W. 4, c. 47, which gave the remedy against the devisee only.

In the present case there was an intended devise to the heir; but there being no heir the devise failed, and the question is, as to the right of the creditors in the case of both heir and devisee. The lord of the manor claims to be entitled by the Act, and the creditors claim to be paid, under a statute which expressly enacts that the [121] real estate shall be assets to be administered in Courts of Equity for payment of the debts of the person who died seised, and only refers to a remedy against the heir or devisee.

Under the statutes this Court has held the estates to be assets in the hands of the heir or devisee to pay specialty debts. The statute 47 G. 3, c. 74, makes assets for payment of simple contract debts, the estates which before were assets for the payment of debts due on specialty in which the heirs were bound. The statute of 3 & 4 W. 4 makes all the estates of which the testator died seised assets for the payment of just debts, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty.

As the testator had not charged the estate as he might have done with payment of his debts, the Act came into operation immediately upon his death, and by the Act the estate is to be assets for the payment of debts. The words seem sufficient to give the quality of assets to the estate itself; and it would seem that whoever comes to the estate, and in whatever right, must take it with that quality. I own the case seems to be very different from that which arose in Hunting v. Sheldrake (10 E. & W. 256), under the Act of the 3 & 4 W. & M. By that Act the devise was made void as against the creditor, and the devisee having no title as against the creditor, the only right given to the creditor, who had previously none, was by action of debt against the heir and devisee. The creditor had no right whatever unless he brought such action; and in this respect I conceive that, notwithstanding the decision in Gawler v. Wade (1 Peere Williams, 99), equity has followed the law. It does not appear to me, that the right conferred by the Act now under consideration, is necessarily or properly limited by the subsequent [122] part of the Act, which provides, that as against the heir and devisee, the same suits might be brought as before might be brought against them by a specialty creditor.

The creditors have a legislative provision that the real estate shall be assets. The tenant has his right to chief rents and other payments or services; but there is a tenant in fee land, and his title by escheat cannot be complete. He has a prospect of being entitled by escheat, and in respect of that prospect claims to be interested in the reversion, and insisting on that claim, he also insists that the statute is not applicable against him, and that the reversion is not assets for the payment of debts. Whatever way the right of the lord may be conceived to arise, he must, I think, satisfy his interest, whatever it may be, which accrues upon or after the death of the tenant, subject to the qualification which the Legislature has impressed upon the Act, and I therefore cannot concur in the claim which he has set up to be wholly that he says, that even if the reversion which he claims is subject to the payment of debts, it ought not to be applied till the devised estates and the reversion granted to the Crown have been found to be insufficient.

Considering the whole estate to be made assets, it certainly does not appear to be a necessary consequence, that the reversion now claimed by the lord ought to be held to be the primary fund for the payment of debts. The words of the statute are satisfied without going that length; and Mr. Adams is not bound by the decision made in the decree on further directions, which, being true in the case of real assets descended to the heir, and it being well known that the Crown desires to facilitate the payment of debts, seems to have [123] been taken in this case without argument or opposition from the Attorney-General. I think that Mr. Adams has right to have the question of priority independently considered; and, if it is desired, the case may be argued on that point.

In the meantime, Mr. Adams may, if he pleases, have the account taken in his presence for the purpose of ascertaining that the personal estate is exhausted; and must be referred to the Master, to inquire which of the estates devised to Judith Parry as in the will mentioned are held of the manors of Gwynioneth Iakerdin, and Caerwedros respectively, and also to take an account of what is due to Mr. Adams for mortuaries and chief rents or otherwise. (NOTE.—An appeal is now pending in this case in the House of Lords.)

Bequest of a residue to A. (who had no children) for life, and at his death £5000 to be deposited in the hands of trustees for the use of A.'s eldest son, at his attaining the age of thirty years; the rest to be equally shared, A.'s eldest son taking an equal share in addition to the £5000, and the general division to take place as each respectively attains twenty-four. Held, not too remote.

The testator, by his will dated in 1825, after making certain dispositions, gave the rest and residue of his property, freehold and personal, as follows:—"to the use of my nephew Thomas Young Greet at his attaining the age of thirty years, the produce of such parts of property as may be necessary to convert into cash, with the accumulation by rents, interest, or otherways, I direct to be deposited in the stock of the Bank of England, in the names of my nephew, Thomas Young Greet, and of two of my executors hereafter named, [124] there to remain; my nephew Thomas Young Greet, at his attaining the age of thirty years, to receive, for his use, all the produce and dividends, rents or interest, so long as he may live; and that once every year, the whole of the balances be funded for accumulation, until he, my nephew Thomas Young Greet, does attain the age of thirty years, at which time the produce of the property, with dividends on the accumulated property, which I direct to be consolidated in one sum, with any other placed in the Bank of England at his death or afterwards, as a part produce of my property and to remain as a part of the dividends of or on which, with all rents or other produce growing out of any description of my property, I give to my said nephew Thomas Young Greet, for his use and disposal during his natural life.

"If my nephew Thomas Young Greet should die previous to his attaining the age of thirty years, leaving child or children lawfully begotten, I direct each child, male or female, shall have £500 at their respectively attaining the age of twenty-four years, and the surplus of any such property and its accumulations to go, in addition, to the eldest son of my nephew Thomas Young Greet; but if the children of my said nephew are too numerous for the property to produce £500 each, in such case, I shall direct that they shall each have an equal share of the property, male and female alike.

"If my nephew Thomas Young Greet should live, and agreeable to the directions of this my will, possess this my described residue of my property with its accumulations, and have lawfully begotten a son, I direct my nephew to enjoy the produce of such property with its accumulations during his life, and at his death, £5000 to be deposited in the hands of trustees for accumulation, and placed in the Bank of England in the name of his my nephew's eldest son with two trustees (my executors preferred if surviving), for the use of my said nephew's eldest son at his attaining the age of thirty years; and the rest and residue to be equally shared, male and female alike, the eldest son taking an equal share, in addition to the £5000 funded for him. This general division to take place as each respectively attains the age of twenty-four years.

"If my nephew Thomas Young Greet should die previous to his attaining the age of thirty years, leaving no child, then I direct the next surviving nephew of Alexander Greet to receive the same." Held, that the bequest to the eldest son was not too remote.

Greet's family shall succeed to the residue and its accumulations, subject exactly to the same regulations as described for my nephew Thomas Young Greet and his family."

The testator then appointed his nephew Thomas Young Greet and three other persons executors.

The testator died in 1829, leaving his nephew, Thomas Young Greet, then of the age of twenty-two. He married in 1832, and had four children, the eldest having been born in 1833.

Thomas Young Greet the nephew died in 1841, leaving his eldest son, Thomas Young Greet the younger, and three other children, surviving him.

The property was partly real and partly personal.

Thomas Young Greet the younger, after his father's death, filed a supplemental against all the necessary parties, claiming to be entitled, first, to the sum of [126] £500; and, secondly, to his share of the general residue of the property after the deduction of that sum.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Lewis, for the Plaintiff. It is sufficient to prevent the objection of remoteness that property vests within the period allowed by law. It makes nothing when it is payable, for the Court will direct payment on the legacies during twenty-one, though the testator directs the payment to be postponed until thirty-five or until any other period. Saunders v. Vautier (4 Beav. 115, and Cr. & Ph. 240).

In this case, the gift to the children was vested both as to the reality, Doe dem. v. Naveell (1 M. & S. 327, and 5 Dow. 203), Farmer v. Francis (2 Bing. 151, and 11 M. & St. 505), Doe v. Ward (9 A. & E. 582); and as to personalty, Love v. Strange (5 Bro. P. C. 59), Branstrom v. Wilkinson (7 Ves. 420), Booth v. Booth (Ves. 399), Saunders v. Vautier (4 Beav. 115, and Cr. & Ph. 240), Davis v. Fisher (p. 201).

The £5000 clearly vested at the death of the nephew, for it was then to be immediately severed and placed in the name of trustees for the Plaintiff. The share of the residue, given "in addition" to the eldest son, is subject to the same conditions incidenta (see Day v. Croft, 4 Beav. 561, and the cases there cited), and is also vested. The general division refers only to the payment to the several legatees. It is observed also, that this is a gift of residue, in which case the Court leans strongly towards a vesting; and the gift over is only in case of the death of the nephew leaving child.

[27] Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Addis, in the same interest.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Wood, for the next of kin and co-heirs. The gift to the children of the nephew is too remote. The £5000 was given to the eldest son of the nephew, "at his attaining the age of thirty years:" he therefore took no interest during that period; and, consequently, the gift is void.

With respect to the remainder, the general division was to take place as each of the children respectively attained twenty-four years of age, which might be at a time beyond a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards; it would therefore be void as to the whole class; Leake v. Robinson (2 Mer. 363). It is true, a separate trust was created of the £5000; but to say that it is vested merely because a separate trust is created, is begging the question: the gift may be as much contingent as a trust is created as before.

Saunders v. Vautier was a specific gift, and was limited to the legatee, his executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely. They also cited Cambridge v. Rous (8 Ves. 24) and Duffield v. Duffield (3 Bli. (N. S.) 260).

Mr. Schomberg and Mr. Hingeston, for other parties.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is one of the many cases in which I am afraid it is impossible to come to a conclusion which can be considered as fully satisfactory. You are obliged to [128] spell out the meaning of the testator, and to try to discover the legal effect of his will, under circumstances which make it very difficult to reconcile the case under consideration with the decided authorities.

I think it is perfectly obvious, in this case, that the testator had a strong desire to accumulate the property as much as he could, and to preserve it in the family of the Greets. Those objects clearly preponderate throughout the whole contents of the will; but the main and the principal object in the residuary clause was, to provide for his nephew Thomas Young Greet and the children of that nephew; and there is no ulterior disposition given of the residue, except only, in the event of the nephew, Thomas Young Greet, dying under the age of thirty years without leaving a child.

At the death of the nephew, the £5000 is to be taken out of the residue, and deposited for accumulation in the hands of trustees, one of whom was to be the eldest son of the nephew. The accumulation is directed to be for the use of the nephew's eldest son, "at his attaining the age of thirty years." I think it comes to no more than this:—The testator intended that the son should attain the age of thirty years before the accumulated fund should be paid to him, and not that in the meantime he was to have no interest in this sum.

It appears to me that he had a vested interest in the sum of £5000, at the moment the severance was to be made, namely, on the death of the nephew. After taking the £5000 out of the residue, the remainder is to be shared between the children, both male and female alike, the eldest son taking an equal share, in addition to the £5000 funded for him; and as the £5000 vests [129] upon the death of the nephew, it would be extremely difficult to maintain that his share of the residue does not vest at the same time, or to say that the share of the residue could vest in him at that time, and not in the other children.

Is the Court forced to come to an opposite conclusion by the words which afterwards follow, that this general division is to take place, as each respectively attains the age of twenty-four years? The testator could never have meant, that a general division should take place at different times. His object was, that there should be a general division of the whole fund, after previously severing the particular sum of £5000; after deducting that sum, which was one division, there was to be the general division of the remainder; and, according to the intent, to be inferred from the rest of the will, I think this amounts merely to a direction, that the shares should be paid to the younger children as each attained twenty-four.

I am of opinion that both the £5000 and the share of the residue were vested interests, and the Plaintiff must therefore succeed in this case. (See Blease v. Bugh, 2 Beav. 221; Ring v. Hardwick, Ib. 352; Griffith v. Blunt, 4 Beav. 248; Newman v. Newman, 10 Sim. 51.)

[130] HARRISON v. HARRISON. June 2, 1842.

On a motion to substitute a new next friend of an infant Plaintiff, the Court must be satisfied by affidavit of the circumstances and respectability of the party proposed to be substituted, although all the other parties to the cause consent to the substitution.

This bill was filed by an infant, by Joseph Harrison, his next friend.

Mr. Bacon, now moved that Mr. J. W. Perks might be substituted as next friend for the infant Plaintiff, in the place of J. Harrison.

Mr. Armstrong, for the Defendants, did not object to the application.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Any person may commence a suit as next friend of an infant; but when once here in that character, he will not be removed unless the Court is informed of the circumstances and respectability of the party proposed to be substituted in his place; and that such person is not interested in the subject of the suit. You must produce an affidavit to that effect, before I can make the order.

[131] THOMPSON v. GEARY. June 2, 1842.

Whether where a special injunction is granted against several Defendants, one of them can move to dissolve in the absence of the rest, quære.

An injunction was granted to restrain the Defendants from entering into a contract in the name of a company. A motion was made by one of the Defendants to dissolve the injunction; and the question raised was, whether it was necessary that the other Defendants should be present at the hearing of the motion to dissolve the injunction?

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Rogers, for the motion to dissolve the injunction.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Goulburn, contrà, for the Plaintiff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. If you succeed, the situation of other Defendants will be materially altered in their absence: my impression is, though I do not decide it, that you ought to have them here; when here, it may possibly happen that they cannot oppose the motion, as in the case of exceptions to the Master's report, in which the excepting party alone can be heard against the rest: but the other parties must be here.

[132] OLDFIELD v. COBBETT. June 7, 1842.

A creditor of a testator filed a bill against the executor for administration, and obtained an injunction and receiver. The Plaintiff was found a creditor; and the cause was heard on further directions, but the injunction and receiver were not continued. The executor afterwards brought an action at law against the Plaintiff for monies due to the testator. The Court, by injunction, summarily restrained the proceeding.

The Defendant was the executor of the testator, his father. A creditor's bill being filed, the Defendant was restrained from receiving the assets, and a receiver appointed. Under the decree the accounts were directed to be taken, and the Plaintiff was found, by the Master, to be a creditor of the testator to the amount of £80. A decree was made on further directions, but no order was made as to continuing the receiver or the injunction.

The Defendant, the executor, afterwards brought an action against the Plaintiff, for the recovery of £5000, which he alleged to be due to the testator's estate. The Plaintiff now moved to restrain the Defendant, by injunction, from proceeding in the action.

Mr. Parker, in support of the motion.

Mr. Turner, contrà. The injunction and receiver not having been continued by the decree on further directions, are gone. If the Plaintiff requires an injunction, it ought to be obtained by an independent bill, and not on motion after decree. There may have been discovered, which shew that the Plaintiff is indebted to the estate of the testator, instead of being a creditor.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have no hesitation in granting the injunction.

[133] QUARMAN v. WILLIAMS. June 7, 1842.

On an application for a stop order, the assignor's right to the fund in Court must be shewn, either by the proceedings or by affidavit.

A party who claimed an interest in a fund in Court, in the character of next of kin, created an incumbrance thereon, and he and the incumbrancer now presented a bill for a stop order. (Ordines Can. 161.)

Mr. Sheffield, in support of the petition.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held that the Petitioners must show by some proceeding in the cause, or by affidavit, that he sustained the character next of kin, otherwise the Court might place a stop order on a fund, on the application of persons having no interest whatever in it.

It being admitted that this did not appear, the petition stood over to file an affidavit.⁽¹⁾

[134] HARVEY v. HARVEY. June 8, 1842.

A testator after giving his real estate to the eldest son of A. for life, with remainder to the other children of A. in tail, with remainder over, gave his personalty in trust to pay the dividends to the children and grandchildren of A. who should "from time to time," be entitled to the rents of the freeholds. By a codicil declared that the children of B., C., and D., living at the death of the testator, should "take their shares" of the personal property with the representatives of A. Held, that the gift was to the children and grandchildren living at the death of the testator for life, and was not too remote.

A testator gave £150 a year to such of his relations as his widow should determine requiring and most meriting relief. Held, that a widow of the testator's brother was not an object, and the widow having given a portion to such widow, and remainder to the relations, held also, that a relative to whom no part had been appropriated, and who did not shew himself to possess the qualification, had no right to question the misappropriation.

A testator gave his widow "the full and entire enjoyment" of his real and personal estates, which, after her death, he gave to other persons; and he empowered her to retain a portion of a sum of £150 a year given to other parties, for rent of the leaseholds. Held, she was entitled to enjoy the leasehold in specie, that it was not imperative on her to renew, but that she had acted wrong in surrendering the lease, of which she was the only cestui que vie, as she thereby deprived herself the option of renewing for the benefit of the parties in remainder.

This case is reported ante (4 Beav. 215), where, to save repetition, the will is sufficiently set out, and to which the reader is referred. On that occasion the Master was directed to ascertain the next of kin of the testator living at his death, and the representatives of those who had since died.

The Master reported that such next of kin were twenty in number, of which twelve were now living, and that of the remaining eight, there were personal representatives to three only, and that the others were not represented.

The persons, parties to the cause, who would be entitled to the residue, in the gift being too remote and void, were the widow, who would be entitled to one-third, Catherine Pearson, a sister of the testator, entitled to one-sixth of the remainder, or two-eightieths, and Thomas Harvey, the representative of the testator's [135] brother Thomas, entitled also to two-eightieths; so that, of the whole, five-ninths of the next of kin were represented in the suit.

The cause again came before the Court.

The Court having determined that it would hear the cause in the absence of other next of kin, the questions were, first, whether the gift of the personalty in trust to pay the dividends "from time to time," to the children and grandchildren of James Edward was or was not too remote.

Secondly, whether the testator's widow had exceeded her discretion, in giving the widow of the testator's brother Thomas a portion of the £150 directed distributed amongst the testator's "relations;" and if not, then whether the Plaintiff had any interest in the sums misapplied, he not having proved himself as coming within the qualification.

Thirdly, whether the widow had acted wrong in surrendering the lease of which she was the surviving cestui que vie.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. W. M. James, for the Plaintiff. The distribution of the real estate is to be amongst a class to be ascertained at the death of the widow, and the gift is not therefore too remote. The bequest of the dividends, though payable "from time to time," carries the capital. (See Elton v. Shephard, 1 B. C. C. 1; Page v. Leapingwell, 18 Ves. 463, and Haig v. Swiney, 1 S. & St. 487.) The will, which directs other persons living at the death of his wife, should take "their share of his property," removes all doubt.

[136] The widow was not empowered to give any portion of the £150 a year to the widows of the testator's relations; and she had no right to surrender the lease which the testator intended to be renewed.

They asked the usual accounts and inquiries as to the leaseholds and the £150 a year, with liberty to state special circumstances.

Mr. Turner and Mr. John Baily, contra. The division is to be from time to time between parties, who must be ascertained de anno in annum, and may not necessarily occur within the limited period: the gift is therefore void for remoteness. Lord Hampton v. Marquis of Hertford (2 Ves. & B. 54), Hayes v. Hayes (4 Russ. 311), and Deerstun v. The Duke of St. Albans (5 Mad. 232), were cited.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Rogers, and Mr. Chandless, for other parties.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question in this case is whether the Plaintiff is entitled to the relief he asks. It must be owned that the words "from time to time" occasion considerable ambiguity, and it is very difficult to give effect to them, in any way consistent with the other expressions in this will. I think, however, that the words are intended to describe a class of persons existing at the death of the tenant for life, and not a class to take in succession. Such would plainly be the construction, unless we are to give the words "from time to time" an effect which should controul the meaning of all the other words. I do not think that it is to be done, especially having regard to the words contained in the codicil. I understand the meaning of the words is this, there is a direction "to apply the rents and interest" (and that is quite unlimited) "unto and equally amongst all my children and children, grandchild and grandchildren of James Harvey and James Harvey" (so far it would be quite free from ambiguity) "who may not, from time to time, be in the receipt of the rents and profits of my freehold estates." Now, if the words had been simply "who might not be in the receipt of the rents and profits of my freehold estates," it would be quite clear.

The person who might, "from time to time," be in the receipt of the rents and profits, anterior to the times of division, might depend upon a variety of events taking place. There might be two sons living. There might be one son and a grandchild. There might be one son of one son and several grandchildren of another son, and, in fact, a succession of rights might take place anterior to the times of division.

The words, as it seems to me, are nearly inconsistent with each other; and I am bound to decide whether the words contained in the codicil are to preponderate. The result I have come to is, that the words which imply the existence of a class at the widow's death, preponderate over the effect that ought to be given to the words "from time to time." I think therefore that the Plaintiff has an interest in the property.

With respect to the next point, I am inclined to think that the Plaintiff has no ground to complain. There [138] was a sum of £150 given by the will, to be paid by the widow to such of the testator's relations "as she should deem requiring, and most meriting, relief." She was bound to apply that sum for the benefit of the relations, and I think that the widows of relations are not persons who are comprised in the description; if therefore, it were necessary for me to decide that question, I should say that there was an erroneous application. Who, then, would be the persons who are prejudiced by that application? Those relations who ought to have that sum applied for them. Has the Plaintiff an interest in that? I am very much inclined to think he has not.

By the codicil, the widow was empowered to reserve a portion of this sum of £110 for the renewal of the leasehold, but it was entirely optional, as it seems to me, for her part. If she had once set apart a sum of money for that purpose, the Plaintiff as being one of the persons entitled in remainder, would immediately have acquired an interest in it. She never did so, but made an erroneous application to the prejudice of other persons. I am inclined to think that the Plaintiff is not entitled to call for an account in that respect; and if he were, I think that, after the length of time which he has permitted to elapse (six or eight years), it would be rather too much to say he should have any claim whatever. I think therefore that the Plaintiff is not entitled to relief in that respect.

As to the leasehold surrendered, the widow was tenant for life, with a full power to enjoy the leasehold. The testator says, I give and devise to my wife "the whole and entire enjoyment." As she was the cestui que vie, she became entitled to the whole beneficial interest (Pickering v. Pickering, 2 Beav. 31; 4 Myl. & Cr. 289; Gooden v. Tremamondo, 2 Beav. 512, and cases in note); and [139] so far, the legal and beneficial interest were conjoined in her. Though I cannot think it of great importance, yet I do not approve of such a sale; for I think she ought not to have deprived herself of the option, which the testator gave her, of retaining a sum for renewing these leases. I do not think a person in that situation had a right to deprive herself of the means of preserving the estate to the trust. She had the sole right of enjoyment; the legal estate was vested in her, with an object pointed out to her, and giving her an option of retaining a fund, not given to her, but to the testator's relations, for the purpose of continuing that estate in the family. I cannot therefore think that her conduct was right. Supposing, however, that it was set aside, that the £120 was set apart as a portion of the trust fund, would she not be entitled to set off the rents of that estate against it, although she had parted with it? If she would, and therefore no benefit can come to the Plaintiff from any investigation of the matter.

I am disposed to declare (as far as it can be declared in the absence of the parties interested, and who are not to be prejudiced by what passes now), that the Plaintiff, as one of the persons described in the will, has an interest in remainder at the death of the tenant for life. I can make no other decree unless the Plaintiff desires an account.

Defendant in contempt for want of answer filed it, and the Plaintiff replied thereto. Held, that he had waived his remedy for the costs of the contempt.

On the 25th of January 1842 the Defendant Maurice Ball was attached, for want of answer, by the Sheriff of Gloucestershire, and on the 24th of February was brought to the Bar, and turned over to the Fleet. On the 15th of April a writ of habeas corpus was issued to bring him up to the Bar of the Court on the return thereof, in order to answer the bill taken pro confesso against him. On the 23d of April the Defendant appeared in custody, at the Bar, on the return of the writ.

Mr. Prendergast moved that the bill might be taken pro confesso.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS at first thought the application premature; but, referring to the registrar, made the order.

The Defendant, however, declaring that his answer was ready, the Master of the Rolls directed the order not to be drawn up till the 28th, and then to be absolute in default of answer.

The answer, having been filed within the time limited, was accepted; but the Defendant remained in custody for the costs of his original contempt.

The Plaintiff filed a replication against all the Defendants, and served the prisoner with a subpoena to rejoin.

Mr. Pemberton, for the prisoner, now moved that he might be discharged forthwith without payment of costs, [141] on the ground that by replying to the Defendant's aver and serving him with a subpoena to rejoin, the Plaintiff had waived the contempt. Hodkins v. Lloyd (1 Sim. & St. 393).

Mr. Prendergast opposed the motion, contending that if the Plaintiff had not needed as he had done, his bill would have been dismissed for want of prosecution against the other Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that by filing the replication the Plaintiff had waived the contempt. He ordered the prisoner to be discharged, stating that when the Defendant filed his answer without paying the costs, the Plaintiff might have moved to take it off the file, as the contempt had not then been proved. [142] M'DERMOTT v. WALLACE. June 11, 1842.

testatrix gave unto A. and B. a sum in the long annuities, to be equally divided during their lives, after which she gave the said sum to C. Held, that the survivor A. and B. took for life.

The testatrix by her will gave and bequeathed "all she possessed from the long annuities unto the persons thereafter named (that is to say), she gave to Mary and Elizabeth Grant of Chelsea the annual sum of £12 to be equally divided during their lives, after which she gave the said sum to Elizabeth French M'Dermott."

Elizabeth Grant died in 1831 and Mary Grant died in 1841, and the question was whether she was entitled to the dividends on the long annuities between 1831 and 1841.

Mr. Willcock, for the representatives of Elizabeth French M'Dermott, contended that the gift to Mary Grant and Elizabeth Grant was for their joint lives only, and immediately on the death of Elizabeth the long annuities went over to Mrs. M'Dermott.

Mr. Stinton, contra, for the representatives of Mary Grant, argued that the words "after which" meant after the lives of both, and that Mary was entitled for her life as survivorship.

Mr. Willcock, in reply. The words "after which" refer to some period previously referred to, and the only one is the joint lives.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is doubtful; but, on the whole, I think the gift over does not take effect till after the death of Mary. Hutton v. Finch, 4 Beav. 186.)

[143] GARRATT v. NIBLOCK. June 13, 1842.

Order to pay a sum of money out of Court should be obtained by petition, and not by motion.

Philip Smith was entitled to a legacy of £60, which had been carried over to his account, his title thereto being determined, but he being an infant.

Being attained twenty-one, a motion was made, on his behalf, that the same should be paid out to him.

Mr. Speed, for the motion, contended that this might be done by motion, as well as by petition, especially in a case in which the sum was so very small: he cited Re v. Edwards (Jacob, 504) in which "a fund carried to a separate account was paid out on motion by consent, the title to it being clear."

See Const v. Ebers, 1 Mad. 530; Anon. 15 Ves. 174; Landars v. Allen, 6 Sim. 104; Woodward v. Twissaine, 9 Sim. 301; Wilson v. Bates, 3 Myl. & Cr. 197.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he could not order payment out of Court, except on petition, and he refused the motion. (See Oliver v. Beavan, 583.)

[144] THE BARON DE FEUCHERES v. DAWES. July 7, 1842.

The 9th General Order of December 1833 does not apply to the case of a Defendant residing abroad. A commission to take an answer abroad must therefore be obtained on motion or petition.

This was an application to take the demurrer and answer of the Defendant Thanaron and wife off the file for irregularity, upon the following grounds. Defendants were resident in France, and their solicitors in this country having presented their answer, sued out a commission to take the same without having first obtained an order for that purpose.

By the 9th of the General Orders of the 21st of December 1833 (Ordinance 45), it is directed, that a Defendant shall be at liberty, without order, to sue dedimus to take his plea, answer, or demurrer in the country, on giving two days' notice in writing to the Plaintiff's clerk in Court to give commissioners names to the same taken, and in default thereof, the Defendant shall be at liberty to sue the same directed to his own commissioners.

The Defendant's solicitors, conceiving the general order applied to this case, the two days' notice required by that order, and no commissioners having been named by the Plaintiff, they thereupon, without an order for that purpose, sued out a commission under which the demurrer and answer had been taken and filed.

The Plaintiff moved to take this answer and demurrer off the file for irregularity.

[145] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Beavan, in support of the motion, contended that the 9th Order above mentioned did not cause any alteration in the old practice regard to issuing commissions to take answers in foreign countries; and that commissions could, therefore, only be granted, as heretofore, upon an order obtained on motion or petition (2 Dan. Pr. 283), and they argued also that the Court could never have intended to impose upon the Plaintiff the necessity of naming commissioners to take an answer in a distant part of the world within two days, stated that from the alleged state of mind of the Defendant, the Plaintiff was desirous of joining in the commission to see the answer taken.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Glasse, contra, contended that the terms of the order were general and applied to all cases.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] reserved judgment, and subsequently granted the application.

[146] MEYER v. MONTRIOU. July 20, 1842.

A trustee, having power to vary trust funds, admitted he had sold out trust property but did not shew how the produce had been invested. Held, on such an admission that he was liable to make good the fund.

This suit was instituted for the purpose of making the trustee of a marriage settlement liable for a breach of trust.

By the settlement made on the marriage of John Meyer with Margaret Meyer certain funds were vested in trustees upon trust for the husband, wife, and children of the marriage. The settlement contained a power, with the consent of the and wife, to call in the trust monies, and invest them in Government or mortgage securities, or in the purchase of freehold, copyhold, or leasehold estates.

The bill alleged, that the principal part of the trust funds had been improperly paid out of the bank, under a power of attorney executed by the three trustees, and had been in consequence lost; and it prayed that the trustees might make good the

The answer of Montrion, one of the trustees, admitted the selling out of the trust funds under a power of attorney given by him and his co-trustees, and stated some of the dealings with different parts of the fund, but he did not shew on what securities the whole of the monies had been invested, or whether on securities warranted by the instrument. (See 4 Beavan, 343.)

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Hetherington asked for a declaration of the liability of the trustees to make good the fund.

[147] Mr. Kindersley, for Mr. Montrion, contended that such a declaration was premature, and that there ought to be a previous inquiry as to the investment of the

Mr. Campbell and Mr. E. F. Smith, for other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that where a trustee admitted that a trust fund had been sold out and converted from a proper state of investment, and failed to shew that it was then properly invested, he was liable, in the first instance, to have a decree made against him. Here the trustee admitted that the fund had been sold out, but could not say whether any part was now properly invested. It must therefore be declared that he was liable to make good the fund.

It is too remote, unless, according to the intention of the testator, some person must necessarily be in existence, with legal power to dispose of the property, within a period limited by the rules of law.

It must not only vest within the time limited by the rule against perpetuities, but the interests of the respective parties in the property, must be capable of ascertaining within that period, otherwise the gift will be void.

The testator bequeathed leaseholds in Church Street, having sixty years unexpired, and to which there was no obligation on the part of the lessor to renew, to A. for life, with remainder to the children she should leave, and in default to B. He bequeathed to trustees other leaseholds, upon trust to accumulate the rents, until the lease of the Church Street property "should become nearly expired," and then to apply such part thereof as should be necessary in the renewal of the Church Street property, "for the benefit of the respective persons to whom he had before, by his will, given the same;" and the residue, after answering the purpose aforesaid, he gave to his residuary legatees. The testator died before the Thellusson Act came into operation. Held, that the trust for accumulation and renewal was void for remoteness and uncertainty.

The questions in this cause were, first, whether the trustees and executors of the will of the testator, Mr. Shadrach Venden, had committed a breach of trust, by [148] investing the rents of three leasehold houses in Oxford Street and Audley Street, upon trust to accumulate and form a fund for the renewal of the leases of two houses in Church Street, which had been bequeathed for the benefit of his niece the Defendant Curtis and her children; and secondly, whether the Plaintiff, who was one of the legatees, was now entitled to call for the performance of this trust, or to charge the representatives of the executors of Shadrach Venden with the breach of trust.

The testator was possessed of two leasehold houses in Church Street for a term, of between sixty and seventy years unexpired, and he possessed three other leasehold premises in Oxford Street and Audley Street.

By his will, dated in 1794, he bequeathed the two houses in Church Street to four trustees, upon trust for the Defendant Elizabeth Curtis (then Elizabeth Cheverell) for life, for her separate use, and from and after her decease, upon trusts which were expressed as follows:—"To the use and benefit of any child or children my said niece Elizabeth Cheverell may leave by any husband or husbands she may happen to marry, equally to be divided amongst them, if more than one, share and share alike; and if but one child, the whole to such one child; but in case my said niece Elizabeth Cheverell shall not, at her decease, leave any child or children, then to the use of my nephew Shadrach Venden Cheverell."

The testator then bequeathed to his trustees the three leasehold houses in Oxford Street and Audley Street, upon trusts which he declared as follows:—"Upon trust that they my said trustees shall and do, from time to time, receive the rents, issues, and profits of the above [149] three leasehold messuages or dwelling-houses situate in Oxford Street and Audley Street aforesaid, and lay out the same at interest till my several leasehold messuages or tenements hereinbefore mentioned, situate and being in Church Street aforesaid, shall become nearly expired, and then, to pay and apply such part thereof as shall be necessary, and in the renewal of my several leasehold messuages or tenements situate and being in Church Street aforesaid, for the benefit of the respective persons to whom I have before, by this my will, given the same." And he gave the money arising from the rents of his houses in Oxford Street and Audley Street, and the interest arising therefrom after answering the several purposes aforesaid, between Edward Venden, Shadrach Venden Cheverell, and Elizabeth Cheverell, and he also gave his residuary estate to the three last-mentioned persons.

The testator died in 1795, so that the Thellusson Act (39 & 40 G. 3, c. 98) was inapplicable to this case.

After the testator's death, the trustees and executors, for some time, continued to accumulate the rents of the Oxford Street and Audley Street property. The lease expired in 1817, and it was stated, that the accumulated fund was afterwards divided amongst the residuary legatees.

Mrs. Curtis, the tenant for life, was still living, and this bill was filed by one of her children, seeking a declaration, that the rents of the Oxford Street and Audley Street property ought to have been accumulated for the purpose of renewing the leases of the Church Street property; that the trustees and their representatives might be held responsible for the breach of trust, in not doing so, and that the money recovered might be applied in the renewal of the leases of the Church Street property.

The Defendants, the representatives of the trustees, insisted, first, that the trust was void for uncertainty; 2dly, that the period during which the accumulation had been directed might possibly exceed the limits allowed by law, and was therefore void.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Younge, for the Plaintiff. The trust for accumulation is valid, for the whole interest must necessarily vest in Mrs. Curtis's children and the residuary legatees within the period limited, viz., within a life in being and twenty-one years after. Immediately on the death of Mrs. Curtis every contingency will end, and her children and the residuary legatee will then have the power of disposing of the accumulated fund, and of stopping the further accumulation. This is all that is required by the rule which prescribes only the time within which the property must vest. Where there is a gift which vests within the limited period, but which is not payable until afterwards, the gift is not void, but the Court directs payment immediately on the legatee attaining twenty-one. Saunders v. Vautier (Cr. & 240, and 4 Beavan, 115).

Again, Mrs. Curtis may survive the leases, and then there could be no objection to the trust for renewal.

The Plaintiff, therefore, has a right to have the rents accumulated until the death of his mother; and the [151] trustees having neglected to do so, are answerable for their breach of trust.

Mr. Bailly, for the widow and the other children.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Hodgson, and Mr. D. James, for the representatives of the surviving trustees. The trust for accumulation and renewal is void, both for uncertainty and for remoteness.

There is to be an accumulation until a few months before the expiration of the lease, which will happen in 1863, and then an application is to be made to the landlord to renew the lease; but for what term is it to be renewed? for 100 or 1000 years; what is to be the rent; is it to be at a rack rent; or at a peppercorn rent? The meaning is to be given to the expression "nearly expired?" and what is to be done if the landlord refuses to renew the lease?—would the children in that event be entitled to the fund which would be necessary to renew? and if so, how is the amount to be ascertained?

The Plaintiff will only be entitled in the event of his surviving the tenant for life, it will be impossible, even then, for the Court to say, what sum he is interested in, for, until the expiration of the lease the amount necessary to obtain a renewal cannot be ascertained.

But assuming there is no vagueness or uncertainty in the trust, yet, it is void in consequence of its violating the rule of law against perpetuities. Every trust for accumulation which is not necessarily limited to the term of a life or lives in being, twenty-one years after, is absolutely and wholly void. Thus a trust [152] to accumulate for twenty-two years certain, is absolutely void, because it may possibly be beyond the legal limits; this is the old law, independent of the Thellusson case. Here the answer given by the Plaintiff is this, that he is not within the rule, because the trust is for the benefit of a party in being and her children, and that the trust must necessarily vest within a life in being and twenty-one years after; but it is not enough, you must also shew that they have a vested interest in an ascertained share in an ascertained fund. Suppose the tenant for life to die, what would be the fund to which her children would be entitled, and what proportion of accumulations would belong to the residuary legatees? It would be perfectly impossible to ascertain it, because the fund required at the expiration of the lease would not be capable of ascertainment. The consequence is that the accumulation would go on, and the rights of the parties could not be ascertained within the time allowed by the rule against perpetuities. (See Palmer v. Holford, 4 Russ. 403.)

It is said, that the children and the residuary legatees have the power of putting an end to the trust within the time, but that would be effected by agreement between themselves, and by defeating the testator's intentions and not by right. They have never adversely to compel the other parties to compromise their rights, or to waive by agreement, that which the law says is invalid. Again, what is to be done if one refuses to concur?—the accumulations must go on until the year 1863, and all the evils which the rule of law is intended to prevent must necessarily ensue.

The intention was to accumulate for sixty-three years certain, which is void, and the Court cannot look to the [153] events which have happened or may happen, in order to render valid a gift which is not so limited as to be beyond the possibility of being too remote. They cited Leake v. Robinson (2 Mer. 363), Proctor v. Bishop of Exeter (2 H. Bl. 358), Lade v. Holford (W. Bl. 428, and Amb. 479), Ibbetson v. Ibbetson (10 Sim. 495), Fearne's Cont. Remrs.

Tinney, Mr. Bacon, Mr. G. Turner, Mr. Beales, Mr. Spence, Mr. Renshaw, Mr. F. J. Hall, for other parties.

Kindersley, in reply. There are many cases in which there has been a power to renew generally, and which have never been held void for uncertainty. A lease means on the same terms, Price v. Asheton (1 Y. & C. 82). If it be held that this direction to renew is void for uncertainty, then every trust for the term of what is called renewable leases, which the landlord is not bound to renew, would be void, as in the case of bishops' and college leases.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is contended, that under this power of renewal, the trustees were to receive the rents of the houses in Oxford Street and Audley Street, and accumulate them, until the leases of the other two had become nearly expired, that is nearly to the year 1863, when the last of the leases would expire or be upon the point of expiring, and then procure the best of the leases they could.

[4] To this it is objected, that it is carrying on an accumulation of rent and interest beyond the period which the law allows, for it is not limited to a life in being and twenty-one years afterwards, but may continue very much longer; this indeed is perfectly evident. The reply given to this objection is to this effect:—It is true, that if the trust be literally followed, it would be too remote, but it ought to be literally followed, because, within the period allowed for accumulation, the must be persons ascertained, who alone would be entitled to this fund and every of it: again, it is possible that Mrs. Curtis might live beyond the term of the lease in which case a renewal might properly be made in her lifetime; but even suppose her to die at any time whatever within this period, then that in twenty-one years after her death, the persons authorized by law to dispose of the property, might divide at once, and thus prevent the future accumulation of the fund, and obviate the mischief which the rule of law intended to prevent.

Now the persons who would be entitled in that event, would be the children which Mrs. Curtis might leave and the persons entitled to the residue of the money after answering the purposes which the testator intended to be effected. They may all be in a state competent to consent. Nevertheless, in that state of things, it is perfectly manifest, that although amongst themselves they might make a title to the fund to be accumulated for renewal, yet each of them would be uncertain as to the amount of his share, or of that which was his; no one of them could say, such a share of this property is mine, I have a right to sell or dispose of it as I please, and doing so, I am acting according to the intention of the testator.

[155] In all cases of this kind, I apprehend, we are to look at the direction of the will, with reference to the property of the testator at the time of his death, with reference to the persons, who, under the directions of the will and according to the intention of the testator, may, at a future period, have a legal power to dispose of the property. If, according to the intention of the testator, some persons must not necessarily be in existence, with legal power to dispose of the property, within the period limited by the rule of law, then, I apprehend, the gift is too remote.

Now here, such was not the intention of the testator; the intention, according to the argument which is used, was that the accumulation should go on, as to part of this at least, until the period when the last lease was about expiring, that is, 1863, which period, it is evident, might be beyond that limited by law; if the contrary were done, it would be done, not in pursuance of any power given to them by the will, but in consequence of a power which they have, of coming to an arrangement amongst themselves, by which they compromise their respective claims under the will, and create for themselves aliquot defined shares in this part of this property, doing that for themselves, but proceeding in a manner directly contrary to the intention of the will.

I should have been very willing to have attended to any authority which might have been brought forward to support the proposition, that this might be done; but has been cited. The case of Saunders v. Vautier (Cr. & Ph. 240, and 4 Beavan, 121), is, I apprehend, entirely different from this. It has frequently happened in this Court, that a testator has given to an individual an absolute vested interest in a defined fund, so that, according to the ordinary [156] rule of law, he would have the power, of his own authority, to receive or dispose of it immediately on his attaining legal age; but having given such a vested interest, the testator has, nevertheless, postponed the time of giving him possession, till a period subsequent to the legatee attaining twenty-one, although in such cases, the party having attained the age of twenty-one cannot, according to the direct intention of the will, obtain possession; yet he has everything but possession; he has the legal power of disposing of the thing; he may sell, charge, or assign it, for he has an absolute, indefeasible interest in the thing defined and certain; the Court, therefore, has thought fit (I don't know whether satisfactorily or not), to say, that since the legatee has such the legal power and power over the property, and can deal with it as he pleases, it will not be to his disadvantage of raising money by selling or charging his interest in the thing; the thing is his own, at this very moment. The Court has, in such cases, ordered payment on his attaining twenty-one. I don't think that case is analogous to the present, because there the property is defined and ascertained; here it is not, for the sum cannot be ascertained until the period for renewal has arrived, when it will be known what sum is necessary for that purpose.

Besides this, I think there are other objections on the ground of uncertainty, which I do not think it necessary to enter into in detail, as my opinion is clear upon the grounds I have stated; nevertheless, I may say that I think the uncertainty of shares, which the children are to have, an uncertainty arising partially from the certain demand which they have upon the fund to be accumulated; for the purpose of renewal is such, that nobody can tell what ought to be done under this ultimate limitation of a fund in a marriage settlement, after the death of a husband and wife, was to the husband if he survived his wife, but if the wife survived, then, after her death, to such person as the husband should appoint, and in default, "to his executors, administrators, or assigns." The wife survived, and the husband made no appointment. Held, that his residuary legatees and not his next of kin, were entitled.

[157] On the joint ground of remoteness and uncertainty, it appears to me that the trust cannot be sustained; I think this bill must be dismissed, and under the circumstances it must be dismissed with costs.

As to the funds held in trust for the wife for life, with remainder as the husband should appoint, and in default to his executors, administrators or assigns: Held, that to pass under the will of the husband by the words, "money he might have in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England."

On the marriage of William North with Mary Burghope, a sum of £1000 Navy Rent stock, which belonged to the latter was vested in trustees, on trust to pay dividends to Mary Burghope for life; and after her decease, to pay the dividends moiety to William North for life; and after the decease of the survivor of them, to pay one moiety as therein particularly mentioned, and as to the other moiety, to pay it to William North absolutely, in case he should survive Mary Burghope; but if Mary Burghope should survive William North (which happened), upon the decease of Mary Burghope, to assign and transfer it to such person as William North should, by deed or will, appoint; "and in default of such direction, election, or appointment, then unto the executors, administrators, or assigns of the William North."

The marriage took effect, and the question in the cause arose as to the second moiety, under the following circumstances. William North died in 1829, and his widow survived him, died in 1841. William North [158] executed no appointment of the fund, but, by his will, he gave "the whole of the money he might have in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, and also all the money which he might have at the time of his decease in the Hertfordshire Savings' Bank," in trust for his widow for life, with remainder to other persons; and he gave the residue of the fund to his widow absolutely.

The bill was filed by the administratrix of Mary North the widow, claiming a moiety of the fund, as residuary legatee under her husband's will.

For the Defendant, Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bagshawe, for the Plaintiff, cited Graftley v. Humpage (1 Jac. 47).

For the Plaintiff, Mr. Campbell, for a trustee, and also for one of the next of kin of William North, pleaded, that the next of kin and not the residuary legatee took under the above will, Palin v. Hills (1 Myl. & K. 470). He also cited Horseman v. Abbey (1 Jac. 481).

Mr. R. W. Moore contended that either the fund belonged to the next of kin, or under the will of William North, as "money which he had in the books of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England;" he cited Bethune v. Kennedy (1 & Cr. 116) to shew that the gift of the stock was specific.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. The money was not money which the testator had in the bank at his death, as it was standing in the name of trustees, and was subject to the life interest of the wife.

[159] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, there were many cases on the subject, but he thought, on the words of the settlement, that the Plaintiff was clearly entitled. He ordered the costs of all parties to be paid out of the fund, and the residue to be paid to the Plaintiff.(1)

[159] NEALE V. HODGSON. July 22, 1842.

Subject to the life-estate of her husband, a wife had the absolute power of appointing a trust fund, which, in default of appointment, was limited to her next of kin, and there was a proviso that if the husband became bankrupt the dividends should no longer be paid to him. The wife died first, and appointed the fund to her husband. Held, that he became entitled thereto absolutely, and had a right at once to have a transfer thereof.

Elizabeth Neale, the wife of the Plaintiff Joseph Neale, was, at the time of her marriage, entitled to some freehold property and money invested on mortgage. A settlement was thereupon made, whereby it was covenanted that the trustees should invest £7800, part of her property, in their names, and stand possessed thereof in trust for Mrs. Neale for life, with remainder to Mr. Neale for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage, and in default, then, "subject and without prejudice to the life-estate of Mr. Neale in case he should survive Mrs. Neale" upon trusts, &c., as Mrs. Neale should by will appoint, and in default of appointment, the trusts following, that is to say, in trust for Mrs. Neale in case she should survive Mr. Neale, "but in case she should depart this life in the lifetime of Mr. Neale (which event happened), then in trust, subject and without prejudice to the life-estate of [160] Mr. Neale therein, for the next of kin of Mr. Neale as if she had died sole and unmarried, and in such manner as such next of kin would have taken under the statute for the distribution of the personal estate and effects of persons who die intestate."

The settlement provided, that if Mr. Neale became bankrupt or insolvent, the dividends "directed to be paid to him in the event of his surviving his intended wife should no longer be paid to him, but to such person or persons in such manner as the same would have been payable or applicable in case Mr. Neale had survived Mrs. Neale."

There were no children of the marriage. The wife died in 1839, having made no testamentary appointment, whereby she appointed all the real estate, and all the principal of her personal estate and other the property vested in the trustees of the marriage settlement unto the Plaintiff Mr. Neale absolutely.

The Plaintiff, by this bill, prayed that the trust property might be transferred to him by the trustees. The bill insisted that the Plaintiff had an absolute interest therein under the settlement and appointment. The question, raised in the suit, was whether, in the event of the Plaintiff becoming bankrupt or insolvent, the trust property would or not, under the circumstances, go over to other parties; whether the trustees had, therefore, any duties to perform in respect thereof which made it necessary for them to retain the property.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bacon, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Metcalfe, contra, for W. A. Hodgson the heir at law and next of kin of Mrs. Neale, [161] contended that the fund ought to be retained by the trustees, as it was possible they might have duties to perform; for, as the right of appointment was "subject to the life-estate of the husband," such life-estate was unaffected by the appointment, and consequently if the husband should become bankrupt, his life interest in the property would thenceforth belong to the husband.

(1) See Stocks v. Dodsley, 1 Keen, 325; Collier v. Squire, 3 Russ. 467; Pearce v. Strange, 6 Mad. 161; Bridge v. Abbot, 3 Bro. C. C. 224; Wellman v. Bowring, 12 & St. 24.

next of kin of Mrs. Neale during the remainder of Mr. Neale's life. That it was the clear intention of the settlement, that the property should not go to Mr. Neale's assignee in case of his bankruptcy; and that this intention would be defeated if it were now held that he now took an absolute interest.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. W. T. S. Daniel, for the trustees.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The intention of the settlement was, that if the husband became a bankrupt, the children, if any, should take, but if there were no children, then that the appointees of the wife should take. The appointees, who were afterward to be nominated, might have been strangers; but the wife has made the husband her appointee, and he must take in the latter character. He said that as appointee, he takes subject to his own life interest, but if he became bankrupt his life interest would cease, and the appointees would immediately be entitled to the dividends, and he is the appointee. The husband, therefore, is absolutely entitled, and there must be a declaration to that effect.

The effect of the settlement is not defeated, because the intention was merely to protect the family, and there is none.

[162] LORD HUNTINGTOWER v. SHERBORN. August 4, 1842.

subpœna to appear and service thereof set aside and discharged with costs, on the ground of an irregularity in the teste.

This was an injunction cause. On the 2d of August 1842, and before the bill was on the file, the Defendant was served with a subpœna to appear, which was tested the 2d of August in the fifth year of Her present Majesty.

There was endorsed on the writ the name of the Plaintiff's attorney, and a date the 2d of August 1842.

It was now moved, on behalf of the Defendant, that the subpœna and the service thereof should be set aside and discharged for irregularity, with costs.

It appeared by affidavit that the writ really issued in August 1842.

Mr. Beavan, in support of the motion. The writ is tested the 2d of August in the 5th year of Her present Majesty, or on the 2d of August 1841. By the 7th Order 1833 (Ord. Can. 44), it is ordered "that the time for serving any subpœna, except costs, shall be limited to the last day of the term next following the term or session in which it was sued out;" consequently it was served too late. If, however, the writ actually issued in August 1842, then the teste is wrong, and on that ground the writ ought to be discharged.

[163] Mr. Tripp, contra. The objection is frivolous, as the writ issued in August 1842, and the date is properly indorsed.

Mr. Beavan, in reply. The date of issuing cannot be shewn by affidavit so as to contradict the writ itself. As to the date indorsed, that is not part of the writ, and is warranted by the form directed by the 1st and 3d General Orders of December 1833 (Ord. Can. 42, 43, 60.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Court having of late intrusted the preparation of writs to solicitors (1st Order of 21st of December 1833; see Ord. Can. 42), it is important that they should be in every respect regular. The writ must be granted, with costs.

Testator bequeathed a leasehold and his residuary estate to A., B., and C. (his executors), on trust to permit A. to receive the rents and profits for life, and afterwards to pay certain legacies, and the residue to such of three persons, D., E., and

F., as should be living at A.'s death. The executors permitted A. to retain possession of the leasehold during her life, and D., E., and F. executed a deed (which was also executed by B. the husband of D.), and whereby they agreed to take as tenants in common: A. died. Held, that the executors had not assented to the legacies, either by permitting A. to retain possession of the leasehold, or by the execution of the deed by B., and that the executors could make a good title to the leasehold.

This information prayed, that an account might be taken of the duty payable on the legacies and residuary estate given by the will of the testator Arthur Phillip, and that the amount might be declared to be a debt due to Her Majesty from the Defendant James Potter and from John Lane, deceased; and that it might be declared, that a leasehold house at Bath, which was part of the testator's estate, was liable to the payment of the debt, and that the same, or the proceeds arising from the sale thereof, might be made available for such payment; and the same having been sold by James Potter to William Bowie, that Potter might be restrained from receiving the purchase-money, and that Bowie might be restrained from paying it to any but the Commissioners of Stamps, until the debt should be paid.

The testator, Admiral Phillip, by his will dated the 20th day of May 1814, after directing all his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses to be paid, and after giving certain specific and pecuniary legacies and an annuity, gave his leasehold house in Bath, and the appurtenances, and his residuary estate to his wife Isabella Phillip, John Lane, Osborne Standert, Thomas Sutton, and James Potter, on trust to permit his wife and her assigns to take and receive the rents, interest, and profits thereof, for and during the term of her natural life; and after her decease, he gave several pecuniary legacies of considerable amount, and the residue [165] was given to Susannah Richardson, Mary Ann Lancefield, Michael Dove, and Rebecca A. Potter, or such of them as should be living at the time of his wife's death. He appointed his wife, John Lane, Osborne Standert, Thomas Sutton, and James Potter executrix and executors of his will.

The testator died in October 1814, and the will was duly proved by Isabella Phillip, the widow, and by Lane, Standert, and Potter. Sutton, the other executor named in the will, renounced probate. Standert died in 1816.

On the 17th of February 1817 the four residuary legatees executed a deed whereby it was arranged, that they should take and enjoy their interests as tenants in common. The deed was executed by James Potter the executor and the husband of Rebecca A. Potter who was one of the residuary legatees. The widow was permitted to enjoy the house during her life. She died on the 4th day of May 1823, and thereupon John Lane, since deceased, and the Defendant James Potter became the surviving executors. After the death of the widow, the surviving executors paid the legacies which then became payable, and divided the residue, with the exception of the leasehold house, among the residuary legatees. In the month of April 1823 the leasehold house was sold, for £1800, to the Defendant Mr. Bowie, who paid a deposit of £270, and in the month of August following he was let into possession, but the contract was never completed.

The executors computed the legacy duty payable to the Crown at £1020, and was stated that they gave to their solicitor a draft for that sum, which he received from their bankers, but neglected to pay it to the [166] Stamp Office; and payment having been neglected for several years, this information was filed in the Court Exchequer for the purpose of recovering the amount due.

The decree, made on the 15th of May 1838, directed an account to be taken of the duty due to Her Majesty for the legacies and residuary effects of the testator and declared that the Defendant James Potter, as surviving executor, and Defendants Harriet Eleanor Lane and Sarah Rule, as executrices of John Lane deceased (admitting assets), were bound to pay, what, upon taking the account, should appear to be due to Her Majesty, with the informant's cost of suit, without prejudice, however, to any question between the parties entitled under the will, by whom the payment should be ultimately borne. And it was further declared, that the leasehold house was liable for the payment of the duty. And it was referred to the Master inquire whether a good title could be made to the house, under the contract with Bowie, and if so, when a good title was first shewn to Bowie; and if a good title could be shewn, it was declared that the agreement should be specifically performed; and if it should be found that a good title could not be made, certain inquiries were directed; and the Master was to be at liberty to report any special circumstances.

On the 14th of February 1842 the Master made a separate report, by which he found that a good title could not be made to the house at Bath; and to this report an exception was taken by the Defendants, the executrixes of John Lane deceased. The Master's report was founded on this:—That the house had been specifically bequeathed to the testator's widow for her life, with remainder to the residuary legatees:—that [167] the executors assented to the legacy, and that the house had thereby ceased to be assets, and had vested in the legatees, and that therefore the executors could no longer make a title thereto.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Berlow, in support of the exception, argued, that this was not the simple case of a legacy to one for life with remainder to others, but that, after the determination of the estate for life, the property was subject to legacies, which were to be raised, before the legatees in remainder could take what was given to them. That during the lifetime of the tenant for life, the property was not applicable to the payment of the legacies payable on her death; but becoming applicable, before the legatees in remainder could take, and it being the duty of the executors to raise the legacies, their assent to the gift to the widow for life, did not involve their assent to the legatees in remainder, so as to transfer to them the property or the obligation which the testator had imposed on the executors. They added also, that the fact of permitting Mrs. Phillip to enjoy the leasehold, according to the trusts of the will, did not constitute an assent to the legacy; Doe dem. v. Sturges (7 Taunt. 217), Richards v. Browne (3 Bing. N. C. 493), Doe dem. v. Tatnell (3 B. & Ad. 675); and that the deed of 1817 was executed merely for the purpose of ascertaining and defining the shares of the parties in remainder, and that it was executed by Mr. Potter, not in his character of executor, but as the husband of Mrs. Potter, who was one of such parties entitled in remainder.

That the Master was wrong in treating the bequest of the leasehold as a specific legacy, for though the [168] testator, by directing his executor to permit his wife to take the "rents," had shewn that she was to enjoy the leasehold specifically, in the state in which they were at his death, still that this did not constitute a specific legacy, the distinction between the two being clearly pointed out in Pickering v. Spring (2 Beav. 31, and 4 Myl. & Cr. 289).

Mr. Romilly, for the Attorney-General, was about to support the exception, but THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS decided that not having excepted to the report, he would not be heard against it. (See Stubbs v. Sargson, 3 Beav. 408; Bonser v. Cox, 10 Beav. 382; and Johnson v. Todd, post.)

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Wood, contra, for Mr. Bowie the purchaser. The Master is wrong in his finding, and the executors cannot make a good title without the concurrence of the legatees, in whom the property became vested by the assent of the executors. What took place after the death of the testator had the effect of converting the executors into trustees of this property for the legatees. The bequest of the leasehold constituted a specific gift of the leasehold; Goodenough v. Tremamondo (2 Beav. 10).

The assent of one of several executors was sufficient to vest the legacy in the legatee (Williams on Exors. 622), and the assent to the tenant for life was an assent to the remainder. (1 Roper on Legacies, 738.) The executors' assent to the legacy is clearly proved, first, by the deed of the 17th of February 1817, to which Mr. Potter, the executor, was a party; and, secondly, by the fact of the wife being permitted to enjoy [169] the house, and permitted to use it as her own from the time of the testator's death to her own death.

They cited 2 Williams on Executors, 846, Cheyney v. Smith (1 Leonard, 215), Wheat v. Yardley (Plowden, 539), Young v. Holmes (1 Strange, 70), and Adams v. Lindsell (3 P. Wms. 12).

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. If the executors have become trustees, they are liable for all the purposes of the will, namely, to discharge the other legacies, and to pay all legal burthens on the assets.

July 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Master reported that a good title cannot be made to the house at Bath, and his report founded upon the position that the house in question was specifically bequeathed to the testator's widow for life, with remainder to the residuary legatees:—that the executors assented to the legacy, and that thereby the house ceased to be an asset, and consequently that the title thereto is vested in the legatees, and not in the executors.

The assent is said to be proved, first, by the deed of February 1817; and secondly, by the fact of the wife being left in the enjoyment of the house, and permitted to use it as her own, from the time of the testator's death to her own death.

The deed of February 1817 was executed by the persons who were, or might become entitled to the [170] reversion or remainder of the testator's residuary estate expectant on the decease of Isabella Phillip the tenant for life, for the purpose of making the bequest to them more immediately and permanently beneficial and effectual, and to carry into effect an agreement into which they had entered, that such benefit, or chance of survivorship as was given to them by the will, should be waived, and that their contingent interests should be converted into vested interests, whether any of them should die in the lifetime of Isabella Phillip or not. This deed was executed by James Potter, one of the executors, whose wife was one of the residuary legatees, but considering the object and intent of the deed, I am of opinion that the execution of it by one of the executors, cannot be deemed an assent to the legacy, depriving the subject of it of the character of assets.

The effect of the widow having been permitted to occupy and enjoy the house as her own, during her life, is to be considered. The whole estate was subject to all debts and legacies. Some of the legacies and an annuity were immediate, and others were payable on the death of the widow. Subject to the debts, to the legacies payable immediately, and to the annuity, the widow was entitled to the income of the residuary estate for her life, and after her death, but subject to the payment of several legacies which then first became payable, the ultimate residue was given over. The duty of all the executors, which they undertook upon accepting the office, was to pay the debts and all the legacies payable on the testator's death, to ascertain the residue after such payments, give the widow the enjoyment of the residue during her life, and preserve it for the legacies which were to become payable on her death, and for the persons who were to be then entitled to the residue subject to those legacies. Upon the death of the widow, it became the duty of the surviving executors to provide for and pay the legacies which then became payable, and to pay the ultimate residue to the persons then entitled, and the executors do not appear to me to have acted otherwise than in conformity with their duty in these respects. Supposing the house to have been specifically given to the widow during her life, it was not the subject of a specific gift after her death, and at the time when she took possession, she had, besides her interest as legatee, a duty as executrix to preserve it, not merely for the legatees in remainder, but as part of the testator's assets, for payment of the legacies which became payable on her death. The other executors had the duty which they might have been compelled to perform, of permitting her to occupy the house according to the will, the further duty of executing those trusts of the will, which were to be executed after her death; and it appears to me, that by acting according to the will in giving her possession of the house, they cannot be deemed to have divested themselves of their legal power to perform that part of their duty, which the testator had imposed upon them till after her death.

For these reasons, I think that the exception must be allowed.

Memoranda, the production of which the Plaintiff was entitled to, were entered in the same book with other matters, to a discovery of which the Plaintiff was entitled, and they could not be separated or sealed up. Held, that the Defendant must suffer the inconvenience of his own act, and produce the whole.

This was the usual motion for the production of documents, admitted to be in the Defendant's possession relating to the matters in question.

The object of the suit was to wind up the affairs of a late partnership between two solicitors.

The Defendant, by his answer, admitted that he had in his possession certain books, which he had kept during the partnership, and in which he was "in the habit of making short memoranda or notes of the business daily transacted by him," account of the partnership; he also stated as follows:—"That he had also been in the habit, during the period aforesaid, of making entries in the said books or diaries, all or many of his own private and family concerns, matters, affairs, and accounts, and that the same books did, in fact, contain the private journals of the acts, remarks, observations of him the Defendant, and which he never intended for the inspection of any one besides himself; and such private, and family matters, and affairs comprised as great, or a greater portion of the said books or diaries, than the short notes or memoranda of business transactions aforesaid, and were intermixed and mixed together with the said business memoranda in the same portion of the said books allotted for each day; and it was therefore absolutely impossible to seal up the said entries of private and family matters and affairs, from the said business memoranda, or otherwise to prevent the same from being seen or perused by any person having liberty to see or peruse [173] the said business memoranda. That the said business memoranda were very short, and were now, therefore, for the most part, become unintelligible, and that the same were entered in the said diaries, only for the purpose of enabling the Defendant to enter his work therefrom into the office work books of the said last-mentioned partnership, called the "Office Work Books," and that he did, accordingly, enter full particulars of all his said business transactions in the said office work books in due course, and which said office works were open to the inspection of the said Plaintiff at the office of the Defendants, under and by virtue of the dissolution agreement."

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Glasse moved for the production of these books amongst the documents.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Hallett, contra, resisted the production on the ground of inconvenience and annoyance that it would occasion the Defendant, and urged that it was quite unnecessary for the purposes of this suit, as all the matters relating to the partnership business had been copied into the office work books. They moved to furnish verified copies of the entries relating to the partnership matters.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that he was very desirous of relieving the Defendant from the production of these private memoranda if it were possible, consistently with the rights of the Plaintiff. That the case had better stand over to see what could be done, or if the usual order could be modified.

April 15. The case was mentioned again, when it appeared impossible to separate the part relating to the partnership [174] from that relating to the Defendant's private affairs, or to seal up the latter. The whole was very closely written, and bound up in large volumes.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Glasse were again heard for the Plaintiff, and Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Hallett, for the Defendant.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (without hearing a reply) said, I feel a strong disposition to protect Mr. White from the liability of producing these documents. The question, however, is one of right, and if I cannot, on some general principle, applicable to other cases as well as this, relieve Mr. White from making a survey of those matters in these books which do not relate to the business of the partnership, the usual order must be made. If the entries relating to the business were in a separate book the Defendant would have been bound to produce it as relating to the partnership transactions. The Plaintiff being clearly entitled to the production of the entries as to the partnership if they had been kept separate, cannot be altered by the circumstance that Mr. White, for his own convenience, mixed them with his private concerns? When the case was before me on a former occasion, I was desirous of knowing if anything could be added by affidavit. Mr. White has sworn that, to the best of his knowledge and belief, there are no entries which have not been carried out in the partnership books, but it is admitted, that there is a variation between the original and the entry in the partnership books; besides this the carrying out was the act of Mr. White alone, and might have been done in a manner not approved of by the other partner, who would be entitled to compare them. I have affidavits on the other side, [175] that on a former discussion as to certain partnership transactions, the entries in the partnership books not appearing clear, it was necessary to refer to the private diary to get accurate information on the subject. I am at a loss to find any general ground on which to protect Mr. White. As he has imprudently mixed his private affairs with the partnership transactions, it is his duty to separate them, and if he cannot, he must necessarily suffer the inconvenience arising from his own act. The Defendant is entitled to the usual order for sealing up those parts not relating to the partnership transactions, and he may, if he can, avail himself of this qualification.

[175] STANLEY v. BOND. June 2, 4, 1842.

An order nisi for dissolving an injunction having been regularly served, so as to allow two clear days before the day for shewing cause, the Court refused to give the Plaintiff further time to determine whether he would shew exceptions or merits of cause, although the answer was of considerable length.

In this cause, the common injunction for want of answer had been obtained in February; and it was afterwards extended to stay trial.

The Plaintiff suddenly pressed for an answer, which was filed on the 30th of May, and on the same day the Defendant obtained and served an order nisi, to dissolve the injunction. On the 2d of June, which was the day on which, by the order, cause was to be shewn,

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Toller, for the Defendant, called upon the Plaintiff to shew cause.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wright, for the Plaintiff, stated that the answer was of great length and amounted to 300 folios, and therefore it was but reasonable that the Plaintiff should have some time to ascertain whether [176] exceptions might be taken to the answer and shewn as cause, or whether cause should be shewn on the merits on the next motion day.

Mr. G. Turner contended, that the Plaintiff was now bound to elect either to shew exceptions for cause, or to undertake to shew cause on the next day of motions upon the merits confessed by the answer. That the indulgence now asked was not warranted by the general practice of the Court; and that if, on the other hand, the bill had been of great length, no additional time would have been allowed to a Defendant to file his answer so as to save the common injunction. He argued secondly, that the circumstances of the case were not such as to entitle the Plaintiff to any indulgence. Pinheiro v. Porter (3 Swanst. 362, n.), and 2 Dan. Pr. 310, were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The order nisi seems to have been regularly served so as to allow two clear days between the service, and the day on which cause is to be shewn. (Ord. Can. 15.) The objections to the proposed delay are twofold; first, that there is no precedent for granting it, and if not, that I cannot make one; secondly, that this is not a proper case for extending the indulgence. I am inclined to think, under the circumstances, that I must decide on the first objection. I will see if there is any authority.

June 4. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, he could find no precedent for granting the indulgence which was asked by the Plaintiff. That he would not break through the established rule, and therefore could not give the Plaintiff any time to except, and that the Plaintiff must therefore undertake to shew cause on the merits. (1)

(1) The Vice-Chancellor of England, as I have been informed, made a similar decision in Cresy v. Beavan, 9th June 1842; stating that to grant the application would be to act inconsistently with the terms of the order nisi, by which the injunction was to be dissolved, unless some cause was shewn on a particular day.

gift to be divided "among poor pious persons male or female, old or infirm, as the executors see fit, not omitting large and sick families if of good character," is a valid charitable bequest; the word "poor" extending through the whole sentence. The trustees have an option to apply funds to purposes which, though liberal or benevolent, are not such as are in this Court understood to be charitable, the trust cannot be executed here. Thus, the Court cannot execute a trust for private charity. A bill was filed by one of several trustees of a charitable gift, the validity of which was disputed, against the co-trustees, who had refused to act, and the next of kin of the testator, to have it executed. The trustees had accepted the trust. Held, that the proceeding was not improper, and that the Plaintiff was not bound to apply to the Attorney-General to proceed by information.

John Wilkinson, the testator in this cause, by his will, dated the 20th of April 1833, directed part of his estate to be laid out in the funds, and he thereupon proved and expressed himself as follows:—"And that my executors hereafter named, their heirs and assigns do receive the interest thereof, half-yearly, and divide it among poor pious persons male or female, old or infirm, as they see fit, not omitting large and sick families if of good character." The testator made a codicil, dated the 29th of July 1833, but he did not thereby alter the nature of the bequest in his will to poor pious persons. After the testator's death, doubts arose respecting the legal effect and construction of the will and [178] codicil, particularly as to the effect or sufficiency of the charitable bequest "to poor pious persons," and also, particularly, as to the liability of the estate to make up the deficiency of the estate to pay a legacy of £1000 bequeathed by the codicil, and two other legacies of £10,000 and £2000. Counsel were taken on the subject, which were in favour of the sufficiency of the charitable bequest, but considered that the fund made charitable by the will, was not sufficient to make good any deficiency of the residue of the testator's estate to pay legacies. Under these circumstances, and to remove those doubts, and to prevent delay and expense in giving full effect to the charitable and other trusts of the will, the widow and next of kin of the testator executed deeds dated in September 1833; and thereby confirmed the will and codicil, and released their interest in the estate; to the effect that the charitable bequest and the other trusts of the will and codicil might be performed and carried into execution by William Nash, John Morley, and Jacob Morley, as the executors and trustees thereof: "it being the clear intent and desire of all the parties, to enable the said William Nash, John Morley, and Jacob Morley to apply, dispose of, and distribute the said personal estate and effects (after paying debts), upon the trusts and in manner expressed, declared, and directed, by the will and codicil, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, and as the testator, as in and by the will and codicil was expressed and declared, and had ascertained and agreed upon, and consented to, as in the deed mentioned; any construction of law or equity to the contrary thereof, in anywise, notwithstanding."

After the execution of these deeds, the funds were invested, and for some time lay upon the trusts [179] mentioned in the will. Afterwards, the next of kin of the testator raised a claim to the residue, and insisted, that the bequest in the will was not a charitable bequest to charitable purposes, and that the testator's next of kin were entitled to the whole thereof. The Plaintiff Nash, one of the executors, alleging himself to be unable to apply the dividends for the charitable purposes in the will mentioned, and being unable to do so, by reason of the refusal of Jacob Wilkinson, a trustee and the next of kin, filed this bill against his co-executor and the next of kin to the directions of the Court.

G. Turner and Mr. Gaselee, for the Plaintiff.

J. Pemberton and Mr. J. Humphry, for Thomas Nash and Jane his wife, who was the daughter and one of the next of kin of the testator.

This bequest as a charitable gift, is invalid, and there is a resulting trust in favor of the next of kin. To constitute a good charitable bequest, the objects must be exclusively of a public nature, for if the trustees have a discretion to apply any undivided portion to private individuals, or for private purposes of benevolence the bequest would be invalid; as the Court could not, in such a case, interfere with the execution of the trust, or correct a mal-administration. If property be given partly for public charity and partly for private purposes, and the two objects are connected, the whole gift is void. In Morice v. The Bishop of Durham (9 Ves. 399), it was held that a bequest, in trust for such objects of benevolence and liberality as the trustee in his own discretion should most approve, could not be supported as a charitable legacy, and was therefore a trust for the next of kin. Sir W. [180] Grant there said, "The question is not whether the trustee may not apply it upon purposes strictly charitable, but whether he is bound so to apply it." The decision of Sir W. Grant was afterwards affirmed by Lord Eldon. (10 Ves. 522.) In James v. Allen (3 Mer. 17) the bequest was to be applied and disposed of to such benevolent purposes as the trustees in their integrity and discretion should agree on, and Sir William Grant held it void, saying, "If the property might, consistently with the will, be applied to other than strictly charitable purposes, the trust is too indefinite for the Court to execute." Again, in Ommanney v. Butcher (Turn. & Russ. 260), Sir Thomas Plumer held that a bequest for private charity was void; and he said, "A trust to be carried into execution by the Court must be of such a nature that it can be under the control of the Court; if the trust cannot be ascertained, the Court cannot see to the execution of it; it being too general and indefinite." The case of Horde v. Lord Suffolk (2 Myl. & K. 59) has been considered inconsistent with Ommanney v. Butcher, but the authority of the latter case is established by the decision of Sir C. C. Pepys in the subsequent case of Wicks v. Kershaw (cited 1 Keen, 227, 232, and 5 Cl. & F. 111, n.). There, a testator directed his trustees to apply the residue "to and for such benevolent charitable and religious purposes, as they in their discretion should think most advantageous and beneficial." It was held, that the gift was invalid as a charitable gift, and that the property belonged to the testator's representatives. So in Ellis v. Selby (7 Sim. 352, 353, 2 Myl. & Cr. 286), where the gift was "for such charitable or other purposes," and the trustees should think fit, it was held that the trust was so indefinite that it failed, and the fund fell into the [181] residue. On this point they also cited In re Will (1 Cr. M. & R. 143), and argued that, under the terms of this gift, the executors might distribute the fund amongst any "large families of good character," or amongst any private individuals answering that description, without reference to their peculiar circumstances; and the discretion therefore being too large, that the fund belonged to the next of kin.

As to the deeds of 1833, they contended that they merely confirmed the gift under the will, and could not operate to make a gift valid which would otherwise be invalid for the same objections to the nature of the trust would still apply.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Simpson, for Jacob Wilkinson, one of the executors, contended that the gift was valid, and that the fund belonged to the next of kin of the testator.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Dickson, for John Morley.

Mr. Wray, for the Attorney-General, insisted that the construction contained in the will was not the proper one. That the plain meaning of the will was, that the fund was to be divided between "poor pious persons," but not "only large and sick families of good character," so that it was a necessary qualification that the objects to be poor, and that consequently none but poor objects could partake of the benefit of the charity.

He argued also that the executors and next of kin had bound themselves by the deeds, and were wholly excluded thereby; that the trustees held upon trusts for the poor and not beneficially for themselves, and that therefore [182] either the Crown was entitled to the fund, Middleton v. Spicer (1 B. C. C. 201), or that it was distributable amongst such objects as might be directed by sign manual. He cited the 43rd Statute to shew that there were many public objects which were considered charitable in the sense that this Court would see to their performance. He also objected to the frame of the record, and argued that the Plaintiff having accepted the trusts, he had no right to come by a bill of his own, against his co-trustees and the Attorney-General.

have the validity of his trust contested, but that he ought to have applied to the Attorney-General for his sanction to file an information.

Shelford on Mortmain, 60; Waldo v. Caley (16 Ves. 206); Horde v. Lord Suffolk 2 Myl. & K. 59; Johnston v. Swann (3 Mad. 457, and Ambler (Blunt's edition), 85, n.); and In re Franklin (3 Y. & J. 544), were cited.

June 10. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is, whether a gift "to poor pious persons male or female, old or infirm, as the trustees see fit, not omitting large and sick families if of good character," is a valid charitable gift, and I am of opinion that it is. If the words were such that this Court had not authority to compel the trustees to apply the funds to purposes strictly charitable, or technically so denominated, the trust could not be maintained; James v. Allen (3 Mer. 19). The question in all such cases is, whether it is not only the duty of the trustee, but a duty the performance of which will be enforced by this Court, to apply the whole fund to purposes which are here called [183] charitable. If there be any option in the trustee to apply the funds to purposes, which though liberal or benevolent, are not such as are in this Court understood to be charitable, the trust cannot be executed here. Moreover, if it be expressly declared, that the fund is to be distributed in private charity, it has been held that the Court cannot execute such a trust. The testator, in such a case, has shewn that the party to whom the control of the fund is given, is not to have the fund beneficially, and he seems to have referred the distribution to private judgment, which this Court cannot control.

In the present case, the argument has been, that from the words used, the testator must be deemed to have meant a private and not a public charity, and a private charity being incapable of execution in this Court, the next of kin are entitled. In this, as in all other cases of the like kind, the difficulty, if any there be, arises from the ambiguous application of words. The expressions "public" and "private" are not used in precisely the same sense when we speak of public and private institutions, as they are, when we speak of distributing funds in public or in private charity. In the case of The Attorney-General v. Pearce (2 Atkins, 87), Lord Hardwicke has stated it to be "almost impossible to say which charities," i.e. (as I understand it), which charitable institutions "are public and which are private in their nature," and in the argument of this case no one has attempted to state the difference between a public and a private charity by any accurate definition. Here the objects are distinctly stated to be poor persons, and a gift to poor persons is a valid charitable gift. The gift here is to poor pious persons, and the gift is not less charitable gift, because the objects are to be pious, male [184] or female, old or infirm. No particular persons are indeed specified, and the gift is to be among such of the described objects as the trustees shall see fit; and Lord Hardwicke says: "Where testators have not any particular person in their contemplation, but leave to the discretion of a trustee to choose out the objects, though such person is private, and each particular object may be said to be private, yet, in the extensiveness of the benefit accruing from them, they may very properly be called public charities. A sum to be disposed of by A. B., and his executors, at their discretion, among poor workmen, is of this kind." (2 Atk. 88.)

It was argued, that the word "poor" did not extend through the whole of the gift, and the direction "not to omit large and sick families if of good character" did not constitute a valid charitable gift. It appears to me, however, that by this the testator only meant to signify, that by the word "persons" he did not mean to restrict the trustees to individuals only, but to enable them to apply the property for the benefit of poor families, and I think it clear that the word "poor" extends through the whole sentence; and I am therefore of opinion that this is a valid and valid charitable bequest.

An objection was taken to the form of proceedings in this case, and there seems to be some ground for it on the part of those who make it; but I own I cannot come to the conclusion that a trustee in the situation of this Plaintiff has not a right to maintain such a bill as this. He alleges that he is desirous of carrying this trust into execution, and that he is prevented from doing so by the refusal of his co-trustee. In such a state of circumstances, though I conceive that it would have [185] been better for him to have applied to the Attorney-General, and to have informed him of the difficulty in which he was placed, in order that the trust might be carried into execution at the instance of the officer of the Crown, still I cannot say he was bound to depend upon the Attorney-General in that respect, or that he has not a right to come here. Although there is no suggestion that the Attorney-General did, in this case, refuse his sanction, yet he might have done so, and I can hardly hold that this suit was improperly instituted without placing trustees like these more in the discretion and power of the Attorney-General than they ought to be. I cannot therefore say that this suit was improperly instituted.

As to the question, whether there is to be a reference to the Master to approve of a scheme, I should certainly direct a scheme if the Attorney-General desired it, and thought it proper or useful in this case to direct one. If he does not I must order the Defendants, the trustees, to concur with the Plaintiff in executing the trust. There seems to be no difficulty in carrying the trusts into execution, as the trustees seem already to have executed the trusts subsequently to the execution of the deeds.(1)

[186] PATERSON v. LONG. May 25, 1842.

Two houses, held under one lease, were sold in separate lots, and it was stipulated that the purchasers should be parties to each other's assignment. Held, that the purchaser of Lot 2 was not a necessary party to a suit for specific performance against the purchaser of Lot 1.

This cause came before the Court on general demurrer.

Two houses, held under one lease at a rent of £8, were sold by auction, in separate lots, and by the conditions of sale it was stipulated that the purchasers of the two lots should be parties to each other's assignment, and covenant to pay the proportion of the rent allotted to each, and to indemnify each other against the same, and also give mutual powers of distress and entry, upon and over the premises purchased by each, as an indemnity against the payment of more than the due proportion of the original rent of £8 payable by each purchaser.

One of the houses comprised in Lot 1 was purchased by the Defendant Long, and the other by another person. Long having refused to complete his purchase of the grounds which it is unnecessary to state, the vendor filed this bill against him alone for a specific performance. The bill charged that the purchaser of Lot 2 was ready and willing to concur in all proper assignments of Lot 1 to the Defendant.

The Defendant filed a general demurrer.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Barlow, in support of the demurrer, amongst other objections, insisted that the purchaser of Lot 2 ought to be made a party to the suit, as he was interested in the contract, and was bound to be a party to the assignment.

[187] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Beavan, contra, contended he was not a necessary party, and could not properly be made a party, as he was not a party to the Defendant's contract. (Wood v. White, 4 Myl. & Cr. 460.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. If there is to be a specific performance of the contract, the purchaser of Lot 2 will be bound to concur in the assignment; but is it necessary that he should be a party to all the litigation between the vendor and the purchaser of Lot 1? I think not; besides this, the bill alleges that he is ready to concur. Although it might, by possibility, become necessary hereafter to compel him to join in the assignment, still, I see no reason for making him a party to a suit until that necessity arises.

The demurrer must be overruled.

being entitled to a moiety of an estate, covenanted to settle it on himself for life, with remainder to his wife and children. He afterwards acquired the other moiety, and mortgaged the entirety to B., who, having no notice, obtained priority over the wife and children of A. By the will of B. the mortgage was given to C. for life, with remainder to A. absolutely. A. died, and C., by virtue of the mortgage, received the rents of the entirety to the disappointment of the wife and children of A. C. afterwards died. Held, that the widow and children of A. had no equity against the general creditors of A. to have a lien on the second moiety of the estate, to recoup the loss sustained by them by C.'s receiving the rents of the moiety of the estate bound by the settlement, from the death of A. to the death of C., but that they must come in as specialty creditors under the covenant. Mortgagee filing a bill for the benefit of himself and the other creditors of the deceased, is entitled to payment of his mortgage-money out of the mortgaged estate, before payment of the costs of suit.

The second of these two suits was filed on behalf of the creditors of Richard Aldridge. The first suit was instituted by his children, to have the benefit of articles entered into by him on his marriage.

It appeared that Richard Aldridge and his brother James Aldridge were equally tied to an estate called Woodmacotes, which, in 1792, they mortgaged for £1200 Mr. Lee.

Richard Aldridge, being about to marry, executed articles of settlement, whereby he covenanted, within three months, to convey his moiety of this estate to trustees, free from incumbrances, in trust for himself for life, with remainder to his wife for life with remainder to the children of the marriage.

In 1808 James Aldridge sold and conveyed his moiety of the estate to Richard, on the 5th of October 1808 Richard, in violation of the marriage articles, mortgaged the entirety of the estate to James for securing £1000.

In November 1810 James died, having by his will given his real and personal estate, upon trust [189] for his wife Anne for life, and after her death subject, as to his personal estate, to some legacies, in trust as to the whole of his real and personal estate for his brother Richard Aldridge.

At the death of James, Richard was indebted to him in the sum of £1000, secured by a mortgage, and in the further sum of £2000, for which he held no security. An arrangement was afterwards entered into, by means of which the trustees of James gave the first mortgage for £1200, and with it the legal estate, and Richard executed to the mortgagee of the entirety of the estate, for securing to them the sum of £4200, the aggregate amount of the first mortgage of £1200, and the two sums of £1000 and £2000 due from Richard to the estate of James.

Neither James himself nor his trustees had any notice of the articles, and they were consequently unfettered thereby. The consequence was, that the widow of James, who was entitled to an estate for life in the mortgage for £4200 secured upon the entirety of the estate, had the benefit of this security from 1810 to her death, which had recently happened, and in respect thereof, she received during her life the amount of the rents of both moieties of the estate in question.

Richard died on the 5th of September 1818 without having performed the covenant entered into in the marriage articles. Upon his death his widow and children would, if they had duly performed the marriage articles and had not mortgaged the estate, become entitled to the receipt of a moiety of the rents and profits of the estate; but in 1818 to the death of James's widow in 1841, their rights had been defeated by the paramount claims of the widow of James.

[190] The mortgage for £4200, though valid as against the marriage articles of James, had recently, by the death of James's widow, and under the limitations in the articles, fallen into and now formed part of the estate of Richard.

Some time after the death of Richard a bill was filed on behalf of his creditors, to obtain payment of their debts; and two of the children of James also filed another bill for the purpose of having the benefit of the marriage articles, and in that suit was declared that they were entitled to have the benefit of the settlement. Under these circumstances,

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Randell, for parties claiming under the articles, now contended, that they had, as against the general creditors of Richard an equity to have the mortgage for £4200 kept on foot for the purpose of giving them a lien on the second moiety of the estate, to the extent of the amount of the rents of the first moiety, which through the breach of trust of Richard had been received by the widow of James, to the disappointment of the persons entitled thereto under the marriage articles.

Mr. Kindersley, for the creditors of James, contra, contended, that the parties claiming under the articles had no lien on the other moiety of the estate, and that they must come in, under the covenant, pari passu with the other creditors.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Busk, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Paton, for other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There is some complication in the facts of this case, and I have certainly had some difficulty in clearly comprehending the effect of those facts. [After stating the above circumstances his Lordship continued.] It has been declared, that the widow and the children of Richard were entitled to the benefit of the articles, or to the first moiety of the property, the estate of which has now, by the death of the widow of James, become available for the purposes of the settlement. The widow, therefore, of Richard, is now entitled in her life to receive the rents and profits of that moiety, and after her death the children will be entitled in remainder. The legal estate of that moiety is, therefore, not applicable to the purposes of the settlement; but it appears that the mortgage executed by Richard, comprised not only the moiety of Woodmacotes, which was subject to the articles, but also the other moiety of that property which, at a subsequent period, Richard purchased from James; and the widow of Richard now claims to be entitled to a lien upon that other moiety of Woodmacotes for the loss she has sustained. It is said that the mortgage being made for the benefit of Richard, and subsisting as a valid mortgage at the time of the death of James, when it was disposed of by his will, and being afterwards continued for the benefit of the widow of James, it is now to be continued for the benefit of the widow of Richard, who, by the execution of the mortgage, enabled the widow of James to intercept the rents of the widow of Richard under the settlement, and, for a time, wholly to deprive her of the rents of a moiety of the estate, to which under the articles she was entitled.

Now what happened with respect to that moiety? The mortgage debt was a debt of the estate of James. By the effect of the will of James that debt, as regards the interest of Richard, ceased to be a debt. It was given to Richard, who by virtue of the mortgage was [192] a debtor, but by virtue of the bequest, became at the time a creditor. How is that debt to be kept up for the purpose of answering the claim? I apprehend that, if it could be done in any way, it would be, by having the mortgage, in the first instance, in some way distinguished from all the other property as well of Richard as of James. In one sense, and in one sense only, is it distinguished from the property of James, because, if I understand the matter, the other moiety of James has been administered, and by virtue of the mortgage, the property has been heretofore enjoyed by his widow. On the other hand, the mortgage money received by Richard was never kept separate or apart: it constituted a debt due from him, and not a sum of money received by him and distinguished from the other part of the estate, in such a way that a lien could be established upon it for the benefit of the widow.

Under these circumstances, I confess, though I have been a good deal affected by the ingenuity of the argument employed in the discussion of the case, which has very plausible reasons for it, and though I have felt a disposition, which, I think, everybody must feel to establish the claim if it could be affected, I cannot see a mode of getting at a distinct part of the property of James, so as to make it subject to this lien for the benefit of the widow of Richard.

The estate of Richard will be administered according to the ordinary rules.

his and every other part of his property is subject to debts and claims which may be made upon it.

The best opinion I can form upon this is, that I do not think this lien established, and the widow must therefore come in as a specialty creditor only, in re-[193]-spect of the violation of her rights under the marriage articles.

The Court, as I have been informed, decided another point in the second suit, the master of the Rolls holding, that where a creditor's bill was filed by a mortgagee who was also a creditor by simple contract, he was entitled to payment of his mortgage money out of the mortgaged estate, before the payment of any part of the costs of the suit.

Greenwood v. Taylor (1 R. & M. 185), Mason v. Bogg (2 My. & Cr. 443), and White v. The Bishop of Peterborough (Jacob, 402. And see Tipping v. Power, 1 Hare, 405), were referred to.

decree made in the absence of a material party, but without prejudice to his rights and interests.

B. executed a voluntary settlement of real estate in favour of his wife and children, and afterwards contracted to sell it for valuable consideration. The purchaser filed a bill for specific performance against the vendor, his wife, children, and the trustees in whom the legal estate was vested. One of the children was out of the jurisdiction, and did not appear. The Court decreed a specific performance, and ordered the trustees to convey to the purchaser, saving the rights of the absent party.

In 1812 Edward Selater Busby, being seized of some freehold property at Bethnal Green, conveyed it by a voluntary post-nuptial settlement, to trustees, in trust for his wife Janet Busby, and afterwards for the children of their marriage, of whom there were two, viz., David William Busby and another son.

In 1834 Edward Selater Busby contracted to sell the same property to the Plaintiff fr. Willats. The trustees, however, who had the legal estate, refusing to convey the property, the Plaintiff, in consequence, filed [194] this bill for a specific performance of the contract against Edward Selater Busby, and wife, and their two children, and the trustees of the settlement.

David W. Busby was out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and could not be found as to be served with process (3 Beav. 420). The cause was now brought to a hearing without having David W. Busby before the Court.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. James Russell, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. K. Parker, for the wife of the settlor. The suit cannot proceed in the absence of David W. Busby, whose interest is sought to be directly affected by the decree. In Browne v. Blount (2 Russ. & Myl. 83) the bill was filed by judgment creditor of Sir Charles Blount, for the purpose of obtaining equitable execution against freehold estates which were vested in trustees, upon certain trusts, under which Sir C. Blount was entitled to the rents during his life. When the cause came on to be heard, Sir C. Blount, who was abroad, had not appeared, but the trustees and the other parties who were interested in the estates, were before the Court, but Mr. J. Leach, M.R., decided that the cause could not proceed in the absence of Sir C. Blount.

In Lowry v. Fulton (9 Sim. 104) the Vice-Chancellor would not allow a suit instituted by one of three residuary legatees, for an administration of the estate, and to charge two of the trustees with breaches of trust, to proceed in the absence of one of such residuary legatees.

[195] So, in Lyde v. Hale (13th May 1835), Sir C. C. Pepys refused to proceed to hear a cause, because the party principally sought to be affected by the decree was out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and did not appear.

Mr. Bethell and Mr. Bacon, for the brother of David W. Busby, and Mr. Campbell, for the representative of the surviving trustees, supported the objection.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley and Mr. James Russell, contrâ. David W. Busby is not an active, but a passive party, and the Court can therefore proceed in his absence. (Redesdale, 164.) Both in Broune v. Blount and Lyde v. Hale the person interested was not before the Court. Here there are persons similarly interested present, and who, in defending their own right, will protect the interest of the absent party. We admit that the rights of David W. Busby cannot be bound by the proceedings in his absence, and that he may hereafter impeach everything done in this suit. In cases of this description the Court does the best it can; surely it cannot refuse to administer justice between two parties because a third is absent. Take the case of numerous annuities charged on the testator's real estate: could the Court refuse administration for payment of the debts of the testator merely because a party entitled to a £5 annuity was absent? The Court can adjudicate on the rights of an absent person; but that will not prevent a decision on the questions between those who are present.

The 40th General Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 176) enables the Court to proceed, saving the rights of the absent parties.

[196] [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The objection is not that David is not a party to the suit, for he has been made a Defendant on the record; but the objection is this, that he is not present to defend his interest.]

Where a class of persons are interested, the Court will determine the question of the absence of some of them; Caldecott v. Caldecott (Cr. & Ph. 183. And see 1 M. & C. p. 545, and Harvey v. Harvey, 4 Beav. 215).

Mr. Tinney, in reply. The supposition that in Broune v. Blount and Lyde v. Hale the only person interested was absent, does not reconcile the authorities; for in Lyde v. Hale (2 Bro. C. C. 276) the heir of the mortgagor was not the only person interested, as the first mortgagee was before the Court; and even in that case the Court said that it could not consider the heir, who was sought to be foreclosed, a passive party. The Plaintiff seeks directly to affect the interest of the absent party by getting the legal estate from a trustee for David W. Busby. The General Order of August 1841 does not apply; for David W. Busby is a party, and therefore an objection could not be taken by the answer, and also for this reason, that when the decree the Plaintiff has got the legal estate, the rights of the absent parties can be saved.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that the objection was of so much importance that he would look at the authorities on the subject; but he should certainly strive to get over the difficulty.

Dec. 6. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] referred to Mr. Pleading (4th edit. 164), in which it is stated:—"When a person [197] who is to be a party is out of the jurisdiction of the Court, that fact being stated in the bill, and admitted by the Defendants, or proved at the hearing, is, in most cases a sufficient reason for not bringing him before the Court; and the Court will proceed with the bill against the other parties, as far as circumstances will permit."

He also referred to Smith v. The Hibernian Mine Company (1 Sch. & Lef. 2) in which Lord Redesdale states as follows:—"The ordinary practice of Courts of Equity in England when one party is out of the jurisdiction and other parties within it is to charge the fact in the bill, that such a person is out of the jurisdiction, and the Court proceeds against the other parties, notwithstanding he is not before the Court; it cannot proceed to compel him to do any act; but it can proceed against the other parties, and, if the disposition of the property is in the power of the other parties, the Court may act upon it;" and also to what is stated by Lord Eldon in Codrington v. Thompson (16 Ves. 325). "The strict rule is, that all persons materially interested in the subject of the suit, however numerous, ought to be parties, that there be a complete decree between all parties having material interests. But that, as a general rule, established for the convenient administration of justice, must be adhered to, in cases, to which, consistently with practical convenience, it is an exception of application. Accordingly there are several well-known cases of exception,"

His Lordship also adverted to the case of Walley v. Walley (1 Vern. 484), where the report says, that it was upon a motion, ordered that the Plaintiff might proceed against the other Defendants, without prejudice, for not bring[198]-ing his father's executor whose breach of trust made the suit necessary) to a hearing, and the Plaintiff had a decree without bringing his father to a hearing; and to Rogers v. Bumb (200), where the Plaintiffs moved the Court, that they might hear the case without Charles (a son of the testator, a freeman of London, and alleged to have been fully advanced) he being beyond sea, and if it appeared he had any right, might come before the deputy on the account; and, though no precedent of such allowance before the Court, C. B. Gilbert and Price, contra, Page gave leave to the cause without Charles. He referred also to The Attorney-General v. Baliol (9 Mod. 407), where the decree was made in the absence of the College of St. John, and it was made subject to such further alterations and amendments as might be properly required; and this Lord Hardwicke afterwards thought they might have, for the reason that as Glasgow could not be a party by compulsion, that nevertheless it might apply by petition to have any amendments in the decree.

His Lordship concluded that the objection, in this form, was not in the nature of a preliminary objection, and that he must hear the cause and see what, under the circumstances, was right, just and convenient to be done.

The cause was then heard again upon the merits, and was argued by the same counsel.

Jan. 15, 1842. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after referring to a decision on the statute of 27 Eliz. c. 4, which had decided that a voluntary settlement was fraudulent within that Act, and stating that he had no authority to consider policy or correctness of this decision, and after disposing of some other grounds of defence, said :—[199] The great difficulty in this case is in respect of the absence of a material party, and I cannot help thinking, that it will be a difficult thing to make any decree at all. One of the parties interested under the settlement is not present, and the Court would be extremely reluctant to proceed in his absence: but finally comes to a matter of convenience.

Should the Court refrain from doing that which appears to be just, or should the Plaintiff be deprived of his rights, merely because a party interested is accidentally absent? On the other hand, can the Court give the Plaintiff his rights without injury to the absent party?

Is the right to a specific performance was to be declared against the settlor alone, would be no difficulty; but on this bill, can there be a decree except as against parties entitled to resist it? Is it according to the practice of the Court to declare against all except one, who is absent? and if the Court had the power to make a conveyance, is it right to introduce into the decree a reservation of a right to absent parties to come in and dispute it? The absent party will not be bound by proceedings; but then the legal estate will be parted with, and might be conveyed to a person taking without notice, but if such person claimed under a decree, making a reservation of the rights of the absent party, the objection would in measure be guarded against. The Plaintiff must consider whether he would make a decree in the form I allude to.

Mr. Pemberton, on the part of the Plaintiff, assented.

The cause stood over for judgment.

Feb. 10. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. When this cause was brought on for judgment, an objection was taken that David William Busby, one of the [200] Defendants, was out of the jurisdiction of the Court, and that in his absence no decree could be made against any of the Defendants. The objection being overruled, the case was heard, and it appeared to me that the Plaintiff was entitled to a specific performance of the agreement stated in the bill; but that the decree should be made so as to leave to the absent Defendant a right of claiming any right or interest he might have in the property; and on consideration I am of opinion that the decree ought to contain a clause stating it to be without prejudice to any right or interest in or to the premises comprised in the settlement, which may be claimed by the Defendant David William Busby. The decree will therefore be as follows :—

That the agreement in the pleadings mentioned, dated the 19th day of March 1834, be specifically performed and carried into execution. And upon the Plaintiff or the Defendants Rushbridge and Harcourt, the legal personal representatives of the late Plaintiff Henry Thomas Willats, paying the sum of £3800, the residue of the purchase-money, it is ordered that the representatives of the surviving trustee of the indenture dated the 12th day of February 1812, and all other necessary parties as the Master shall direct, convey the said premises to the Plaintiff. And it is ordered that the Master do settle the conveyance in case the parties differ. And in case the Master shall find that the said David William Busby is a necessary party to such conveyance, and the said David William Busby shall not come in to execute the same, it is ordered that this decree be without prejudice to any right or interest which may be claimed by the said David William Busby in or to the premises comprised in the said indenture of the 12th day of February 1812. (NOTE.—also Pawlet v. The Bishop of Lincoln, 2 Atk. 296, and Darwent v. Walton, 3 Atk. 51.)

[S. C. 11 L. J. Ch. 338; 6 Jur. 248. As to remoteness, see Locke v. Lamb, 1865 L. R. 4 Eq. 379.]

A testator gave his widow the power of appointing his residuary estate. By her will after reciting the power, she declared that, in pursuance of the power and other powers enabling her, for the purpose of disposing of her husband's and own estate, she made her will as follows:—She then directed her debts to be paid, and gave some legacies; and as to all the rest, &c., “of her personal estate, bequeathed the same to A. and B. upon trust, &c. Held, that the widow (who died in 1832) had thereby appointed the residuary estate of her husband.

A gift of personalty to trustees for A. for life, and after his death in trust for the children of A. “as they severally attained twenty-five years,” the income to be applied during their respective minorities by their guardian for their maintenance, &c., with a gift over in case no child of A. should live to attain twenty-five. Held, that the gift was to be vested, and not too remote.

The testator, James Davies, by his will, dated the 18th day of September 1824, after directing payment of all his debts, and funeral and testamentary expenses, giving divers pecuniary legacies, bequeathed all the residue of his estate, both real and personal, unto his wife, Ann Davies, deceased, her heirs, executors, and administrators absolutely, and he appointed his wife and William Powell his executors.

[202] On the 20th of September 1824 the testator made the following codicil to his will:—“Whereas by my will as aforesaid, bearing date the 18th day of September in the year 1824, I have directed my wife, Ann Davies, to be my residuary legatee in case she the said Ann Davies dies without making a will after my decease, the remainder of all my property, whatsoever it may consist in, whether bank, consolidated funded property, houses, furniture, plate, books, linen, wearing apparel, &c., to be equally divided, share and share alike, among my brother William Davies and his children, as named—William Davies junior, James Davies junior, Martha Ann Davies, and Mary Davies, or to as many of the aforesaid children as may be living at the decease of the said Ann Davies. Likewise I direct and appoint William Davies to be my residuary legatee instead of my wife, Ann Davies, and the forenamed William Powell.”

The will and codicil were unattested.

The testator died in December 1824. His wife, who survived him, made her will dated in April 1832, and thereby, after reciting that the testator, James Davies, her late husband, did by his aforesaid will and codicil appoint her his residuary legatee and direct in case of her death, without making a will after his decease, that her nephew, William Davies the younger, should be his residuary legatee, she the said Ann Davies, in pursuance of the power and authority given and reserved to her and by the will of James Davies the elder, and of all other powers and authorities in anywise enabling her, did, for the purpose of disposing of all the estate of her late husband, James Davies, over which she had any disposing power, and also her own estate and effects whatsoever and wheresoever, make her last will and testament in manner [203] following (that is to say) :— First, she appointed James Fisher and William Powell executors of her said will ; and after directing payment of her debts, and funeral and testamentary expenses, she bequeathed to James Davies, the younger, a legacy of £2000 three per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, and to James Fisher and William Powell the sum of £4000 three per cent. consolidated Bank annuities upon trusts therein mentioned, for Martha Ann West and her children as therein mentioned ; and after bequeathing several annuities and legacies, and directing the executors to appropriate so much stock out of her residuary estate as would be sufficient, in point of yearly income, to answer the same annuities, and directing that at the decease of the respective annuitants the same should sink into and form part of her residuary estate, she bequeathed to James Fisher and William Powell her three leasehold messuages and premises, situate in Park Street, Islington, for all her estate therein, upon trust to sell the same, and apply the produce upon the same trusts as she thereafter declared concerning her residuary personal estate ; and as to all the residue of her personal estate whatsoever, and wheresoever, and of what nature or kind not specifically bequeathed or disposed of by her will, she bequeathed the same to James Fisher and William Powell, upon trust to sell, get in and convert into money the whole of her personal estate, or such part thereof as should not consist of any in the funds or on Government, or real, or leasehold securities, and out of the proceeds thereof to pay her debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, and pecuniary legacies, and make the appropriations necessary for answering the said annuities. Upon trust to invest the clear surplus monies arising from her residuary estate, and the proceeds of the said leasehold houses, in manner therein mentioned. She directed her trustees to stand possessed of her residuary estate, including the proceeds of her said leasehold houses, and the investments thereof, upon and during the life of William Davies the younger, to pay the income thereof unto William Davies the younger, and from and after his decease in trust for the children of the said William Davies the younger, as they severally attained the age of twenty-five years, equally to be divided between them if more than one, and if but one, then the whole to such one child, the income to be applied during their respective minorities to the guardian for the time being of the said children or child for their respective support, maintenance, and education. And in case no child of the said William Davies should live to attain the age of twenty-five years, then in trust for the children of the said James Davies the younger, as they severally attained the age of twenty-five years, equally to be divided between them if more than one, and if but one, the whole to such one child, the income to accumulate in the intermediate time, and be paid with the principal. And in case no child of the said James Davies the younger should live to attain the age of twenty-five years, then in trust for the children of Martha Ann West, as they severally attained the age of twenty-five years, equally to be divided between them if more than one, and if but one, the whole to such one child, the income to accumulate in the intermediate time, and be paid with the principal ; with a limitation in case of Martha Ann West having no child who should live to attain the age of twenty-five years.

The testatrix afterwards made a codicil to her will, dated the 6th of May 1832, whereby she gave certain specific parts of her personal estate to the persons therein named, but she did not otherwise revoke or alter her will.

[204] The testatrix died in June 1832, and William Davies the younger having died in 1834, this bill was filed by his children, insisting that they took vested interests in the residuary estate bequeathed by the will of Ann Davies, including the residuary estate of the testator : that they were entitled to the payment of the same at twenty-five, and to have the income applied for their maintenance during minority.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Keene, for the Plaintiffs, contended that the gift to them, given "as they severally attained the age of twenty-five years," was never a valid vested interest, the dividends being payable to them in the meantime ; see Barnes (3 Mer. 335), Jones v. Mackilwain (1 Russ. 221), Murray v. Addenbrook (10 M. & Cr. 407), Bland v. Williams (3 Myl. & K. 411), Vivian v. Mills (1 Beavan, 315), W. v. Burgh (2 Beavan, 221), Saunders v. Vautier (4 Beavan, 115, and Cr. & Ph. 240).

They argued also, that William Davies the younger was the substituted residuary legatee, and took in preference of the widow.

Mr. Hardy, for the representatives of William Davies the younger. In no case can the representatives of Mrs. Davies be entitled, for the testator appointed William Davies junior "his residuary legatee instead of his wife."

Mr. Chandless and Mr. Hoare, for William Powell, one of the executors of the widow, and the surviving executor of the testator.

The testatrix took an absolute interest, and not a life interest with a power; Hales v. Margerum (3 Ves. 299), Bull v. [206] Kingston (1 Mer. 315). The limitation over is simply void as inconsistent with the previous absolute estate; Ross v. Ross (1 Jac. & W. 154). The power was well executed, it having been referred to Standen v. Standen (2 Ves. jun. 589), and the testator's property passes under the widow's will; Bourn v. Gibbs (1 R. & M. 614), Harrison v. Foreman (5 Ves. 208); and it is subject to her debts. The executor is not interested in the validity of the gift to the children.

Mr. Roupell and Mr. Bilton, for the executors of James Davies, and for his child. The power given to Mrs. Davies was not duly executed; Jones v. Tucker (2 Mer. 533), Roach v. Haynes (8 Ves. 587), Lewis v. Lewellyn (Turn. & R. 104), Napier v. Napier (1 Sim. 28, and see Hughes v. Turner, 3 Myl. & K. 666). Though she refers to the power, she only disposes of the residue of "her personal estate" and of "her residuary estate." This is insufficient to pass the testator's; Bradly v. Westcott (13 Ves. 445).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. George Turner, for the next of kin of Ann Davies, the widow. The property belonged absolutely to Mrs. Davies, under the will of her husband. There was an absolute gift to her in the first instance, which has not been cut down, for the gift to the children "as they attained twenty-five" is void. This has been settled by a long series of decisions; Leake v. Robinson (2 Mer. 363), Bull v. Pritchard (1 Russ. 213), Fawdry v. Geddes (1 Russ. & M. 203), Ring v. Hardwick (2 Beavan, 352), Newman v. Newman (10 Sim. 51). The direction for maintenance is insufficient to make it vest; Batsford v. Kebbell (3 Ves. 363); the [207] maintenance is given merely during the minorities of the children, so that during the period which might elapse between their attaining twenty-one, and their attaining twenty-five, there is no gift to them of the dividends.

The property has been validly appointed to Mrs. Davies's executors, and the gift to the children being void, the executors are trustees for the next of kin of Mrs. Davies; Goodere v. Lloyd (3 Sim. 538).

Again, the contingency has not happened upon which the property was given over by the will of the testator to the children of William Davies the younger, for the widow did not "die without making a will;" Scott v. Bargeman (3 R. Williams, 69).

William Davies was substituted, not for Mrs. Davies, but for Mrs. Davies and William Powell who were executors, and the testator could not therefore have intended him to take as residuary legatee.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Wood, Mr. Spence, Mr. Bacon and Mr. Blower, for other parties. Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

Feb. 26. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this cause the principal question depends upon the construction which ought to be given to the residuary bequest contained in the will of Ann Davies.

James Davies, by his will dated the 18th September 1824, gave his residuary estate to his wife Ann Davies absolutely for ever; and by a codicil, dated two days [208] afterwards, namely, the 20th September 1824, he directed, that if she died without making a will, the remainder of his property should be equally divided among his brother William Davies's four children.

James Davies died, leaving his wife surviving him, and she was absolutely entitled to dispose, by her own will, of the residuary estate bequeathed to her by her husband's will.

By her will, dated the 4th April 1832, she recited the will of her husband, and declared her purpose to dispose of all his estate, and also all her own estate; and having thus declared her purpose, she proceeded, without making any distinction between his estate and her own, to dispose of the whole, as if it had been her and I think that she has done it in a manner sufficient to pass both. (See the Wills, 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 27, which however did not apply to the present case.) After giving several legacies, she gave the residue and remainder of her personal estate to Fisher and Powell, upon trust, to sell:—to pay her debts and annuity legacies:—to set apart sufficient sums to answer the annuities:—to invest the surplus in their joint names, and stand possessed on the securities on which the same should be invested, in trust, during the life of W. Davies, to pay the interest, dividends, and annual produce of her residuary personal estate to him, and she then bequeathed as follows:—“And from and after the decease of the said W. Davies, in trust for the children of the said W. Davies, as they severally attain the age of twenty-five years, equally to be divided between them if more than one, and if one, then the whole to such one child; the income to be applied during their respective minorities, by the guardian, for the time being, of the said children or for their [209] respective support, maintenance, and education. And in case any child of the said W. Davies shall live to attain the age of twenty-five years, then the same for the children of James Davies,” in manner therein mentioned.

The question is, whether the gift to the children of W. Davies is void for remoteness, and it is necessary to consider:—first, the effect of the direction to apply the income between the children as they severally attained the age of twenty-five years; and, secondly, the effect of the direction to apply the interest during the minorities of the children for their support, maintenance, and education; and, thirdly, the effect of the gift over.

As to the first point, I think that if the directions to divide had stood alone, the gift would have been too remote. In this case, as in Leake v. Robinson (2 Mer. 363), only through the medium of the directions given to the trustees, that we can ascertain who were the persons intended to take, and what benefits were intended for them. And the trust is all for the children of W. Davies as they severally attain the age of twenty-five years; none were to be excluded, and none to have the gift till the age of twenty-five years was attained. This would be too remote.

Secondly. Expressions of this kind of themselves, importing a postponement of vesting, may be so controlled by other expressions and circumstances, as to relate to payment or possession only and not the vesting; and it has been held, that a direction to apply the interest for the benefit of the legatee, affords evidence of an intention to vest the capital; and it has not been disputed, that if the testator had bequeathed the whole [210] interest to be applied for the benefit of the legatees, during the whole time between the death of the tenant for life and the time of payment, and there had been no gift over, it must have been held that the capital was vested; but in this case, as the direction does not extend to the whole time, but is limited to the minorities of the children, and as the application is to be by the trustees, for the support, maintenance, and education of the children, it was argued that the interval between the twenty-first and twenty-fifth year of each child, during which there is direction to apply the interest, prevents the direction from being construed as a direction to apply the whole interest, and, therefore, does not afford any presumption that the whole was intended to vest.

In Hoath v. Hoath (2 Bro. C. C. 4), Walcott v. Hall (Ib. 305), Murray v. Addenbrook (Ib. 407), and many other cases, the direction was to apply the whole interest; and the gifts were held to be vested. In Leake v. Robinson (2 Mer. 363) and Bull v. Bull (1 Russ. 213), the trustees had authority or power to apply the interest, so much as they should think proper, or so much as they might deem necessary for the maintenance of the children, and in Vandry v. Geddes (1 Russ. & Myl. 100) the interest was at the discretion of the executors to be applied in the maintenance of the children, or accumulated for their benefit until they should severally attain twenty-two years of age, and in these cases it was held, notwithstanding the absence of any authority, or direction to apply the interest or part of it to the maintenance of the children, that it was the vesting, and not merely the possession or time of payment which was postponed.

[21] But too much reliance must not be placed on the expression “the whole interest,” which has been used in some of the cases. In Lane v. Goudge (9 Ves. 229)

£30 a year, part of the interest was given to an annuitant for life. In Jones v. Mackinnon (1 Russ. 220) an annuity of £100 was given out of the interest to the father of the children, and in Bland v. Williams (3 Myl. & K. 411), there was a direction and a mere power or authority to apply the interest, or a sufficient part thereof for the maintenance of the children, and to transfer the capital, with so much of the interest as should not be applied in maintenance, to the children, when and as they should attain twenty-four years, and in those cases the gifts were held to be vested.

I have found no case precisely like the present, in which payment being postponed beyond minority, the express direction to apply the interest extends only to minority. The case is, that the testatrix, having expressed a trust as to her residuary estate for the children of William Davies, makes no distinct gift of interest, proceeding as if she had already done what was requisite to entitle the children to the interest, she directs the interest to be applied for their support, maintenance and education by the guardian during their minorities. She appears to me to express herself as if she considered the children entitled to the interest by the direction to divide the capital at a future period. She did not consider the interest and capital to be blended together, but on the contrary, so expresses herself, as, by direction, to imply a gift to the children of the benefit or enjoyment of the interest immediately after death of the tenant for life. The inference or implication from the direction to apply the interest, and although the direction is limited to the minorities, it is not necessary, or I think reasonable to limit the inference or the implication in like manner, or to the mere time to which the direction applies. There is a gift payable at a future time, and a direction shewing that the donees to have the benefit of the interest on the death of the tenant for life. This direction expresses that, during the minorities, the interest is to be applied by the guardian for support, maintenance, and education, and there is no express direction as to application of the interest after the minorities have ceased. At that time the enjoyment expressly directed will cease, but I do not think that it is then to be concluded that there is to be no enjoyment, and on this part of the case appears to me, that the second part of the residuary bequest, the direction as to application of the interest, qualifies the first direction for the division of the residue, and that the result of the direction to divide, followed by the direction to apply income, would, without more, be to give vested interests in the residue to the children of William Davies.

Thirdly. But then it is argued that the gift over is wholly inconsistent with that conclusion, and shews that the testatrix could not have intended to give vested interests. The argument rests entirely upon dicta of Sir John Leach in the cases of Vandry v. Geddes (1 Russ. & Myl. 207) and Bland v. Williams (3 Myl. & K. 411).

In Vandry v. Geddes, that learned Judge is reported to have expressed himself thus: "if the whole interest had been expressly given to the children until they attained twenty-two, I do not agree that the shares of [213] the children would therefore have vested subject to be divested; the case of Batsford v. Kebbell, which is referred to by Sir W. Grant in Leake v. Robinson, is an authority directly in opposition to that proposition. Where interim interest is given, it is presumed that the testator meant an immediate gift, because, for the purpose of interest, the part legacy is to be immediately separated from the bulk of the property; but the presumption fails entirely, when the testator has expressly declared that the interest is to go over, in case of the death of the legatee, before a particular period," as in Bland v. Williams, he is reported to have said, that "if the gift over, is simply the death under twenty-four, the gift could not vest before that period."

It is to be observed, that in neither of these cases did the facts require any decision upon the points to which the dicta related.

In Vandry v. Geddes, the gift over to the surviving children of any sister was upon the death of any such children without leaving issue; and the gift over to the surviving sisters and their children or issue, was upon the death of all the children of any sister without issue. The question related to a share of residue, not to a particular legacy, and there was no distinct gift of interest as in Batsford v. Kebbell, but a direction to apply or accumulate the interest till the age of twenty-two.

In Blond v. Williams, the gift over was upon the death under twenty-four without any issue, and the gift was held to be vested.

The proposition which, in argument, was founded upon these dicta of Sir John Leach is, that in a case [214] where there is a gift payable at a future time, in terms which in themselves import contingency, and a subsequent direction to apply the interest, in a manner, which, notwithstanding the contingent form of the gift, would, in the absence of any gift over, vest the legacy, the mere circumstance of a gift over, only on the death before the time of payment, does of itself prevent the vesting.

In ordinary cases, a gift over upon a contingency does not prevent vesting in the first donee, for, although it is reported that in the case of Scott v. Bargeman (2 W. 69), Lord Maclefield stated the reason for his decision to be, that the shares the legatees did not vest absolutely in any of them, in regard it was possible all might die under twenty-one or marriage, in which case it was devised over, yet in Scott v. Barnes (3 Mer. 340) Sir William Grant observed, that the reason seemed to be a proposition that is untenable in law, viz., that the mere circumstance of all shares being given over on a contingency, does of itself, and without more, prevent any of the shares from vesting in the meantime; and he added, that he took it to be clear, that a devise over upon a contingency had no such effect, provided the residue of bequest were in other respects sufficient to pass a present interest. Such a devise over of the entirety may, indeed, be called in aid of other circumstances, to shew that no present interest was intended to pass; but that it is alone sufficient to prevent vesting, cannot, I think, be maintained.

Now, in the present case, it appears to me that the words of bequest to the children of William Davies are sufficient to pass a present interest. Such appears to be the true construction of the words which the [215] testatrix has used, and as we have once reached the result or meaning of the words under consideration, we apprehend that effect should be given to that meaning, just as if it had been expressed in direct and unambiguous terms. The meaning must, indeed, be collected from the whole will; but the gift over does not, in this case, appear to be accompanied by any other circumstances, tending to shew that no present interest was intended to pass; but, on the contrary, affords some evidence of an intention to vest after a previous vesting. And, on the whole, it appears to me that the residuary bequest to the children of William Davies is valid. (NOTE.—An appeal is pending in this case before the House of Lords.) [A note in the Addenda to 6 Beav. states that the appeal was compromised.]

The Court refused to open accounts, though of a general and summary nature, not stating the items, and which had been rendered by a surviving partner to the representatives of a deceased partner, and had remained unquestioned for twenty years, but it decreed an account limited to the subsequent receipts of the surviving partner, which, it was admitted, had taken place.

In 1806 James Milne and his son James Milne the younger, entered into partnership as tailors, on the terms stated in a deed made and executed between them.

In 1808 the son died, leaving his wife sole executrix and legatee.

In November 1812 she married the Plaintiff Mr. Scott, and shortly previous thereto, viz., in October 1812, James Milne the elder, furnished Mr. and Mrs. Scott with two accounts, the first headed, "The stated account of the partnership of James Milne," which shewed on one side the gross amount of the sales during [216] the partnership, and of the stock at its conclusion, and on the other, the capital of the partnership, leaving a balance of net profits of £3862, and outstanding debts remaining due to the partnership amounting to £2094. It also stated, that all the debts due to the partnership were satisfied.

The second account was headed, "Mr. James Milne in account with Mrs. Milne the widow of his late son," and stated, on the one hand, the son's share of the capital and profits, and on the other, payments made on account thereof, and shewing a balance of £167 due from the widow, which was stated to be deducted from the receipt of outstanding debts.

These accounts were of a general or summary nature, and did not comprise items of the account but merely stated the gross result.

James Milne the elder died in October 1834, and two years after, the Plaintiff made an application to the Defendant, the widow and executrix of James Milne the elder, for accounts of the partnership. In August 1836 a Mr. Starling, who acted for the Defendant, furnished the Plaintiffs with an account which was headed as follows, "An account of cash advances to and expenditures on account of the late Mr. James Milne jun., made by the late James Milne sen., being payments on account of the claim of Mr. W. G. Scott, and Mary his wife, under the partnership estate of Messrs. Milne & Son."

It set forth a number of payments alleged to have been made by James Milne the elder to his son and to the Plaintiff Mrs. Scott respectively, from the 1st of May 1806 to the 10th of November 1812, both inclusive, and amounting in the whole to the sum [217] of £2273, 12s. 6d., and at the foot of the account, was the following memorandum in writing, signed by Margaret Milne:—"I hereby claim to be allowed to me all the before-mentioned sums of money, amounting in the whole to the sum of £2273, 12s. 6d., out of and towards satisfaction of the share of capital and profits of my late son, besides his advancement of £500, and also his share of profits under the late partnership estate of Messrs. Milne & Son, to be ascertained by an account I have engaged to furnish you of the same, over and above such other sum and sums I have been enabled to shew has been paid to or advanced on account of my late son's interest in the said partnership. As witness my hand this 13th day of August 1836 Margaret Milne."

The Defendant soon afterwards sent to the Plaintiffs a further account which was headed, "An account of the receipts and expenditures under the partnership estate of Messrs. Milne & Son," furnished by Mrs. Margaret Milne, executrix of the late James Milne the elder, who was the surviving partner. In this account credit was given for monies received by James Milne the elder, both before and after the account was rendered by him in the year 1812.

In 1838 the Plaintiffs filed this bill against the Defendant, praying a general account of the partnership transaction.

The bill alleged that errors existed in the several accounts, which errors were, however, proved.

There was no evidence to shew that the two accounts rendered by the testator in 1812 had not been acquiesced in, from the time they were delivered, down to the death of James Milne the elder in the year 1834; but [218] it was alleged by the Plaintiffs, and admitted by the answer, that sums had been received by James Milne the elder, subsequent to 1812, on account of the outstanding debts, but which the answer also stated had been accounted for.

The Defendant insisted that the accounts were settled and acquiesced in; that she was protected by the Statute of Limitations, and was not bound to account for or at most she was only bound to account for the debts received since 1812. She also imputed improper conduct to Mr. Starling in procuring her to sign and deliver the accounts, and she said that he acted as the agent, and was in the interest of the Plaintiffs.

The cause now came on for hearing.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wood, for the Plaintiffs, contended they were entitled to a general account. That the accounts were still open and subsisting, and that the settled account had been shewn, and that even those of 1812 did not contain particular items, but were general in their nature; and, lastly, that the conduct of the Defendant had been such, as to waive any objection arising from lapse of time and acquiescence.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Ellison, for the Defendant, contended, that the Plaintiffs, having acquiesced in the account for twenty-one years were barred by the Statute of Limitations and their own laches from unravelling the account, that the Defenwas not liable at this distance of time to account at all, and at all events, only for the receipt of the outstanding debts.

That the accounts had been rendered by the Defendant merely for her satisfaction, and under the wrong advice of Mr. Starling who was intimately connected with the Plaintiffs, and that she had done so [219] under the impression that her legal rights would not be prejudiced.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

The following cases were cited, Irvine v. Young (1 Sim. & St. 333), Willis v. Mason (2 Atkyns, 251), Ex parte Randleson (2 Deac. & Ch. 534), Lord Clancarty v. McDonche (1 Ball & B. 420), Campbell v. Graham (1 Russ. & M. 453), Grenfell v. Weston (2 Y. & Col. (Exch.) 662), Hercy v. Dinwoody (2 Ves. jun. 87), Gray v. Methorpe (3 Ves. 103).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The accounts rendered in 1812, in short summary, shew that great care was taken to ascertain what the state of the account between the parties at that time was. The evidence is wholly silent as to whether the accounts were made out, or what access was given to the books, or at what examination of them took place at that time. The accounts were delivered in October 1812, and it is not shewn that they were not acquiesced in without any objection from the time of their delivery to the death of Milne the father. Mr. James Milne, the father, died in October 1834; and two years afterwards an account was made to Mrs. Milne, his legal personal representative, for an account. That account was rendered by Starling, who it is proved was consulted by the Defendant; the books were examined by him, and by a letter it appears that he communicated with her in respect of what he was to do, and an account was sent in consequence of her instructions. This account comprised not only the transactions of the partnership previous to 1812, but those subsequent which related to the outstanding debts. Another account was [220] also rendered of the sums advanced to the son and his widow, being the same sums for which James Milne the elder took an account in the account of 1812. Disputes took place, and in 1838 this bill was filed, asking for a general account. This lady by her answer, after admitting that the account was rendered, states that she did it by bad advice, suggests that Starling acted in collusion with the Plaintiffs, insists she ought not to be bound by the accounts, and that the matter ought to be treated as if the accounts had not been rendered; and she claims to be exempted from accounting, in consequence of the lapse of time. Starling is examined for the Plaintiffs, but he is not cross-examined; a cross-bill is filed; but the Defendant claims what she might possibly have been entitled to if there had been a cross-bill and the facts had been fully proved. I do not however on this record think that the Defendant is entitled to any such relief; there is no ground established in the evidence for imputing misconduct to Starling, and I cannot assume misconduct in him.

The case then is a very short one; the account was delivered in 1812; at that time it might have been thoroughly investigated, and there is no evidence to shew that every opportunity for investigation was not given. It appears to have been acquiesced in, from the time when it was delivered to the time when the demand was made for a general account. If that demand had not been complied with, I could say, without the slightest hesitation, that there had been such an acquiescence as to bind the parties. The question is, whether what took place afterwards is to take away the effect of the acquiescence, and I think it ought not. My opinion is, that I ought not to open the accounts; but the receipt of outstanding debts subsequent to 1812 being admitted, I must direct an account in respect of the outstanding debts.

[1] Seeing that the account of 1812 admits there were outstanding accounts to a considerable amount which it was the duty of the surviving partner to collect, and that by the account subsequently rendered that that collection did take place, and being no reason for believing that any one of the sums were ever divided among the parties entitled, there is no reason for refusing an account of the monies received by the surviving partner after the date of the account of 1812. (Affirmed in Lyndhurst C., 15th February 1843.)

[See Holder v. Durbin, 1849, 11 Beav. 596. See now Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53) s. 10.]

Trustees appointed by the Court in the place of others whose appointments had failed by their deaths in the lifetime of the testator, authorised to appoint future trustees in the manner and under the circumstances mentioned in the will.

This was a bill for the appointment of two new trustees, in the place of trustees appointed by the testator's will, but who had died in his lifetime. The will contained a power for the surviving or continuing trustees or trustee, or the executors or administrators of the last surviving or continuing trustee, to appoint new trustees in the place of trustees dying, desiring to be discharged, &c.

Mr. R. W. E. Forster asked that the Master might insert a power authorizing the trustees now to be appointed, to appoint future new trustees; he referred to Joyce v. Joyce (2 Moll. 276) as an authority. (See Seton on Decrees, 131; Bayley v. Manell, 4 Mad. 226; Brown v. Brown, 3 Y. & Col. 395; Southwell v. Ward, Tamlyn, 314).

Mr. W. C. Buller, for the Defendant.

[222] 8th March. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, he would look at the case cited, but he saw no objection to what was proposed to be done.

His Lordship ordered that the Master, in settling the conveyance, should be at liberty, if he should think fit, to insert the power to appoint new trustees. (1)

[222] LANE v. HARDWICKE. Dec. 2 13, 1841.

An infant having been taken out of the jurisdiction to avoid service, the Court refused to appoint the Senior Six Clerk in Court to appear and put in his answer. Substituted service of a subpoena to appear, ordered in the case of an infant.

Mr. Hetherington moved, that the senior clerk in Court might appear, and put in an answer forthwith for the infant Defendant St. Andrew Beauchamp St. John, who was out of the jurisdiction. The affidavit in support of the motion stated, that the deponent believed, that the infant had been taken out of the jurisdiction by his parents, for the express purpose of preventing his being served with process to appear to the bill, and thereby cause delay to the Plaintiffs in the prosecution of this suit.

[223] Hancock v. Eaton (2) was cited, in which an infant having been taken abroad

(1) EXTRACT FROM DECREE.—The decree, after referring it to the Master to settle a conveyance from the heir at law of the testator to the new trustees, proceeded as follows:—"And it is ordered, that there be inserted therein a power for the persons so to be appointed as aforesaid, and the survivor of them, or the executors or administrators of such survivor, to appoint new trustees in the manner and under the circumstances mentioned and directed in and by the said will and codicil, and also in and by the direction, that the trustees now to be appointed, or hereafter to be appointed as aforesaid, shall have all such other powers and authorities as if they had been named and appointed in and by the said testator's will and codicil."—Reg. Lib. 1841, B. 1. 492.

(2) Hancock v. Eaton. L. C. Feb. 11, 1819.

An infant having, after appearance, been taken out of the jurisdiction, the Court appointed the Senior Six Clerk to put in his answer, without the infant being brought into Court.

Upon opening, &c., unto the Lord Chancellor, it was alleged, that by an order of the 14th November last, it was ordered, that the Plaintiff's bill should be taken by his parents, Lord Eldon assigned the Senior Six Clerk as his guardian, to put in an answer without bringing the infant into Court.

On the following day, THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he could not grant this application; but that looking at the affidavits, there might be ground for applying for substituted service on the persons who seemed to act for the parents of the infant.

Dec. 13. Mr. Hetherington applied for an order for substituted service, when, on the facts stated,

[224] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS ordered that service on the solicitor and Six Clerk of the parents, should be good service on the infant. (See Kinder v. Forbes, 2 Swan, 503; Weymouth v. Lambert, 3 Beavan, 333; and Hobhouse v. Courtney, 12 M. & W. 140.)

Testatrix gave her personal estate to B. for the benefit of B.'s daughters. B. invested the produce, together with £1000 of his own monies, in the funds in his own name, and afterwards treated and admitted the aggregate fund as held in trust for his daughters. On the death of B. the fund was found mixed with like funds of his own. Held, that under the circumstances, there was sufficient to constitute a trust of the £1000 in favour of the daughters.

In February 1827 the mother of Henry Owen died, having by her will given her personal estate to the six daughters of Henry Owen; and she appointed him sole executor.

Henry Owen converted the whole personal estate, and invested it with a further £1000, part of his own money, in the purchase of £2550 3½ per cent. Reduced annuities.

In 1830 the eldest daughter came of age, when the testator paid her £455, 15s. 6d., sixth of the whole fund, she giving a receipt for it as one-sixth of the estate of grandmother and of the addition made thereto by Henry Owen the father, amounting in the whole as above."

In 1834 another daughter came of age, when one-fifth of the residue of the aggregate fund was paid to her, on her giving a receipt for it, incorrectly describing one-fifth of the personal estate of the grandmother.

[225] In 1838 a third daughter married Mr. Sadler, when her father covenanted to give the "contingent share" in the legacy given by the grandmother's will, on trusts.

Accounts of the grandmother's estate being required on behalf of Sadler and wife, were furnished by Henry Owen, through his solicitors, on the 20th of July 1840. In the £1000 was included in the following terms:—"1827, March 7th, added £1000;" and one-fourth of the £2550 and dividends were stated to be due to Sadler and wife. Henry Owen also stated, in a letter accompanying the account, that he was ready to assign and pay over the £637, 10s. to Sadler's trustees, and to account for the dividends.

as against William B. and Ann his wife, and William Henry B., and it was sworn by affidavit that W. B. and Ann his wife married in 1811, and had one child, W. H. B., born in 1813, and W. B. and Ann his wife and the infant quitted England, and went to reside in North America, where they were still residing; it was prayed that the order might be set aside, as far as regarded the Defendant W. H. B., the son, and that John Kipling, Esq., the Senior Six Clerk not towards the cause, be assigned his guardian without his being brought into Court; and that the Defendant might answer by such guardian, he, the said Defendant W. H. B., on entering his appearance, having quitted this kingdom; which upon hearing the order and the said affidavit and an affidavit of notice of this motion to the Plaintiff read is ordered accordingly.—Reg. Lib. 1818, A. fol. 497. (See 2d Order of April 1842. Ord. Can. 197).

On the 28th of July 1840 the solicitors of Henry Owen, in answer to the last letter accompanying the account, wrote to him to the following effect:—"Yes mention in yours received this morning, that the £1000 mentioned in your account was your own money. Now if so, Quære 1. We think that it should be kept out of the account now to be handed to Quilter & Taylor [the solicitors of Mr. and Mrs. Sadler], though you might, if you pleased, pay over to Mrs. Sadler's trustees a larger sum than that which should appear strictly due from you.

"Quære 2. Was the £1000 a voluntary gift on your part without any legal obligation or debt?

"Quære 3. If so, we suppose this mode of giving a portion to your daughters was adopted as a convenience to yourself, since you would have the trouble of managing the fund of which you were trustee."

[226] Henry Owen returned this letter to his solicitors, having written opposite the above queries as follows:—

"Quære 1. As I have hitherto made the £1000 part of the testatrix's property, cannot alter it.

"Quære 2. Yes.

"Quære 3. Yes."

In November 1840 Henry Owen paid the trustees of Sadler and wife £44, two years' dividends on £637, 10s. stock; and in the letter forwarding it through solicitors, he again stated, that the trustees of Sadler were entitled to one-fourth £2550 stock and of the dividends.

In April 1841 a release was prepared from the instructions of Henry Owen, who was executed by one of the parties, but was not executed by him in consequence of his death. It purported to be a release from one-fourth of the £2550 stock.

Henry Owen died in June 1841, when the fund was found "amalgamated" with other stock of his own, and made together a sum of £6350 3½ per cents. which was still standing in his name. A petition was presented in the cause, for the purpose of determining the question, whether the £1000 voluntarily invested by Henry Owen in his own name, was affected with a trust in favour of his daughters?

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Josiah W. Smith, for the widow and personal representatives of Henry Owen, stated the facts of the case.

[227] Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Stinton, and Mr. C. Hall, for the daughters and the trustees, contended that the testator had devoted the £1000 to the same trust as those on which he held the personal estate of his mother, and that he had been sufficiently affected with the trust, so as to bind his representatives.

Mr. Tinney, Mr. O. Anderdon, Mr. Collins, and Mr. Trotter contended, that no legal interest in the £1000 had passed from the testator, and as there had been no declaration of trust, this Court would not assist volunteers in perfecting an incomplete trust. That this fund must, therefore, be considered part of the general estate of Henry Owen. The following cases were cited; Cotteen v. Missing (1 Ves. 176), Antrobus v. Smith (12 Ves. 39), Ward v. Audland (8 Sim. 571, C. P. Ct. 146), Gaskell v. Gaskell (2 Y. & J. 502), Edwards v. Jones (1 Myl. & Cr. 226), Jones v. Jefferys (Cr. & Ph. 138), and see Dillon v. Coppin (4 Myl. & Cr. 647).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] ordered the cause to stand over to see if any further evidence could be produced. On a subsequent day, he held that a trust had been declared of the £1000 in favour of the daughters, and he directed payment thereof accordingly.

[228] STREETEN v. WHITMORE. Feb. 10, 1842.

The first order of May 1839 is not superseded by the eleventh and twelfth General Orders of August 1841, but a party to whom money or costs are ordered to be paid, may still issue a fi. fa. or elegit.

By the First Order of the 10th of May 1839 (Ord. Can. 138), every person to whom money or costs have been ordered to be paid, may, at the expiration of a month, issue a fi. facias or elegit of the form there stated.

By the 11th Amended Order of August 1841 (Jb. 166), if a party ordered to pay money, &c., does not obey the order, the party prosecuting it may issue an attachment, and may afterwards have a sequestration or serjeant-at-arms, &c.

By the 12th Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 167) it is ordered, "That every order or decree requiring any party to do an act thereby ordered, shall state the time, or the time after service of the order or decree, within which the act is to be done; and that upon the copy of the order or decree which shall be served upon the party required to obey the same, there shall be endorsed a memorandum in the words to the effect following, viz:—'If you, the within-named A. B., neglect to obey this order [or decree] by the time therein limited, you will be liable to be arrested under writ of attachment issued out of the High Court of Chancery, or by the serjeant-at-arms attending the same Court, and also be liable to have your estate sequestered for the purpose of compelling you to obey the same order [or decree].'"

The Plaintiff, after the latter General Orders came into operation, obtained an order against a purchaser [229] for payment of £80 costs within a fortnight. This order was served, and after the lapse of a month the Plaintiff applied to his Clerk in court for a writ of fi. fa.

The Clerk in Court conceived that the latter General Order superseded the former, and that the party prosecuting an order was not now entitled to a fi. fa. or sc. fa. as the indorsement did not state that the party disobeying the order would be liable to the effect of those writs. He in consequence declined issuing the writ of fi. fa.

Mr. Bagshawe stated these circumstances to the Court, and asked that the writ should issue.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that the Plaintiff was entitled to the writ of fi. fa., and stated his opinion that the 12th Order of August 1841 was intended to interfere with the 1st Order of the 10th of May 1839.

[S. C. 2 Rail. Cas. 800.]

The Railway Act provided, that it should not be lawful for the railway company to make or establish any public station, yards, wharfs, waiting, loading, or unloading places, warehouses, or other buildings and conveniences for the depositing, receiving, sending or keeping any passengers or cattle, or any goods, articles, matters, or things, upon the estate of R. G. without his consent. Held, on demurrer, that the word "public" did not necessarily override the whole sentence, and that if it did, that from the subsequent clauses, every convenience connected with the railway, must be considered as for the public use.

The distinction between the effect of acquiescence, upon a motion for an injunction and a demurrer. In the former case acquiescence merely prevents the special provision by injunction, but in the latter it must be such as to disentitle the Plaintiff to any relief whatever.

In this case came before the Court upon a general demurrer to the whole bill, and a motion for an injunction.

[30] The bill stated, that in 1836 a bill was brought into the House of Commons requiring the Defendants to make their railway, which it was proposed should pass through the Plaintiff's estate, and that the Plaintiff, apprehending annoyance therefrom, opposed the bill.

An agreement was, however, come to between the parties, by which it was, among other things agreed, "that no public station should be established on the estate without permission."

An Act passed; and by the 15th section, it was enacted as follows:—"That it shall not be lawful for the said company to make or establish any public station, wharfs, waiting, loading, or unloading places, warehouses, or other buildings and conveniences, for the depositing, receiving, loading, or keeping any passengers or cattle, or any goods, articles, matters, or things, upon the estate of the said Robert Gordon, his heirs or assigns, or within fifty yards of the boundaries thereof, without the previous consent in writing of the said Robert Gordon, his heirs or assigns, for that purpose had and obtained."

The Defendants had, however, lately made a well and tank, and built two wood cottages, and an engine-house and stable on the property, and within the prescribed limits; and they had lately dug the foundations for and commenced the erection of a stone building of a permanent character (and which was intended as a depot for coals, coke, and ashes) on part of the land.

The bill alleged, that the trains stopped at the point in question for the purpose of changing the engines; and after stating the inconveniences resulting to the Plaintiff and his family, it prayed an injunction to re-[231]-strain the Defendants from using the said engine-house, cottages, and other buildings so erected as aforesaid, or any of them, for depositing, receiving, loading, or keeping any passengers or cattle, or any goods, engines, or other articles, matters, or things, and from continuing the erection of the buildings, so commenced, and from making, erecting, or establishing upon the Plaintiff's lands, or within fifty yards of the boundaries thereof, any public station, yards, wharfs, waiting, loading or unloading places, warehouses, or other buildings and conveniences, for the depositing, receiving, loading, or keeping any passengers or cattle, or any goods, articles, matters, or things.

To this bill the Defendants filed a general demurrer, which now came on for argument, together with an application on behalf of the Plaintiff for an injunction.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. W. P. Wood, in support of the demurrer, and in opposition to the motion for an injunction, contended that the Defendants had not acted in contravention of the Act, and that they had a right to have a depot for their engines; and for such things as were necessary for the purpose of conveniently using the railroad.

On the construction of the Act of Parliament they contended that the word "public" in the 15th section applied to every term in the clause, and did not prohibit the deposit of goods for the private use of the company, but merely "goods, articles, &c., as carriers for the public. That the agreement set out in the bill shewed that the intention of the parties was merely to prevent a "public station." In the Eton case it was held that a prohibition against forming a station did not prevent the railway company from taking up and setting down passengers.

[232] The Plaintiff, they said, had acquiesced in such a way as to disentitle him to relief. This Court will only interfere by injunction to prevent an irreparable injury, and not in a case where the thing is completed. Deere v. Guest (1 Myl. & Cr. 516).

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Goldsmid, contra. By the 15th section the railway company are prohibited making "any public station, &c., or other buildings and conveniences for the depositing, receiving, loading, or keeping any passengers or cattle, or any goods, articles, matters, or things upon the estate of the Plaintiff without his previous consent in writing." By erecting the building in question, and by the deposit of the engines, &c., the Defendants have acted contrary to the terms of the Act. The word "public" does not apply to all the expressions used in this section, but if it did, then, by the terms of the Act, the public have the right of using every convenience belonging to the company. By the interpretative clause (sect. 2), it is enacted that where the word "railway" shall be used, the same shall be understood to include the branch railways, yards, stations, wharfs, and other works thereby authorized to be made, and by a subsequent section (sect. 163) it is enacted "that all persons shall have free liberty to pass along and upon, and to use and employ the said railway, with carriages properly constructed as by the Act directed upon payment only of such rates and tolls as shall be demanded by the said company, not exceeding the respective rates or tolls by the Act authorised." It is therefore, the company make this station for their own accommodation, the public have a right to use it.

[233] As to acquiescence, the Plaintiff has been lulled by the representations of the officers of the Defendants. He protested all along, and being naturally desirous of avoiding coming to this Court, he took no legal proceedings until his rights were puted; this first happened on the 30th of December, when the Defendants claimed adversely the right to make this erection.

Acquiescence upon an application for an injunction, is different from acquiescence upon demurrer. In the one case, it merely disentitles the Plaintiff to the protection of the Court by special injunction, but in the latter case, it must amount to such a waiver of his rights as to destroy the right altogether.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS (upon the argument of the demurrer) said, several grounds have been stated in support of the demurrer, but the only one, which, upon demurrer, it is at all necessary to consider, is the construction of the Act of Parliament.

The argument as to acquiescence is, no doubt, very important upon the consideration of the motion for an injunction. A short acquiescence may properly induce the Court not to interfere ex parte. A longer acquiescence may, under the circumstances, create serious doubt upon the right of the Plaintiff, and induce the Court not to interfere by any interlocutory order, even when applied for on notice. But when acquiescence is used as an argument in support of a demurrer, there must, to make it effective, be such an acquiescence as wholly to disentitle the Plaintiff to any relief. I must assume that the Plaintiff originally had a right, but that he has altogether waived himself of it, by his acquiescence. There is clearly no such acquiescence in this case. The Plaintiff seems to [234] have objected all along to the proceedings of the Defendants, and the answers of the Defendants' officers seem to have been such, as to have lulled him until the 30th of December, when, for the first time, they acted, under the Act of Parliament, a right to do the acts here complained of.

On the demurrer, the only question is as to the construction of the Act of Parliament, and which I think one of very considerable doubt, and not very clear either way. The inclination of my opinion is in favour of the Plaintiff, but I must defer deciding the question, until I have heard the motion for an injunction.

The motion for the injunction was then discussed, but it is not necessary to repeat the arguments.

16. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this cause, the Plaintiff Gordon alleges, that the Defendants, the Cheltenham and Great Western Union Railway Company, have committed a violation of his rights under the Act of Parliament by which the company is constituted. He has filed this bill, stating the Act of Parliament, the contract which gave rise to the provisions in that Act which relate to him, and the acts which he alleges to be a violation of his rights, and he has prayed for an injunction to restrain the company from committing those acts. A motion is made by the Plaintiff for an injunction, and the Defendants have put in a general demurrer, saying that the Plaintiff is entitled to any equity, or that he is entitled to the protection of this Court for his protection. With regard to the demurrer, the Plaintiff has principally turned upon the words of the Act of Parliament, and especially upon the single word "public," which, in [235] the fifteenth section, is said to have a particular meaning, and is alleged to extend to every word which is used in the clause. The clause is as follows. [His Lordship stated it.]

Now it appears that upon the line of railway which constituted a portion of Mr. Gordon's estate, the Defendants have erected a wooden building, which they call an engine-house, for the deposit and placing of engines to be used on the railway. In this building they have made a forge, and have there provided the necessary means for firing engines, so that it is made a place for the deposit of engines, and for the use of engines to be used on the railway. Besides that, they have erected a stable and cottages, and have made a tank of water at a short distance. Mr. Gordon says that these are conveniences for the deposit of goods, articles, matters, and that they are contrary to the intention of the clause.

The Defendants on the other hand, say that the word "public" has reference to the word in the clause—that it means a place, a building, a convenience, to which the public constituting a portion of the public has a right directly to resort: that the place which is made for the deposit of engines is not directly for the use of the public:—that no person, as part of the public, has a right to resort to this engine-house, but that it is meant and placed there, for what is the private use of the company, for keeping those things which are necessary for preserving the railway, and for keeping it up for the use of the public. Now it is undoubtedly, is very much to be wished that clauses in Acts of Parliament were expressed with more precision than they often are. This being a case of demurrer it ought not to be [236] allowed if there is any relief to be had upon the bill, and could not hold that there was no relief to be had upon the bill, unless I entirely adopted the construction contended for by the Defendants. Upon reading the clause, and reading it with reference to all the other clauses in which there are similar expressions used, I cannot satisfy myself that the word "public" is to be applied to every part of this clause, or if it were so applied, that I could attribute to it the meaning contended for by the Defendants. The words "conveniences for depositing, receiving, loading, or keeping any passengers, or cattle, or any goods, articles, matters, or things," do not appear to me, in the construction of this clause, to be necessarily governed or affected by the word "public." That it is ambiguous I think must be admitted. It is not very easy to give a clear and demonstrable reason one way or the other, but looking to the sentence and giving it the construction I can, I go to this extent—that I am not satisfied that the word "public" does extend to all the words here; and still less am I satisfied, if it does extend to everything here, that it is therefore to be considered as exclusively applicable to those conveniences used by the company, in the discharge of what may be called public duty they have undertaken. By public, I presume the Defendants mean more than their customers, or any persons among the public who may choose to use of this railway. In that sense, no doubt, the public have a right to have the road kept in proper repair, they have a right to have engines duly appointed, kept in proper repair for the purpose of a convenient traffic for the public.

Now why may not the word "public" be properly extended to all such buildings, conveniences, matters, and things as are used by the company, for preparing, keeping, and repairing those machines and things which [237] are necessary to keep the road and the machinery on the road, in a proper state for the use of the public? I apprehend there is nothing they have or have a right to have, which is not for the public use, and that there is nothing there for private use. The use of the erection is to repair and keep in order those things which are necessary for the use of the public, and I apprehend such is the common purport of the word "public" in a great variety of occasions, which may easily suggest themselves to the mind of any man who gives his attention to the subject. Thinking, therefore, that the word public necessarily extends to all parts of this sentence, and if it did, it does not admit of the construction contended for by the Defendants, I cannot say that the Plaintiff is not entitled to the protection of this Court; and for that reason, and without going further into the matter, I must overrule the demurrer.

Then comes the question as to the injunction. The motion is to restrain the Defendants from using the buildings they have already erected, and from erecting other buildings. Various objections have been made to it; the first objection is the same as that used on the argument of the demurrer, viz., the construction of the Act of Parliament. Admitting that the construction is open to some doubt, perhaps considerable doubt, I have already expressed my opinion on this point.

The next objection is, that this gentleman has acquiesced so long, that he is not entitled to the protection of the Court. I cannot help being surprised at the verbiage with which that argument has been urged. I am of opinion that there is no such acquiescence as to deprive the Plaintiff of the protection of the Court. The Plaintiff knew of what was going on, seems to me to be [238] beyond all doubt. I think the knowledge of his agent must be considered as his knowledge; but at every part of the work from its very commencement, it appears to me perfectly clear that he was objecting to the proceedings. The application he made to the directors was the nature of an objection; the conversation he had with Mr. Brunel was in that nature of objection; and in fact it must be assumed, I think, that if there had been any acquiescence which the company thought to be acquiescence, I should have heard of it in a different form from that in which it is suggested to me; I should have had it in a different form. Then it is said there was delay in filing the bill. Was that a delay which deprived the Defendants any right, or deprived the Plaintiff of any? He saw something which he objected to, which he considered to be a violation of his rights and of Parliament. He was told in the month of September, that it was a temporary action only. Would it then have been correct on his part, or right in him immediately to have commenced litigation on the subject? or rather, was it not a proof of moderation, and desire to accommodate the company, when he acquiesced in what was led to consider a mere temporary violation of his rights, in the expectation it would only last for a short time? The first time, as far as I can understand from the evidence, that the company claimed a right under the Act of Parliament to the acts, was by a letter on the 30th of December, and in a month from that time the Plaintiff filed his bill. I cannot imagine how it is supposed that this is to be considered such an acquiescence as to deprive him of all right whatever, or to give the Defendants any right they would not have had, if such acquiescence had not taken place. They have not given evidence to shew that they have incurred any loss on the faith of the Plaintiff's acquiescence, and I am of opinion, therefore, that there is no acquiescence to deprive the Plaintiff of any right to which he is entitled.

The next point for consideration does certainly appear to me to be a very material one, that is, what are the inconveniences to which the parties would be subject by granting of an injunction? It is, to a certain extent, discretionary with the Court whether it will, on interlocutory application, grant this extraordinary remedy; with regard to that, the length of time that has elapsed is not immaterial. The inconveniences to which the company may be subject, are, I must say, looking at the affidavits, stated in a manner which is extremely unsatisfactory. It has been urged strenuously, that if this injunction be granted, the consequence will be, that the line of railway cannot be safely used:—that the safety of the persons who may be on it will be endangered; and that by stopping the traffic on other parts of the line, the public will be greatly inconvenienced. On this point I wish to state, that if I felt satisfied that there was that great inconvenience, then looking on the other hand to the nature of the inconvenience suffered by Mr. Gordon and his agents to accommodate, and the amount of inconvenience on the other side strongly urged in argument, but in evidence so weakly supported, I ought rather to refrain from granting this injunction until this matter had been further investiand this brings me to the last point in this case, which is, whether there ought to be any proceeding at law, either before the injunction is granted, or directed as a condition on which the injunction is granted. The Court has regard to the circumstances of each case. Sometimes it finds it most conducive to the justice of the case to grant the injunction at once, [240] putting the party who has obtained it on terms of bringing an action to support his right which has appeared to a Court of Equity so that it has acted on it, though, at the same time, it wished to have it corroborated by the decision of a Court of law; sometimes from the great inconvenience, at other times from the extreme doubt, it has considered it would be best, on the whole, that the injunction should be suspended till the right at law has been ascertained. These are courses which the Court takes, but I have some little doubt whether I am now in possession of all the evidence that is material for the purpose of determining this case. At any rate before I decide that point, which is the only point I think I ought carefully to read the cases decided by Lord Cottenham. I do not think that I shall be doing any injury to the Plaintiff if I suspend this for a few days. I shall reserve my judgment, and give it on Monday morning. At the same time I think I shall not be doing any wrong by allowing the Defendants to inform the Court more accurately than they have done, what would be the consequences of granting this by injunction.

21. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that he had read the affidavits, which shewed that there were inconveniences on both sides, but that in this, as in all other cases of injunction, to prevent the use of works devoted to the public, it became necessary to consider on which side the inconvenience would press most, until the determination of the question in the cause, either by means of an action at law or by carrying the case to the House of Lords. That he had looked for some time to find if there was any prospect of a limit in time, in regard to the inconvenience complained of by the Plaintiff, but he could find none, and this seemed to him to be the [241] strongest point against the Defendants, and on the whole he was of opinion that the Plaintiff was entitled to an injunction.

By arrangement between the parties, the operation of the injunction was suspended for a limited period, the Defendants undertaking to appeal from the decision.

A. devised to B. an estate during the life of herself and her husband, and after their deceases to the lawful issue of B.'s body for ever. Held, that B. took the estate tail.

A. devised to B. in tail, and for want of issue of her body "he empowered and authorized" her to settle and dispose of the estate to such persons as she thought fit by her will, "confiding" in her not to alienate or transfer the estate from "nearest family." B. appointed to her husband for life, with remainders over. Held, that B. had a power of appointing to the "nearest family" only, that no other family must be construed "heir," and that consequently the appointment to her husband was void.

The testator in this cause, by his will dated in 1786, devised two freehold estates of which, subject to a mortgage, he was seised, unto his eldest daughter Mary Evan, the wife of Stephen Evan, to hold to her, in terms expressed as follows: i.e., "for the term of her natural life and the life of her husband Stephen Evan, and after their several deceases, to the use and behoof of the lawful issue of the body of the said Mary Evan for ever; and for want of such issue, I do hereby empower and authorize her my said daughter Mary Evan to settle and dispose of my said estate, to such person or persons as she shall [242] think fit, in and by one instrument in writing, being her last will and testament legally executed and attested by credible witnesses, confiding in her my said daughter, that she will not, by the instrument, alienate or transfer my said estate from my nearest family; and nevertheless, and I do hereby charge my said estate to the payment of the mortgage already contracted and entered on by one David William."

The testator then charged the estates with certain sums for his three young daughters, and proceeded in the following terms:—"And I do further recommend my said three daughters, Rachael, Hannah and Heather, to the tender care and protection of my said daughter and devisee Mary Evan, fatherly advising her to make every further and additional provision for them in her power, as far as the circumstances will afford, on account that I have made this distinction, and prefer her to a higher station in the enjoyment of my both real and personal estate."

After the testator's death Stephen Evan paid off the mortgage, and got a commission to a trustee.

Mary Evan made her will in 1814, and thereby she devised the estate in question and all other her real estate to her husband for life, with remainder to David Evan (his son by a former marriage, who was the great-nephew of the testator, being grandson of the testator's sister), to hold to him and his lawful issue for ever, &c. Mary Evan died in 1823, without having had issue, and without having recovered, and her husband entered into possession.

[243] Stephen Evan died in 1838, and David Evan, the sole Defendant, entered into possession.

The bill was filed by the co-heirs of the testator, being the testator's daughter, and the children and a grandchild of the other two daughters, who were dead, against David Evan. It prayed that the Defendant might let the Plaintiff have the estate.

(1) NOTE.—The case came before the Lord Chancellor, on appeal, in November 1842, who directed the opinion of a Court of law to be obtained as to the construction of the Act of Parliament.

into peaceable possession of the property, and deliver up the title-deeds, and for an account of the rents, &c., from the death of Mary Evan, and that what might be found due might be set off against the Defendant's lien, &c.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Jenkins, for the Plaintiffs. The gift is to Mary Evan for her joint lives of herself and her husband, with remainder to her lawful issue; consequently, under the rule in Shelley's case the estate to herself and that to her issue coalesced, and on the whole she took an estate tail in the property, and this she has never barred. Douglas v. Congreve (1 Beav. 59).

The power either enabled her to appoint to the testator's "nearest relations" alone, or the word "confiding" created an imperative trust on her not to "alienate or transfer" the estate from the testator's "nearest relations." In the former case she has not executed the power, and the property passes, in default of appointment, to the testator's heir. In the latter case there is a trust for the heirs as "nearest relations," Knight v. Knight (3 Beav. 148), for the word "family," when applied to real estate, means the heir. Wright v. Atkins (17 Ves. 255, 19 Ves. 299, Turn. & Bea. 143, and G. Coop. 111).

[244] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Evans, for the Defendant, contended, that the estate devised to the issue, and the estate pur autre vie, did not coalesce. "Assise per adington, que si home done terre al A. B. pur terme dauter vie, le remaynder al heirs de son corps engendres, oncure il nad que a terme dauter vie, durant le vie d'iceluy que vye, tamen dicitur quod non est lex" (Brooke's Abr. Estates, 296); and that Mary Evan had, therefore, an estate for her own and her husband's life, and a power of devising to her husband for life.

Secondly, that the power limited to her, was to "dispose" of the estate "to such person as she should think fit," which was a general power, and that she had executed it by her will, in favour of her husband and the Defendant.

Thirdly, that the expression "nearest family" rendered the trust, if any, void for uncertainty, Doe v. Joinville (3 East, 172), Harland v. Trigg (1 Bro. C. C. 142): that the words "empower and authorize" were not sufficient to create a trust, and being authorized to "settle" the estate, she had the power of giving a life-estate to her husband.

They also cited Fearn's Cont. Rem. 341, 345, and 1 Rep. Husb. & W. 10, 357.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held, that Mary Evan took an estate tail, with a power of appointing to the testator's "nearest relations," which expression was, in this case, equivalent to heir. That the appointment was in equity void, and that the Plaintiffs were therefore entitled as from the death of Mary Evan. An inquiry [245] was directed of what was due on the mortgage, on account of the principal and interest, and on the other hand, the usual account of the rents as against mortgagee in possession was ordered; and upon payment of the balance, a conveyance of the estate was directed to be made. No costs were given on either side.

[245] GLENGALL v. BARNARD. March 23, 1842.

Part of a residuary estate, settled on one for life, with remainder to her issue, consisted of life annuities and policies on the lives for securing the principal money. The Court seeing it for the benefit of all parties, refrained from ordering a sale, but directed the policies to be kept up, so as to secure the principal, and that the surplus annuities should be paid to the tenant for life.

This was a suit for the administration of the estate of Mr. Mellish. It appeared that, on the marriage of one of his daughters, he had settled considerable property, and had given a life-estate therein to the husband. (1 Keen, 769, where the estate for life to the husband seems omitted; see p. 771.) The husband had parted with his whole life interest by charging annuities thereon.

The testator bought up the annuities, and kept up policies on the husband's life, whereby the principal money was secured. The annuities and policies formed part of the testator's estate, which he had by his will settled on his daughters and on their issue in remainder.

The trustees, under the circumstances, were of opinion that it would be more beneficial to all parties to retain the annuities and keep up the policies, than to sell and invest the produce.

Mr. Pemberton admitted, that the strict rule would be to sell the annuities and policies, and after investing the produce, to pay the dividends to the tenants for life, but argued that, as those securities would realise much less than would ultimately secured by the policies, it would be for the benefit both of the tenants for life and those in remainder, that they should be retained, and that the amount of annuities, after payment of the premiums, should be paid to the tenants for life.

The will, he said, contained a discretionary clause, enabling the trustees to do what they deemed advisable.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Bacon, Mr. Teed, and Mr. Koe, for different parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that under the circumstances he thought the arrangement beneficial, care being taken to keep up the policies, that the decree must be prefaced with a declaration, that this course appeared to the Court beneficial for all parties.

[246], ROBINSON v. WOOD. March 24, 1842.

An estate was devised to A., subject to a charge of £5000 payable to the executor. In a suit to which A. was a party, the estate was sold, and all proper parties were ordered to join in the conveyance. A., refusing to execute the deed, was declared a trustee for the purchaser, under the 1 W. 4, c. 60, and another person was directed to convey in his stead.

The petition for the above purpose was presented by a Defendant in his character of purchaser, the Court refused to give costs.

This was a petition under the Trustee Act, 1 W. 4, c. 60.

The facts of the case were these:—The testator in this cause devised an estate to Thomas Wood, subject and chargeable with the payment of £5000 to the executor of his will. On the 9th of June 1840, an [247] order was made that the estate should be sold with the approbation of the Master, wherein all proper parties were to be named, and the Master should direct. Pursuant to the order, the estate was sold to Richard Wood. He was reported such purchaser by the Master, the report was confirmed. Richard Wood paid his purchase-money into Court; it was thereupon ordered that the proper parties should join in the conveyance. The Master settled the draft of conveyance, and the engrossment was tendered to Thomas Wood, a Defendant in the suit, for his execution, but he would not execute it. He happened to be in Court on another matter.

A petition was now presented by Richard Wood, under the 1 W. 4, c. 60, eighth section of which provides, in effect, that where a trustee neglects or refuses to convey the trust estate, twenty-eight days after tender of a proper conveyance, the Court of Chancery may direct any other person to convey for him.

The petition prayed that Thomas Wood might be declared a trustee under the Act, and that a proper person might be appointed to convey the estate to the Petitioner, and execute the engrossment approved of by the Master. The Respondent, Thomas Wood, might pay the costs of the petition.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Faber, in support of the petition, contended, that the case came within the Act. They cited Warburton v. Vaughan (4 Y. & Col. 11), and Prendergast v. Eyre (1 Ll. & Go. 11).

That even if the Respondent had an interest in the estate, still the eighth section relieved the case from [248] any difficulty on that ground. They said the costs of the petition rendered necessary by the Respondent's refusal to execute an act already ordered by the Court, and cited Manners v. Charlesworth (Jefferies Sugden's Acts, 156, note a.), and Jones v. Lewis (1 Cox, 199).

Thomas Wood, in person, opposed the prayer of the petition.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There are two modes of proceeding which may be adopted in a case of this kind, one is to charge the party with costs but, and if after the expiration of two months he still refuses or neglects, in that one Act of Parliament provides the means whereby the purchaser may obtain the money for which he has paid the purchase-money (11 G. 4 & 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35). This application is not, however, made in that way, by charging the party with contempt, but it is made, under the other Act of the 1 W. 4, c. 60, by the Respondent, who is a Co-defendant. He says, "I have purchased and paid the purchase-money; the legal estate is in Thomas Wood, my Co-defendant. The estate is in my hands, and therefore he is to be considered a trustee for me." The question to be considered, which is one of some importance, is whether he is such a trustee; and if so, even if the circumstances are such, that the party who has the means of obtaining the money in another mode should be allowed to adopt this.

I think that the Petitioner is entitled to this order, not only on the authority of the cases cited, but because [249] it is the more lenient course to pursue against the Respondent on to do the act. In this case Thomas Wood is in custody on other grounds; but if he had been at liberty, the course proposed would give a right to the Respondent without subjecting the other party to any imprisonment. I am rather inclined to give this construction to the Act of Parliament to prevent that severity; if the Respondent were free, and the Petitioner followed the other remedy, the result would be to bring him into custody, and keep him there two months more than anything could be done. This, therefore, is a more lenient course; and I am inclined to find that in adopting it I have the sanction of the authority of another

I think that the Respondent is not to pay the costs. The Petitioner comes here in the character of purchaser.

See v. Martin, 1865, 34 Beav. 504; In re Kirwan's Trusts, 1883, 25 Ch. D. 379.]

A testator gave his widow a power of appointment amongst his children over a sum of £12,000, which, in default of appointment, was given between them, but the shares of the children to be for their separate use for life, with remainder to their children. The widow, by a will not executed with the formalities required by the power, appointed the fund to the children equally. The Court supplied the formalities.

A testator gave a sum of £24,000 to trustees for his widow for life, with power to her of appointing £12,000, part thereof, amongst his children, by will attested by two witnesses, and in default of appointment to fall into the residue. The residue was between his children, but as to his daughters, for their separate use for life, with remainder to their children.

The widow, by a will which was not attested, appointed the £12,000 between her sons and daughters equally; and the question was, whether this Court would aid the defective execution.

[250] Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Bloxam argued that there was no case in which the Court would aid the defective execution of a power in favour of children, where the power might not be wholly defeated by the non-execution of the power; and that the children would take in default of appointment, with the advantage that the shares of the daughters would be for their separate use.

Kindersley and Mr. Collins contended that the Court would supply the defect in the execution of the power in favour of the children.

Tinney, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Freeling, in the same interest.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held that the formality was to be supplied, and that the daughters took absolute interests in their shares.

[250] FLEMING v. SNOOK. May 10, 1842.

Injunction to restrain the breach of a farming covenant.

Covenant in a farming lease not to sow with more than two grain crops during four years, Held to apply to any four years of the term however taken, and not to successive four years from the commencement.

In October 1835 the Plaintiff granted to the Defendants a lease of a farm ten years, which contained a covenant, "that the said lessees should not, nor would they sow any of the lands thereby demised with wheat more than once in four years with more than two crops of any kind of grain whatsoever during the same period of four years, and should and would, in all other respects, cultivate and manage the lands thereby demised according to the known and established rules of husbandry."

[251] The Plaintiff, on the allegation that the Defendants had violated the covenant, and that they were about to commit a further violation, filed this bill obtained an ex parte injunction to restrain the Defendants, in terms, from acting contrary to the covenant. The successive crops taken from one field (which is given as an example) were as follows:—

1837, Wheat.
1838, Turnips.
1839, Barley.
1840, Clover.
1841, Wheat.
1842, Intended for Barley.

It is unnecessary to state the others further than that the covenant had clearly violated as to part, and not as to another portion.

It was now moved, on the part of the Defendants, to dissolve the injunction as to part only of the property.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Selwyn, in support of the motion, contended according to the true construction of the covenant, a succession of periods of four years each were to be taken, commencing with the first year of the lease, and all that was forbidden by the covenant was, the taking two grain crops or more in any of such periods of four years; so that, in the example given, barley might be sowed on that field in 1842 without any infraction of the covenant.

They also argued that this was not like the cases of sowing a deleterious or mustard seed (Pratt v. Brett, 2 Mad. 62), or of effecting a permanent injury, as by ploughing up meadow land (Lord Grey de Wilton v. Saxon, 6 Ves. 328), and that the Plaintiff had therefore an ample remedy at law, and ought not to come into equity.

Mr. Pemberton, contra. The Defendants have acquiesced in the greater part of the injunction. The true construction of this covenant is, that the Defendants are not to have two grain crops in any successive four years, however taken. Defendants sow barley, then, in the four years commencing in 1839 they sow one wheat and two barley crops, which is contrary to what was the intention of the covenant.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears to me that the covenant the tenants are restrained from having more than two grain crops in any four years of the term. As to a part of one field, it appears there is no violation of the covenant; and as to that the injunction must be dissolved, so as to allow them to proceed to sow barley.

[253] PINKUS v. PETERS. May 26, 1842.

[Distinguished, Jackson v. Shanks, 1866, 12 Jur. (N. S.), 918.]

Suit was instituted to have a bill of exchange delivered up, on the ground of fraud, and to restrain an action at law commenced thereon. Pending the suit, the Plaintiff in the action recovered and obtained payment. Held, on demurrer, that the Plaintiff in equity might file a supplemental bill, stating these facts, and praying a repayment and indemnity. And it being stated in the original bill, though not in the supplemental bill, that the Plaintiff at law was a trustee for A. B. (Defendant to the original bill) and for another Defendant, Held, also, that A. B. was a necessary party to the supplemental bill, and that notwithstanding the 32d General Order of August 1841.

This was a demurrer to a supplemental bill, for want of equity and for want of

The original bill was filed against Peters, Carroll, and Hamburger, and alleged the Plaintiff had accepted two bills of exchange without consideration, and for accommodation of Peters; that Peters had fraudulently indorsed them to Carroll, without consideration, in order to compel the Plaintiff to pay them; that Carroll, knowing that no action could be sustained by them, indorsed them to Hamburger, who paid no consideration for them; and "that they were put in his hands merely as the trustee and agent of the said Defendants Peters and Carroll, or one of them, and that Hamburger was to account to them, or one of them, for what he should receive on the said bills."

The bill stated that an action had been brought against the Plaintiff on his behalf, in the name of Hamburger; and it prayed that the bills might be declared up to be cancelled: that Peters might indemnify the Plaintiff, in case he should be compelled to pay the bills, and for an injunction to restrain proceedings

The Plaintiff afterwards filed a supplemental bill against Hamburger and Peters (and Carroll), thereby stating the filing the original bill against the above-named Defendants, and thereby "stating, among other things, [254] sundry circumstances, by which it appeared that Peters and Carroll, or one of them, had fraudulently obtained from the Plaintiff two bills of exchange therein particularly described; and that Hamburger had become possessed of the said bills, or one of them, with cognizance of the fraud which had been committed upon the Plaintiff; and praying that the Defendants might be decreed to deliver up, and that Peters might be decreed to indemnify the Plaintiff against the same, in the event of the same not being delivered up, or the Plaintiff being compelled to pay the same to any bona fide holder, or an injunction; and that all the said Defendants, being served with process, should be decreed to the said bill; and the Defendants Carroll and Hamburger put in their answer thereto, wherefrom it appeared that Hamburger was the holder of one of the said bills of exchange, so fraudulently obtained from the Plaintiff, whereupon he commenced suing the Plaintiff at law, and that the Defendant Peters had not put in an answer. That not being able to obtain any answer to the bill from Peters, and having taken steps to enforce the same, considerable delay occurred before the Plaintiff could apply to this Honourable Court for an injunction to restrain the said action commenced by Hamburger; and that when the Plaintiff did apply for the injunction, the same was refused by the Master of the Rolls, principally because of the delay having occurred. That having failed in obtaining the injunction at law, for by his said bill, upon the statements in the said answers contained, the Defendant Hamburger proceeded with his action against the Plaintiff, on the ground of exchange so in his possession as aforesaid, and recovered a verdict against the Plaintiff therein, on the 28th of May 1841, for the sum of £88, 10s., and the costs, which said sums, amounting together to the sum of £141, 9s., were, on the 15th of [255] June 1841, paid to Messrs. Becke & Flower, as the attorneys for Hamburger, by or on behalf of the Plaintiff. That on the occasion of the payment of the said sum of £141, 9s. the Plaintiff caused a notice in writing, to be given by his solicitors to Messrs. Becke & Flower (the solicitors of Hamburger), to pay or part with any portion of the said sum of £141, 9s."

The bill charged that communications had taken place between the Defendants, which they had admitted the matters aforesaid to be true, &c.; and it prayed, that Hamburger might be decreed to repay to the Plaintiff the damages and costs recovered by him in the said action as aforesaid, and the costs and expenses of Plaintiff in such action; and that Peters might be decreed fully to indemnify Plaintiff against the same, in case Hamburger should not be able, or should not be held liable, to refund the same, and all costs, charges, and expenses, incurred or to be incurred in consequence or on account of the said two bills of exchange.

To this bill the Defendant Hamburger filed a general demurrer for want of equity and also for want of parties, on the ground that Carroll was a necessary party to a supplemental bill.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Freeling, in support of the demurrer. This supplemental bill is quite unnecessary, and the Plaintiff might, upon the original bill, have obtained the whole relief prayed by this new bill; at all events, he might have obtained it by a petition in the cause. In O'Connor v. Spaight (1 Sch. & Lef. 306), "a preliminary objection was [256] made, on the part of the Defendant, that as the possession had been changed pending the suit, by the execution of the habere" (the judgment subsequent to filing the bill), "and it was no part of the prayer of the original bill to have the possession restored, the Plaintiff ought to have filed a supplemental bill to put that matter in issue, and pray that specific relief. But Redesdale said that it was not the practice in England to file a supplemental bill where there was a mere change of possession upon an injunction being dissolved, where there were no accompanying circumstances, and where the only purpose of the bill would be to state that fact, because it was a fact within the view of the Court."

In Massey v. Davies (2 Ves. jun. 319) a bill was filed to restrain an action. When the answers came in, the injunction was dissolved, and the money was paid under the judgment; one objection was, that a supplemental bill was necessary to charge the fact that the injunction had been dissolved, and the money paid under the action. The Master of the Rolls however said, this "objection is very important point of precedent. It is insisted that, whatever the right of the Plaintiffs was, they could not obtain it upon this bill, originally an injunction bill, without a supplemental bill charging a fact, that has made, it is said, a material alteration since the original bill was filed. It struck me that, if this is the case, there must always be a supplemental bill in every case where a bill is filed to prevent the payment of money under a law, and the injunction is dissolved, and the money paid. It occurred to me that the practice was not so. If, upon the face of the bill, the equity is merely that the Defendant as agent shall not have profit out of a transaction [257]-tion by himself as agent and his employer as principal, in a particular concern, though the Plaintiffs cannot succeed in an action, yet the equity remains. Therefore, there is no reason to say, that because the Defendants have recovered at law that, which upon the face of the bill, they or one of them at least is not entitled to retain, a supplemental bill is necessary. It is a relief that arises out of the very relief prayed for in the bill. The Plaintiffs prayed more than they could have; they prayed an injunction to prevent the payment of the money. Therefore, there is an end of the objection of form."

Secondly, this bill is defective for want of parties. Hamburger is a true party, Carroll and Peters, and Carroll, therefore, ought to have been made a party to a supplemental bill.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. That fact does not appear on the supplemental bill. Can I go out of that bill upon the argument of a demurrer?]

Yes; not only must the Court have regard to the original bill, but even to the answer thereto. In Milner v. Lord Harewood (17 Ves. 149), which was a demurrer to a supplemental bill, Lord Eldon says, "upon the form of the supplemental bill, and the nature of the reference to the answer to the original bill, look at the original bill and the answer." So in Ellice v. Goodson (3 Myl. & C.

upon a demurrer to an amended bill, Lord Cottenham held that the Court was entitled to look to the whole record, viz., the original bill and the answer thereto.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Glasse, in support of the bill.

[288] The Plaintiff is right in bringing before the Court, by supplemental bill, facts which have taken place since the institution of the original suit; Redesdale (75 (4th ed.)), such as the recovery of the amount by Hamburger, and the subsequent conversations between the parties, otherwise these facts would not be put in, and evidence could not be entered into to prove them. This could not be done by petition. In Usborne v. Baker (2 Mad. 379) a supplemental bill of discovery was, on demurrer, to be good, it inquiring as to material facts which occurred subsequent to the filing of the original bill. In The Marquis of Waterford v. Knight (12 & Fin. 270), a Plaintiff filed a bill in the Court of Exchequer for an account of, and for discovery and relief. The Defendant, being an infant, put in his answer by his guardian. The answer set up an immemorial payment in lieu of, but did not make the required discovery. When the Defendant came of age the Plaintiff filed a supplemental bill against him, alleging the existence of new facts, and praying for discovery and relief. It was held that such a bill could be supported.

The 32d Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 174) relieves the Plaintiff from the necessity of making Carroll a party, especially as no relief is sought against him.

Mr. Turner, in reply. Unless there is a substantial change in the rights of the parties, no supplemental bill is necessary, and the Plaintiff would be entitled under the prayer for general relief to what he seeks.

[289] The conversations between the parties are not stated to have taken place subsequent to the filing of the original bill.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill was filed by the Plaintiff to have a bill of exchange delivered up, which he says he is not bound to pay, and an injunction in the meantime, and for further relief. The injunction was granted, and it is stated in the present bill that in consequence the action proceeded, judgment was recovered, and that the Plaintiff has paid the principal money and costs of the action; and it alleges that there have been various communications and correspondence between the parties. The Plaintiff, by the present bill, now asks, in substance, that he may have the amount of the money and costs which he has been compelled to pay, paid back to him. To this bill a general demurrer is put. This demurrer has been argued in the only way in which, on the authorities, it can be argued, viz., that such a bill was unnecessary; and it is inferred that if it is not necessary it ought not to have been filed at all, and that a general demurrer should hold. I do not see the force of the inference. A new fact is introduced, and circumstances are stated to have taken place, in consequence of which the Plaintiff cannot have the relief specifically prayed by the original bill; but he is, nevertheless, entitled to relief adapted to the circumstances which have since taken place.

Instead of asking the delivery up of the bill, he now asks for repayment of money and costs. If the original bill went to a hearing, the Court could not grant that relief without introduction, in some way, of the new facts which have taken place. It is said, those facts must not be introduced by supplemental bill, as they might be brought forward by a petition, and affidavits in support of it, or by interrogatories between the parties; and if the parties refused to make the admissions (which is very probable in such a case as this), then that the Court would refer the matter to the Master to inquire into the circumstances. Something would have to be done at the hearing; and if the Court could plainly see the new facts, I have no doubt that relief, adapted to the new circumstances, would be granted. It may be said that a supplemental bill would not be necessary in a case where, the equity being the same, the Court could properly take cognizance of facts whereby relief differing in principle, but different in form from the relief in the original bill, might be granted.

The question is, whether the Plaintiff has not a right to anticipate all the facts, by filing a supplemental bill to bring these new circumstances before the Court in a formal manner. I think he has a right to bring forward these circumstances in the way he has done. If it should turn out to be an unnecessary proceeding, means will be found for making him answer for the costs he has used or created. This, as a general demurrer, cannot therefore be sustained.

On the question of parties, I think that the allegations in the bill, that Hambro is a trustee for Carroll and Peters, make Carroll a necessary party. I must, therefore, allow the demurrer, as to parties, with liberty to amend by adding parties.

Demurrer allowed for want of parties.

[261] SIDEBOTHAM v. BARRINGTON. June 8, 1842.

[S. C. 3 Beav. 524; 4 Beav. 110. See Fraser v. Wood, 1845, 8 Beav. 342.]

The owner of an estate took the benefit of the Insolvent Act, and afterwards became bankrupt. The assignees in bankruptcy, without communicating with the assignee of the insolvency, in whom the estate was vested, sold it. Pending a suit instituted by the vendors for a specific performance, the assignees of insolvency affirmed the sale. A specific performance was decreed.

A vendor filed a bill for specific performance, alleging that the Defendant had accepted the title; the Defendant resisted it on the ground that the bankruptcy under which the Plaintiff claimed was invalid. Neither allegation turned out correct, though a good title was first shewn in the Master's office, the decree was made without costs.

This case is reported ante (3 Beav. 524, 4 Beav. 110). The Master having reported on the reference, that, with the concurrence of the assignee under the insolvency, the vendors could make a good title, this cause came on for further directions. The principal question discussed was as to the costs of the suit. The circumstances at this point are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Teed, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Romilly, for the Defendant.

Townsend v. Champenourne (3 Y. & Col. 505; and see Scoones v. Morrell, 1 Y. & Col. 251), and Sugden's Vendors, ch. 10, s. 2, were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiff in his bill alleged that the Defendant had accepted his title, and insisted that he was bound to take the title, such as it was. The claim turned out to be unfounded: it appeared that the Defendant had not accepted the title, and that he had a right to have it investigated. The Defendant insisted that the Plaintiff had no title, because the fiat in bankruptcy was altogether invalid. That defence has turned out to be unfounded.

[262] A reference as to the title was made, when it appeared that the Plaintiff could not make a good title without the concurrence of the assignee of the insolvency, and the Master accordingly reported against the title. On the discussion of the exceptions taken by the Plaintiff to the report, it was found that such concurrence was wanting, and the exceptions were therefore overruled. It being alleged that the concurrence of the assignee of the insolvency was the only thing wanting to make a good title, and that the assignee would join, leave was given to present a petition to have a reference back to the Master. On that reference the Master has found that with the concurrence of the assignee of the insolvency, a good title can be made, and the cause now comes on for further directions.

As to the costs of the suit; if the Plaintiff in this bill had proceeded on his first allegation: "I have entered into a contract, and am ready to perform it, and you refuse," and the Defendant had answered, "I admit the contract and am ready to perform it, but you cannot make a good title without the concurrence of the assignee of the insolvency, which you refuse to obtain;" if that had been the only question in litigation, and a good title, i.e., in the case supposed, the concurrence of the assignee had been first shewn in the Master's office, then the Plaintiff would have had the costs of the suit. That is the general rule, but it is not a rule applicable to every case whatever; it is subject to a variety of modifications arising out of the particular circumstances of each case.

Here both parties made erroneous allegations, the Plaintiff alleged that Defendant had accepted the title; the Defendant that a good title could not be made because the fiat was invalid. The real question never occurred to either party in a very late period in the cause. I think, under the circumstances, I cannot give to either side. There must be a decree for specific performance without costs. The Plaintiff however must pay the costs of the petition.

[263] HILTON V. LORD GRANVILLE. June 9, 1842.

was given to the Plaintiff in equity to bring an action at law. After the action had been commenced the Plaintiff died; his heir revived the suit, and obtained leave, on a motion which was unopposed, to continue the action. The Defendant applied to this Court that the new Plaintiff might give security for the costs of the action. The Court considered that it had no jurisdiction so to order, but it suspended the prosecution of the action until security had been given.

On application being made for an injunction, the motion was ordered to stand over, and liberty was given to the Plaintiff, William Hilton, to bring such action at law as he should be advised. (4 Beav. 130, and Cr. & Ph. 283.)

The Plaintiff accordingly brought an action of trespass in the Court of Queen's Bench, but the Plaintiff died before plea. John Hilton, the son and heir of William Hilton, afterwards revived the suit, and applied to this Court for liberty to prosecute the action of June 1841, either by continuing the action brought in the name of his father, or by commencing a new action.

The application, not being opposed by the Defendant, was granted, and John Hilton was ordered to prosecute the action commenced by his father.

An application was made to a Judge of the Queen's Bench for time to plead, and that the Plaintiff might give security for costs. The Judge gave time to plead, but refused that the application as to costs ought to be made here.

[264] The Defendant now moved, that the Plaintiff might give security for the costs of the action according to the practice of the Queen's Bench, and, in the meantime, that the proceedings might be stayed in the action.

Mr. Pemberton, for the Defendant, in support of the motion. According to the practice of the Common Law Courts, where a Plaintiff is domiciled abroad, or is a foreign Plaintiff, he must give security for costs; Wordsworth's New Rules, p. 104. John Hilton is a mere nominal Plaintiff, and would have been ordered to give security for costs, if the Judge at Common Law had not considered that the action was under the control and direction of this Court. It would be unreasonable to allow him to prosecute the benefit of the action brought in the name of his father, without, at the same time, making him liable to the costs of it, in case of his failing in it.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Hardy, contra. Where a party takes any proceeding in a Court, he loses his right to security for costs, even if taken under mistake. Dyott v. Dyott (187). Here, by the application for time to plead, the Defendant lost his right to security for costs, if he ever had any.

The Court gave the Plaintiff liberty to bring the action merely in order that he might not thereby prejudice his proceedings here; but it has no jurisdiction to make an order as to the costs of an action at law. If the Court had jurisdiction it must be exercised at the hearing, when the whole cause will be disposed of.

[265] Again, the application for security for costs ought to have been made when the Plaintiff moved for leave to prosecute the order, and not at a subsequent period.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. When the facts are simply stated, no reasonable doubt can be entertained as to what ought to be done in this case.

The action was filed by William Hilton against Lord Granville, to restrain him from working certain mines. A motion was made for an injunction, which was neither granted nor refused, but was directed to stand over, with liberty for the Plaintiff to bring an action to try the question of right, which, as far as I recollect it, involved a considerable difficulty and importance.

William Hilton accordingly commenced an action, which was pending at his death. At his death, John Hilton, the present Plaintiff, filed his bill of revivor in this Court, and the suit being revived on the 22d of April 1842, he asked leave either to continue the action brought in the name of William Hilton or to commence a new one. Notice of that application was given, and an intimation was made on the part of Lord Granville, that he did not intend to oppose it; leave was thereupon given to proceed in either of the two forms. It was never imagined by the Court, or by anybody else, that the action would be exempt from the ordinary incidents of an action at law; one of which incidents being, that where an action is brought in the name of a dead person, security must be given for costs. Is a party to have the benefit of those proceedings free from the risk of costs? Is it not highly important that the Defendant should have some security for the costs which may be awarded, and that there should be some person against whom he may proceed to recover them, if the [266] occasion arises, and if there is no such person, then that he should have the next substitute, viz., a security?

It is said, that the Defendant ought to have seen that the order made on the former application was such as not to exonerate the present Plaintiff from the costs of the action. I am of opinion that it was not the natural or necessary consequence of the order, that John Hilton should be exonerated from the payment of all costs, if he chose to proceed in a form in which the Defendant would have no means of obtaining costs except by having security. I think the Defendant, having no intention to oppose the motion, was perfectly right in not appearing upon it and creating difficulty.

The next objection is that the Judge at Common Law has given the Defendant time to plead. It may possibly be, that at law the Defendant's right to have security for costs is lost by applying for time to plead. But how was it here?—application was made both for time to plead and for security for costs. The Judge gave no opinion that (having regard to the form of this action, and the circumstances under which it was brought) the Defendant was not entitled to security for costs, but he conceived that he was precluded from considering the question, in consequence of the action being prosecuted under the leave of this Court; and, for anything I know to the contrary on the present occasion, he would have ordered security for costs to be given if he had not entertained that opinion. The Defendant then comes here, and informs me, that the action is being prosecuted in a manner highly disadvantageous to him for the action being in a form in which, according to the ordinary rules, the Defendant would be entitled to security for costs, he has been unable to obtain such security because the Judge at Common Law imagined, that as the order giving leave to proceed at law was made here, he ought not to enter into that question. Is it right or equitable that I should permit the Plaintiff to prosecute this action in a manner unjust? I can only act on the order I made; and if the Plaintiff prosecutes the action it will be under the continuation of the leave given him here to do so. Under the circumstances I am not disposed to continue that leave; and if the motion before me had been to discharge that order I would have done it, in order that the parties might proceed on just terms.

I have no authority to make an order as to the Plaintiff's giving security for costs in the Queen's Bench (see Desprez v. Mitchell, 5 Mad. 87); but I have authority, upon this motion, to stay the proceedings on the former order, until I can see that it will be prosecuted in a more just and equitable manner. If the Plaintiff wishes to proceed on the order he must then make an application for leave, which can only be granted on proper terms.

By arrangement, the Plaintiff agreed to give security in this Court for the costs of the action.

A testator gave his residuary estate to his wife for life, and then to be divided into three shares, and he gave one-third between the children of his brother T. B., living at the death of his wife, one-third to his niece F. G., and the remaining one-third to his nephew and niece, T. B. and S. B.; and in case such, any, or either of them should die, having left a child or children surviving them, he declared that the expectant's share should go between his or her children. T. B.'s children all died in the lifetime of the widow, but some left children. Held, that the latter were entitled to the first-mentioned one-third.

Husband and wife, entitled in the wife's right to a share of residue, were living apart, and they defended separately. Held, entitled to only one set of costs.

Party entitled to a share of the residue became bankrupt. Held, that he and his creditors were entitled to one set of costs between them.

A testator gave the residue of his real and personal estate in trust for his wife for life, and he directed the whole to be converted at her decease, and divided into three equal shares and proportions amongst the several parties after named, that is to say, one-third part or share thereof unto the child or children of his brother Thomas Baker who should be living at the time of the decease of his said wife, in equal shares and proportions, and if but one child living, then the whole to that one, to and for his, her, and their own absolute use and disposal; and he also gave and bequeathed the third part or share thereof unto Fanny Garey, described as Frances Garey daughter of his brother Aaron Baker, to and for her absolute use and disposal; and he likewise gave and bequeathed the remaining third part or share thereof to Thomas Baker and Sarah Baker, therein described as the son and daughter of his brother John Baker, in equal shares and proportions, to and for his, her, and their absolute use and disposal; and in case such, any, or either of them should die, leaving left a child or children surviving, then he declared that the expectant's share should go to and be equally divided between and amongst his or her child or children, in equal shares and proportions, if more than one, and if but one child living, then the whole to that one; and [269] in failure of issue, then to be divided between and amongst the survivor or survivors of his said nephews and nieces as aforesaid, in equal shares and proportions.

Thomas Baker, the brother of the testator, had ten children, all of whom died in the lifetime of the testator's widow, and three only of them left children.

The testator's widow died in 1840; and the question was, whether the children of Thomas Baker were entitled to the first-mentioned one-third of the residue.

Kindersley and Mr. Spurrier contended that the one-third had lapsed, in consequence of there being no child of Thomas Baker living at the decease of the testator. That the latter clause "and in case such, any, or either," &c., was not applicable to the shares of the children of Thomas Baker, who had not expectant, but contingent shares. That these words referred to the last antecedent, and were applicable only to the shares of Thomas and Sarah Baker. They cited Christopherson (1 Mer. 320), Towney v. Ward (1 Beav. 563), Ward v. Ward (3 Mer. 706).

Webster and Mr. Greene, for parties in the same interest.

James Campbell and Mr. Addis. The children of the children of Thomas Baker are entitled to one-third of the residue. The words "if any," &c., form part of the whole sentence, and can only be satisfied by applying them to the children of Thomas Baker. The share [270] was not the less an expectancy because it was contingent; and the Court will struggle to avoid an intestacy. They cited Giles v. Giles (Sim. 360).

Kindersley, in reply.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said there was certainly great ambiguity and obscurity in the terms of the will, and that there had been evidently words omitted; that he thought that, in ordinary language, persons whose shares were contingent were equally expectants with those who had vested shares; and on the whole he was of opinion that the grandchildren of Thomas Baker were entitled to the one-third intended for their parents if they had survived the testator.

and Mrs. Copeland, the latter of whom was entitled to a share of the residue, were living apart, and appeared separately.

MASTER OF THE ROLLS held that they were entitled to one set of costs only.

Lordship applied the same rule to William Garey, one of the residuary legatees, and his assignees, who were made parties to the suit, and appear separately.

[271] AGABEG v. HARTWELL. June 28, 1842.

By the decree the costs of all parties were ordered to be taxed as between solicitor and client. Upon a rehearing the decree was affirmed, and the deposit was ordered to be returned, but nothing was said as to costs. By a subsequent order the costs of all parties were ordered to be taxed, as between solicitor and client, from the last taxation. Held, that this did not include the costs of the rehearing. The costs of rehearings are not carried by the words "costs of suit as between solicitor and client," but they require to be specially mentioned in the order for taxation.

Semble. The same rule applies to the costs of appeals, and exceptions.

This case again came before the Court upon petition under the following circumstances:—

On the 6th of August 1832, upon petition for payment of a sum out of Court order was made by the Vice-Chancellor, inter alia, to tax all parties their costs relating to the suit as between solicitor and client.

On the 15th of February 1833, by the decree of the Vice-Chancellor, an order was made, inter alia, to tax all parties their costs of this suit, subsequent to the taxation thereof, as between solicitor and client.

On the 22d of May 1834, upon a rehearing before the Lord Chancellor, the decree was affirmed. The deposit was ordered to be returned, but nothing was said as to costs.

On the 12th of May 1835 an order to tax all parties their costs, as between solicitor and client, of and relating to these suits, subject to the last taxation of costs was made by the decree of the Master of the Rolls.

On the 12th of December 1837 an appeal was heard, and a decree made by the House of Lords, whereby the decrees of the Vice-Chancellor and Lord Chancellor were reversed, and the case was referred back to the Court of Chancery.

On the 28th of April 1840 an order was made by the Lord Chancellor, affirming the orders, and proceedings [272] in conformity to the order of the House of Lords, but no variation was made in the order for the taxation of costs.

The question was, whether the decree of the 12th of May 1835 entitled the parties to their costs of the rehearing before the Lord Chancellor in May 1834.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. F. H. Goldsmid, in support of the petition.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Blunt, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he should inquire of the sworn clerks what the understood practice in such cases.

The sworn clerks returned the following certificate:—

"Six Clerks' Office, June 25th, 1842.

"We, the undersigned Clerks in Court, beg leave to state that we are of opinion that the Lord Chancellor's Order of the 22d of May 1834, giving back the deposit to the Petitioner, is a disposal of the question of costs of the rehearing; and that the order of the 12th May 1835, though it gives all parties their costs, as between solicitor and client, of and relating to these suits, subsequent to the last taxation, would not authorise the Master to include the costs of the rehearing, because it was not giving the order of the Master of the Rolls, by whom the order of 12th May 1835 was made, the effect of giving costs which the Lord Chancellor, by his order of 22d May 1834, had refused to give.

[273] "It is a general rule that costs of appeals, rehearings, and exceptions are not carried by the words 'Costs of suit as between solicitor and client,' but they require to be specially mentioned in the order for taxation.

"RICHARD MILLS.

"JOHN WAINEWRIGHT.

"JAMES THOMAS HOBBS.

June 28. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after referring to the decree, decided in conformity therewith.

[273] WILLIAMS v. KNIPE. June 25, 27, 1842.

testator bequeathed an annuity, to cease in case the legatee, if required, should not execute a release. A release was tendered, which A. refused to execute. It was proved that the legatee knew the contents of the deed, or that any explanation was offered to him; and it appeared to have contained an inaccurate recital. Held, that there was no forfeiture.

Fact that the Plaintiff had filed a bill in this Court being relied on by the Defendant as having worked a forfeiture of his interest: Held, that the mere production of the office copy was not sufficient evidence, there being no proof of identity; and, secondly, that the Defendant was not entitled to an inquiry on the point.

William Williams, by his will, dated the 19th of October 1822, directed his trustees to pay to the Plaintiff an annuity of £30 during his life, and gave the residue of his estate, subject to the trusts of his will, to the Defendant William Williams. And in order to settle any dispute or question which might, by any possibility, arise, he directed that, if thereunto required, the Plaintiff should give to the trustees and executors any release or other discharge, in respect of anything done by the testator under the will of his deceased brother Thomas of and from all claims and demands whatsoever which the Plaintiff had, or could or might have, against the testator, his executors or [274] administrators, under the same. And he declared and directed that the annuity, by the will bequeathed to the Plaintiff, should be contingent thereon; and in case of his refusal so to do, or in case of his making any claim under the same, the annuity should cease and determine to all intents and purposes.

There was no time limited within which the release was to be given, and no condition as to the gift over.

The testator was stated to have died on the 12th of February 1828. The annuity was to commence and be computed from the end of twelve calendar months after his death, that is, in February 1829; and in the course of the year 1829 the trustees paid to the Plaintiff three-quarters of a year's annuity. The payments then ceased, and in August 1841 the Plaintiff filed the present bill for relief; and in the bill alleged that he had never been called upon to give any release or other discharge in respect of anything done under the will of the testator's deceased brother Thomas, or of, or against any claims or demands whatsoever which the Plaintiff might have against the testator, his executors or administrators, under the same; and he stated that he was ready and willing to execute a proper release.

The Defendants, by their answer, stated several objections to the Plaintiff's bill, and, amongst others, that the Plaintiff filed a bill to establish against the Defendant's estate those claims and demands, which, by the condition stated in the will, were to have been released. They also stated that, in February 1830, the Defendants tendered a proper deed of release to be tendered to the Plaintiff for his execution, and that he refused to execute the same. The only evidence on the subject was, that the Plaintiff required the Plaintiff to execute a deed [275] which he produced to him, and which he now produced, and that the Plaintiff then refused to execute the same. The bill purported to bear date the 13th of February 1830. It recited that the testator died on the 12th of February 1828, and that the several annuities had been paid according to the directions of the will.

Pemberton and Mr. G. L. Russell, for the Plaintiff.

Kindersley, for the Defendants, contended that the Plaintiff had forfeited his right to the annuity, first, by filing his bill against the testator's executors, and, secondly, by his refusal to execute a proper release. Vernon v. Bethell (2 Eden, 110). He proposed to give in evidence an office copy of the bill alleged to have been filed against the testator's representatives; but there was no evidence to identify the bill in that case with the Plaintiff in the present case.

Mr. Pemberton objected to this evidence, as there was no proof of identity.

Mr. Kindersley. The Defendants are, at all events, entitled to an inquiry as to that fact.

Mr. Pemberton. Where a fact is the foundation of a decree or defence, and the party by his own neglect fails in proving it, the Court never grants an inquiry. The late Lord Chancellor acted on that principle in Marten v. Whitchelo (Cr. & Ph. 257).

[276] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The Defendants have not proved enough. They have shewn that a bill was filed in this Court by a person of the name of Williams. The office copy shews this; but it does not prove that the Plaintiff filed the bill or has incurred the forfeiture. I do not think the Defendants entitled to an inquiry.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. It does not appear that the release was ever submitted for the Plaintiff's perusal before he was called upon to execute it. He was not compellable to execute it without having an opportunity of investigating it. It recites too that the annuity had been duly paid, which was not the fact, as on the 12th of February 1830, the day before the date of the deed, a further quarter's annuity became due.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would look at the papers in order to satisfy himself whether the Plaintiff had refused to execute a proper release.

June 27. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Defendants have stated that the Plaintiff actually filed a bill to establish, against the testator's estate, those claims and demands which, by the condition stated in the will, he ought to have released. I think that the fact of this claim, though probably true, is not established by evidence.

I reserved for consideration the part of the defence which stated the tender of the release, and the refusal of the Plaintiff to execute it. The Defendants have adduced any evidence to shew that the Plaintiff knew the contents of the deed which he refused to execute, or [277] that any explanation of it was offered to him. If the facts were as stated, that is, if the testator died on the 12th of February 1829, then, on the 13th of February 1830, four quarters of the annuity had become due and had been paid, if all the annuities had been, as recited, duly paid according to the directions of the will; but in the pleadings of this cause it is admitted that only three quarters of the annuity had been paid; and consequently the Plaintiff would be entitled to recover the one-quarter's payment which accrued due before his refusal. I can well suppose that the payment of the fourth quarter was withheld only because the Plaintiff refused to execute the deed; but there is no evidence of that, and no proof of the truth of the recital.

It is very much to be regretted that the facts of this case have been so imperfectly established, but having considered the provisions of the will, and the fact which is proved, I am of opinion that it is now competent to the Plaintiff to execute a proper release, so as to entitle himself to the annuity. I must refer it to the Master to settle a proper release, to be executed according to the testator's will, and order the Plaintiff to execute such deed in a month after the Master shall have approved thereof. And if the Plaintiff shall not execute the same within such time, let the bill be dismissed with costs to be paid by the Plaintiff; but if the Plaintiff shall so execute the same, let the Master take an account of the arrears of the annuity due to the Plaintiff, and order the Defendant William Williams to pay the same, and also to pay to the Plaintiff all sums of money hereafter to become due in respect of the annuity; and if the Plaintiff shall execute such deed within such time as aforesaid, no costs on either side.

NOTE.—The decision was appealed from, but was afterwards, as I am informed, compromised.

[278] ARMITAGE AND MILTON v. BALDWIN. March 15, 17, 1842.

A creditor sued his principal debtor, and recovered a judgment against him and the bail in the action. The surety thereupon "paid and satisfied" to the creditor the amount of the judgments, &c., and took an assignment thereof. Held, that the judgment was discharged, and that the surety could not recover on the judgment against the bail.

This case came before the Court on general demurrer.

According to the statements in the bill, Hamer, in the year 1829, borrowed a sum of money from Armitage, which was secured by a bill of exchange, in which Milton joined as surety. The bill not having been paid, Armitage, in 1830, commenced an action against Hamer for the recovery thereof. Hamer was arrested, and thereupon Rigbye became his bail, and entered into the usual recognizance. Judgment was recovered against Hamer, who neither surrendered in discharge of his bail nor paid the debt, whereupon judgment was, in 1832, entered up by Armitage against Rigbye as bail.

In 1834 Armitage ultimately insisted on Milton paying the amount, and as was stated in the bill, he accordingly "duly paid and satisfied to Armitage the full amount of the said judgment, with interest, and all costs incurred by him in relation hereto; and by a deed-poll, bearing date the 23d day of April 1834, Armitage duly assigned and transferred unto Milton the two judgments for the sum of £688, 10s., and also all benefit, profit, and advantage whatsoever that might thereafter be obtained by reason of the same."

The bill alleged, "that under the circumstances aforesaid the Plaintiff Milton became absolutely entitled, in equity, to the benefit of the said judgments, but the same still remained vested at law in the Plaintiff Armitage, as trustee for the Plaintiff Milton." It also stated that in 1841 a writ of scire facias was issued by Armitage against [279] Rigbye upon the judgment. The writ was delivered to the sheriff, who returned that Rigbye had nothing in his bailiwick whereby he could give notice, nor was the said Rigbye found within the same; and afterwards, in December 1841, Armitage, by leave of the Court, duly signed and entered up final judgment against Rigbye upon the said writ of scire facias.

The judgment was registered and an elegit issued. The bill charged, that in Easter term 1836 Rigbye obtained a rule in His Majesty's Court of King's Bench, compelling on the Plaintiff Joseph Armitage to shew cause why the said judgment should not be set aside; and cause was afterwards shewn accordingly by the said Plaintiff; and, after argument, the said rule was discharged by the Court of King's Bench, with costs (see the case in 5 A. & E. 76); and it stated that various other proceedings had been taken, by or on behalf of Rigbye, to defeat the Plaintiff's said judgment.

This bill was filed by Armitage and Milton seeking to establish, by virtue of the judgment (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13), a charge on the estate of Rigbye, the bail, and which he had vested in trustees.

The Defendants demurred for want of equity and want of parties.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. J. V. Prior, in support of the demurrer. The Plaintiffs proceed on two grounds, first on the rights of the Plaintiffs under the statute of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13, and, secondly, on their general rights as judgment creditors; but the whole equity in reality depends on Armitage being a trustee for Milton of a valid subsisting judgment. The creditor having obtained a judgment against the principal debtor and his bail, the bail then became, equally with Milton, liable for Hamer; and this is a mere attempt by one surety to make his co-surety pay the whole debt. It is clear, that on payment of the debt by Milton, the debt was discharged, and the right of Armitage to prosecute the bail was gone. A Court of law would not afterwards have allowed Armitage to proceed. Copis v. Middleton (Turn. & Russ. 224), Doubbiggen v. Bourne (2 You. & C. 462), Hodgson v. Shaw (3 Myl. & K. 183).

The Plaintiffs are not entitled in respect of the judgment in 1841, because the judgment of 1832, on which it was founded, was then already satisfied. They argued also that the bill was defective for want of parties.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rolt, in support of the bill, contended that it was a mere fallacy to say that Milton was a co-surety in respect of the judgment debt against Rigbye. That the judgment of 1832, or at all events that of 1841, was still subsisting at law, and that the Plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of it. That in every case a surety was entitled to all the remedies of the creditor. In Wright v. Marley (11 Ves. 22) Lord Eldon says, "I conceive that, as the creditor is entitled to the benefit of all the securities the principal debtor has given to his surety, the surety has full as good an equity to the benefit of all the securities the principal gives to the creditor. There is a very strong instance of the application of that equity in Parsons v. Bridgock (2 Vern. 608). The [281] principal had given bail in an action. Judgment was recovered against the bail. Afterwards the surety was called upon and paid, and it was held, that he was entitled to an assignment of the judgment against the bail; so that though the bail were themselves but sureties, as between them and the principal debtor, yet coming in the room of the principal debtor, as to the creditor, it was held, that they likewise came in the room of the principal debtor as to the surety. Consequently, that decision established, that the surety had precisely the same right that the creditor had, and was to stand in his place. The surety had no direct contract or engagement by which the bail were bound to him, but only a claim against them through the medium of the creditor, and was entitled only to all his rights. There are other cases establishing the same principle, though not quite so strong as that."

The Plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to equitable relief in respect of the judgment debt. Their rights as against the estate of Rigbye being interfered with by the prior mortgages, and the voluntary deed executed by Rigbye, it is necessary for them to come into equity for relief; Neale v. The Duke of Marlborough (3 Myl. & Cr. 407).

The following cases were also cited; Powell v. Eason (8 Bing. 23), Hocken v. Browne (4 Bing. N. C. 400), Abbott v. Bruere (5 Bing. N. C. 598), Ex parte Wyldman (2 Ves. sen. 113).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The real question which I have to decide here is, whether upon the allegations contained in this bill there [282] is a valid existing judgment, which can be made available at law against the estate of Rigbye, for that is the whole object of the suit. Having carefully read through the bill, I do not think it improbable that the Plaintiffs may by a proper proceeding ultimately succeed in establishing a right against the Defendant. But the question is, whether the allegations in this bill intitle them to relief. The bill alleges that at this time there is a valid judgment at law which can be made available against the party against whom it is entered up, and also alleges that the Plaintiff Milton "did paid and satisfied to Armitage the full amount of the said judgment with interest and all costs," &c. How can I conclude, that notwithstanding the judgment, and the interest and costs incurred in relation thereto, have been fully paid and satisfied, the judgment can now be made available at law?

It is said I ought to do so, because there is an allegation, that, in 1836 (which was after the judgment had been "paid and satisfied") some proceedings took place in relation to it. The bill states that in 1836 Rigbye obtained a rule in the King's Bench, calling upon the Plaintiff Armitage to shew cause why the judgment should not be set aside, &c., &c. It is obvious that at the time these proceedings took place there might have been something to be done upon the judgment for the purpose of recovering costs which might have been then due, though not due at the time the bill was filed; but the allegation in this bill is distinct: that the full amount of the judgment, with interest and all costs, has been paid and satisfied. Under the circumstances I cannot come to the conclusion that there is at this time an existing judgment which can be made available at law; and if so; the very foundation of the equity sought to be established by this bill fails. I must, [283] therefore, allow the demurrer, giving to the Plaintiffs the opportunity of amending their bill if they think fit to do so.

My present impression is, that the mortgagees, the purchasers, and Hamer are not necessary parties. I throw out this opinion because it may assist the parties.

might, however, alter my opinion in that respect upon hearing a reply on the point, which I have not done. I thought it unnecessary, as I had come to a conclusion on the other ground of demurrer.

[283] GRIEVESON v. KIRSOPP. June 27, 28, 1842.

An estate directed to be sold was limited to A. for life, and (as was then supposed) a moiety thereof was, as real estate, limited to B. in remainder. A. conveyed, and B. confirmed B.'s moiety and all their estate, &c., therein by way of mortgage, and they further assured it by fine. It turned out that B. had one-fifth only in remainder as personalty. Held, that A.'s interest in one-fifth only was affected by the mortgage.

Under the will of the testator, dated in 1795, his widow, Mrs. Carr, was entitled for life to a freehold property called Staley, as to which, the testator had given certain directions respecting the sale for the benefit of his six children. The interests of the parties in remainder had not, in the year 1819, been ascertained, but it was supposed, that subject to the life interest of Mrs. Carr, the property belonged, as real estate, to Mary Kirsopp and Sarah Carr Grieveson (the child of a deceased child of the testator), in coparcenary.

At this time (1819), Sarah Carr, the widow, Mary Kirsopp (the wife of John Kirsopp), John Grieveson, and Sarah Carr the younger, were indebted to Michael Dodd, on bond, in the sum of £200; and John Kirsopp was indebted to Sarah Carr, the widow, in the sum of [284] £1000 and upwards. Under these circumstances a deed was executed, dated in December 1819, which was made between Sarah Carr, widow, of the first part, John Kirsopp and Mary his wife of the second part, a trustee of the third part, and Dodd and wife of the fourth part, reciting the death of four out of the six of the testator's children without issue, and either intestate or infants; and reciting the death of Mrs. Grieveson (another of the six children), leaving Sarah Carr Grieveson an infant, "in whom, together with Mary Kirsopp, the real estate of the said testator was then vested in coparcenary," subject to a mortgage and to such interest as Sarah Carr had therein; and also reciting that Dodd and Mabel his wife had, at the request of the said Sarah Carr, the widow, and the said John Kirsopp and Mary his wife, agreed to lend them the sum of £1000 to pay off the debt due from John Kirsopp to Sarah Carr, upon having that sum and the £200 due on bond secured on mortgage of the undivided moieties, hereditaments, and premises as hereinafter mentioned; it was witnessed, that, in consideration of £1000 paid to Sarah Carr by Dodd and wife, and the £200 due, Sarah Carr did grant, &c., and convey, and John Kirsopp and wife did grant, &c., and confirm unto the trustee and his heirs, that one undivided moiety or half part of them the said John Kirsopp and Mary his wife, in right of the said Mary, and of and in the said estate and premises called Staley therein particularly described, and the allotments thereto, and also of and in all other messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments whatsoever, late of him the said John Carr the testator in the parish of Staley aforesaid, and all the estate, right, title, interest, possession, property, claim, and demand whatsoever of them the said Sarah Carr and John Kirsopp and Mary his wife, or any or either of them, of, in, or by the said undivided moieties, hereditaments, and premises, and [285] every part and parcel thereof, in trust for Dodd and his wife, subject to redemption. There was a covenant to levy fines, which were to enure to the use of the trustee for Dodd and his wife, and a proviso for redemption on payment of £1200 and interest to Dodd and his wife, by Kirsopp and his wife; and on payment there was to be a reconveyance to Kirsopp and his wife, or as they appointed, subject to the mortgage, and subject to the interest of Sarah Carr; and Kirsopp personally covenanted to pay the mortgage money.

In 1824 a fine was levied pursuant to the covenant.

Long after the date of the deed, it was ascertained (2 Keen, 653) that the property belonged to the widow for life, with remainder (as personal estate) in fifth shares between Mrs. Kirsopp the surviving child, and the representatives of the four deceased children.

Mrs. Carr the widow, as representing her deceased children, became entitled to one-sixth part of the produce of the estate. She died in 1829.

Under these circumstances a question arose, as to the extent to which the interest of Mrs. Carr, the widow, was affected by the deed of 1819.

Mr. Purvis contended, that the deed and fine operated on the whole of the widow's interest in a moiety of the property.

Mr. Pemberton, contra, contended that the effect of the deed and fine was, to make merely the widow's interest [286] in the share which Kirsopp and wife actually conveyed, viz., one-fifth, liable to the mortgage.

June 28. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. At the date of the deed in question, viz., on the 31st of December 1819, Mrs. Carr was entitled to the premises therein comprised for her life, and subject to her life interest, the property, as personal estate, belonged in fifth shares to her surviving child, and the personal representatives of her four deceased children. The rights of the children had not then been ascertained, and it was supposed, that, subject to the life interest of Mrs. Carr, the property belonged, as real estate, to Mrs. Kirsopp and the child of a deceased child, in coparcenary.

At the same time, a debt of £200 was owing to Michael Dodd, as executor of Paul Vaillant, which was secured by the bond of Sarah Carr, Mary Kirsopp, John Grieverson, and Sarah Carr the younger; a debt of £1000 was also due from John Kirsopp to Sarah Carr, and the deed was executed, in consideration of the bond debt, and of £1000 paid to Sarah Carr. The conveyance was made to a trustee by Sarah Carr, and by John Kirsopp and Mary his wife, and the property, purported to be conveyed, was, all that undivided moiety of Kirsopp and his wife, in right of the wife, in the several premises therein described, and all the estate of Sarah Carr, and Kirsopp and his wife in the same moiety, in trust for Dodd and his wife, subject to redemption. There was a covenant to levy fines, which were to enure to the use of the trustee for Dodd and his wife, and a proviso for redemption, on payment of £1200, and interest to Dodd and his wife, by Kirsopp [287] and his wife; and on payment, there was to be a reconveyance to Kirsopp and his wife, or as they appointed, subject to the mortgage and subject to the interest of Sarah Carr; and Kirsopp, personally, covenanted to pay the mortgage money.

Long after the date of the deed, it was ascertained that Mary Kirsopp, instead of being entitled, as heir, to a moiety of the estate, was entitled in her own right to only one-fifth, as personal estate; and the question is, what, upon the construction and effect of the deed, is the effect of the conveyance executed by Mrs. Carr.

The estate being treated as personalty, Mrs. Carr became entitled to portions of the shares of her deceased children, who died intestate; and it is contended, that although Kirsopp and his wife, in her right, were only entitled to one-fifth, subject to the life interest of Mrs. Carr, the conveyance by Mrs. Carr ought to extend to her own interest in an equal moiety of the whole. But, on perusal of the deed, I am of opinion that Mrs. Carr did not intend to convey, and that Dodd and his wife did not intend to receive from her, more than her interest in the share of the estate which was conveyed by Kirsopp and his wife; and I think, that the effect of the deed is not to pass more than her interest under the will, in so much of the estate as was conveyed by Kirsopp and his wife.

It being doubtful, upon the proceedings, whether Mrs. Carr the widow had joined in the fine, inquiry was made on the point, when it was ascertained that she was a party to it, and the case was then argued as to its operation.

[288] Mr. Purvis contended that, as Mrs. Carr covenanted for herself and her heirs, her covenant was to be made good out of the lands. (Co. Lit. 365 a.) That a fine was a feoffment on record (Shep. Touch. 5), and was conclusive evidence on production; and that Mrs. Carr was estopped from saying that the moiety did not pass. (Shep. Touch. 20.)

Mr. Pemberton, contra. The property is mere personalty, and the fine had no operation upon it. The security cannot extend beyond the intention of the parties to the deed; they were only dealing with the interests of Kirsopp and wife, and merely with such interest of the widow, as she had in that portion of the property which belonged to Kirsopp and wife.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I stated my opinion, that the intention of the parties was to convey the widow's interest in so much of the estate as was conveyed by Kirsopp and wife. I do not think that the fine operates beyond the deed, and the intention of the parties appearing on the deed.

[289] BRISTOW v. BRISTOW. June 28, 29, 1842.

[See Lee v. Pain, 1844, 4 Hare, 240.]

testatrix appointed a legacy out of a particular fund. By a codicil she revoked it, and gave a legacy of half the amount only, but without referring to the particular fund. Held, that the latter was a mere substitution for the former; and the particular fund failing, that the legatee was not entitled to be paid out of the general assets.

quest of a specific sum in the funds, to be paid within twelve months. The sum was not transferred within the twelve months, and the executors received the dividends accruing during that period. Held, that they belonged to the legatee.

quest of £800 to the four eldest children of the testatrix's cousin A. B., and £200 to the three remaining children of her uncle A. B. The testatrix had a cousin and an uncle of that name. The cousin had seven children, and the uncle one, but he had three remaining grandchildren, one other having died. Held, that the three younger children of the cousin were entitled to the £200.

quest "to the poor on the testatrix's little estate in Suffolk." The testatrix in 1784 had an estate in Suffolk, but which was settled in that year, and the testatrix had merely a rent charge issuing thereout. Held, that there was a valid charitable gift to the poor on the estate.

costs of a suit for administration held, there being no other assets, to be payable out of the specific legacies pari passu.

Several questions arose in this case, which came on upon exceptions and for further actions. It will be convenient however to separate them.

Under the marriage settlement of Lady Bristow, a power was limited to her of appointing £5000. By her will she appointed a sum of £800, part of the £5000, to be equally divided between Mrs. Booth, her cousin, Mrs. Slater, and two other persons.

By a codicil she revoked the legacies given to Mrs. Booth, Mrs. Slater, and the other persons, and proceeded thus: "I bequeath to each only £100."

It was decided in the case of Bristow v. Boothby (2 Sim. & St. 465) that the power appointing the £5000 was void for remoteness; so that legacies given thereout failed. The Master to whom this cause was referred to take an account of the assets, &c., reported the two of £100 each given by the codicil to Mrs. Booth and [290] Slater amongst the general legacies; and to this part of his report, an objection was taken, on the ground that the legacies of £100 each, given by the will, were substituted for the legacies of £200 each given by the will, and were more payable out of the same fund, viz., the £5000, and that, consequently, they failed by the invalidity of the power. Cooper v. Day (3 Mer. 154; and see Day v. Day, 4 Beav. 561, and the cases there cited) was cited to shew that the substituted legacies were subject to the same incidents as the original legacies.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS held that the legacies of £100 each were substituted for those of £200 each, and were payable out of the same fund. He consequently refused the exception.

The testatrix gave to a charity, called the Refuge for the Destitute, a sum of £1700 per annua, standing in the name of two trustees, which she directed "to be paid in twelve calendar months after her decease."

The stock had not been transferred, and two half-yearly dividends on the stock, amounting together to £68, had been received by the executors during the twelve months which elapsed after the testatrix's decease. These sums were claimed as part of the testatrix's general estate, on the ground that the executors were not, under the terms of the will, bound to transfer the stock until twelve months after her decease; and this point formed the subject of another exception to the Master's report.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, after hearing counsel in support of the exception, and without hearing the other [291] side, overruled the exception, holding that the £68 belonged to the legatees of the stock.

The testatrix, also, by a codicil bequeathed as follows:—"I give and bequeath £800 to the four eldest children of my cousin George Bristow, Esq., Georgiana, Catherine, Henry, and William Bristow, to be equally divided between the four. I give and bequeath as much of the money vested in the stocks in the names of Sir Corbett Corbett, Bart., and Ralph Dunn, Esq., as being sold out will produce £200, to the three remaining children of my uncle George Bristow, Esq.

The testatrix had both a cousin and an uncle of the name of George Bristow. The cousin had seven children only known to the testatrix—viz., the four children named in the codicil, and three others.

The uncle had but one child, Mrs. Slater, who was called cousin by the testatrix in her will, and at the time of making the codicil she had three children only, a fourth having died before that period, so that, in one sense, she had three remaining children.

It was contended, on the one hand, that the £200 belonged to the three younger children of the cousin: and on the other, that it belonged to the three remaining grandchildren of the uncle (one being dead).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that it was not very clear; but by the terms of the bequest, £800 was given to the four eldest children of the cousin, and £200 to the three remaining children of the uncle. He thought that the word remaining had reference to what preceded, and that the testatrix had therefore, inadvertently, used [292] the word "uncle" instead of "cousin" in the latter part of the sentence. He thought therefore that the younger children of the cousin were entitled.

The testatrix also gave as follows:—"I give and bequeath all the Bank post bills to be found with the picture of my beloved child, in trust to William Deane, Esq., to be properly vested in the stocks; the interest arising from such sums I direct to be, every year, given for the relief of the poor on my little estate in Suffolk."

Previous to 1784 the testatrix had two farms in Suffolk. They were settled upon the occasion of her marriage that year, and by the settlement a rent charge of £300 was secured to her for life, and subject thereto, and to certain limitations which failed, the property was settled on her husband in fee. In 1798 he sold the property, subject to the rent charge.

It was contended that this gift of the Bank post bills was void for uncertainty; but THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS held that they were well bequeathed to charitable purposes for the relief of the poor on the two farms.

The general personal estate not specifically bequeathed being exhausted, a question arose out of what fund the costs of the suit, which was for the administration of the estate, should be paid; and THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held, that the costs ought in the first place to be paid out of the general personal [293] estate not specifically bequeathed, but that being insufficient, they must be borne by the specific legatees pari passu, rateably according to the respective values of their legacies.

[293] PERRY v. KNOTT. June 30, 1842.

[Accuracy of report doubted, Lenaghan v. Smith, 1847, 2 Ph. 302; 41 E. R. 358. See Kellaway v. Johnson, 1842, 4 Beav. 319; 49 E. R. 601. Cf. In re Harrison [1891], 2 Ch. 349, and cases there cited.]

The 32d Order of August 1841 applies to a case of a breach of trust committed by several executors; and a cetui que trust may, therefore, proceed against one in the absence of the others.

The same order applies to a suit in which the case was heard and ordered to stand over for want of parties, previous to Michaelmas term 1841, where the order, though drawn up, had not passed.

A suit may be maintained for a breach of trust in respect of an ascertained fund, by a party entitled to a moiety thereof, without making the person entitled to the other moiety a party.

The testator, George Aldridge, gave and bequeathed unto his son Joseph Aldridge, his executors and administrators, the sum of £1000, in trust for the separate use of Elizabeth, the wife of William Howell for life, and after her decease, equally amongst her children living at her decease. He appointed Deborah Aldridge, John Pricklow, Joseph Aldridge, and Edward Aldridge, his executors.

The testator died soon after, and his will was proved by his executrix and executors, who (according to the statement in the Defendants' answer), shortly after the testator's death, transferred (out of the stock standing in the bank in the names of the executors and executrix), a sum of 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, which, at the current price of such stock, at the date of such transfer, was worth £1000 sterling, into the joint names of Joseph Aldridge and Elizabeth Howell.

Joseph Aldridge died in 1823, and Elizabeth Howell, who survived him, transferred the fund into her own name, and afterwards sold it out and applied it to her own use. Elizabeth Howell died in 1839, leaving two children, viz., the Plaintiff Mrs. Perry, and William Howell.

[294] The bill was filed by Mr. and Mrs. Perry, against Mr. and Mrs. Knott (the latter being the legal personal representative of Joseph Aldridge), seeking to charge his estate with a breach of trust, in consequence of the loss of the £1000 which had improperly been placed under the control of Mrs. Howell.

The Defendants, by their answer, insisted, "that if any breach of trust was committed, touching the said stock, the same was committed by Edward Aldridge, Deborah Aldridge, and John Pricklow; and that they, or their personal representatives, as well as the said William Howell and the personal representatives of Elizabeth Howell, were necessary parties to the suit.

When the cause came on for hearing, on the 25th of June 1841, the Master of the Rolls held, that the other executors of the testator, and the representatives of Mrs. Howell, were necessary parties (4 Beav. 179); but no decision was made as to the necessity of making the representatives of William Howell parties. The cause was ordered to stand over for want of parties, with liberty to amend. The order had been drawn up, but had not been passed by the registrar. In the meantime the General Orders of August 1841 came into operation.

The 32d Order directs, "that in all cases in which the Plaintiff has a joint and several demand against several persons, either as principals or sureties, it shall not be necessary to bring before the Court, as parties to a suit concerning such demand, all the persons liable thereto; but the Plaintiff may proceed against one or more of the persons severally liable. (Ord. Can. 174.)" The 51st Order directs, "that the foregoing orders shall take effect as to all suits, whether now depending or [295] hereafter commenced, on the last day of Michaelmas term 1841." (Ord. Can. 178.)

These orders having come into operation, the Plaintiffs procured this cause to be set down to be reheard.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Wood, for the Plaintiffs, contended, that by the 32d Order of August 1841, it was unnecessary to make the other persons guilty of the breach of trust, parties to this suit; and that the order was applicable to the present case; for, by the 51st Order, the orders of August 1841 were to take effect as to all suits then depending, and that this cause was so circumstanced.

That the object of the 32d Order was to relieve a party, having an independent claim against several persons, from the necessity of making them all parties to a suit.

As to the representatives of William Howell, who was entitled to the other moiety of the fund, being a necessary party, they again relied on Smith v. Snow (3 Mad. 10) and Hutchinson v. Townsend (2 Keen, 675).

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Craig, contra, for Mr. and Mrs. Knott, the personal representatives of Joseph Aldridge.

The orders of August 1841 were never intended to apply to a cause which had been heard and disposed of; and the 32d Order only applies to cases, where, by contract, a joint and several liability is created. Here the liability is not joint and several; a demand cannot be made against one of several executors: they must all be [296] made parties, in order that the accounts, in which they are all interested, may be taken in their presence, and that they may have the benefit of a contribution, if the decree be ultimately worked out against one. How otherwise could accounts be finally taken in a creditor's or a legatee's suit? The suit is therefore still defective for want of parties, first, because the other executors of the testator who joined in the alleged breach of trust, or their representatives, are not before the Court; secondly, because the representative of Mrs. Howell, the person who really committed the breach of trust and received the money, is not a party; and, thirdly, because William Howell, or his representative, is not a party.

The case of Smith v. Snow has not been approved of; and it has always been admitted, that the principle of the decision in that case is not to be extended.

They also cited an unreported case of Attorney-General v. Hughes, before Vice-Chancellor K. Bruce, in which the Attorney-General had filed an information against the surviving executor and the representatives of a deceased executor to obtain payment of legacy duty, without making the representatives of two deceased executor parties; and the Court (they stated) held that the latter were necessary parties if any account were to be taken.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think that the 32d General Order applies to so much of this case as relates to the persons who are alleged to have jointly committed the breach of trust; in the case cited (see Kellaway v. Johnson, 5 Beav. 319), there may have been peculiar circumstances to require the decision stated to have been there made.

[297] As to the next point, I conceive this to be a distinct demand for a distinct aliquot part of a distinct sum, and upon the authority of Smith v. Snow I think that the representative of William Howell is not a necessary party to the suit.

As to the third objection, I think the executor of Mrs Howell is a necessary party, because she reaped the benefit of the second breach of trust.

It was ultimately referred to the Master to inquire when, and by whom, and under what circumstances, the £1350, was sold out, and whether or not with the privity and assent of the Plaintiff, and whether any part was applied for the benefit of the Plaintiff with liberty to state special circumstances.

[297] HENDERSON v. CONSTABLE. June 30, 1842.

Bequest, after the death of A., of £2500, as A. should appoint, with a gift over "of the same" in default, and to be paid with interest from A.'s death. A. appointed a part to B., and £1630, to other persons, and directed the said sums to be paid at the decease of B., except the one left to himself, which was to be payable at A.'s decease. Held, that the interest on the £1630, accruing between the death of A. and B. neither passed to the appointees of that sum, nor to B. by implication, but went over, as in default of appointment.

The testator, John Henderson, bequeathed his personal estate to his executors, on trust to pay his wife an annuity of £100 a year for life; and after her decease, to pay £2500, "to and among his children or to the children of such of them as should be then dead," as his wife should appoint; and for want of such appointment, or as to such parts whereof no such appointment should be made, upon trust to pay "the same" equally among his six children (naming them), "or to the survivors, or to the children of such of them as should be then dead leaving issue, such issue being [298] entitled to their parent's share thereof, and to be paid at the end of two alendar months after her decease, with interest for the same from the time of his life's decease."

The widow, by her will, after reciting her power, proceeded thus:—Now "I Sarah Henderson, in pursuance of the said power, &c., do appoint the said sum of £2500 as follows:" she then appointed £1630 only amongst certain objects of the power, and a further sum of £670 to her son William Henderson, and she proceeded in the following words:—The said legacies or sums to be paid at the decease of my son William, except the one left to himself, to be payable at my decease."

The widow died in October 1834, and William Henderson was still living.

The only question arose as to the interest which might accrue on the £1630 between the death of the widow and the death of her son William; the widow having made the sum payable with interest from the death of her son William.

It was contended, first, that the interest must go to the parties entitled in default of appointment, "for what is not appointed, or is ill-appointed, goes as in default of appointment;" and where a fund was given, by the instrument creating the power, to objects in default of appointment the dying without any appointment as to a part is considered equal to an actual appointment; Wilson v. Piggott (2 Ves. jun. 351).

[299] Secondly, it was contended by the appointees of the £1630, that the whole fund passed to them with the principal money as an incident thereto.

Thirdly, it was contended on behalf of William Henderson, that there was an implied gift to him of the intermediate interest, Roe v. Summerset (5 Burr. 2608); in that case, there was a gift to A. after the death of B., and it was held that B. took the estate by implication.

Lastly, it was contended, on behalf of the residuary legatee, that as there was no appointment of the interest in question, and as the gift over in the testator's will was "the same," viz., the capital, and not of the interest, the residuary legatee was entitled to the benefit of its non-appointment.

Mr. Faber, Mr. S. Atkinson, Mr. C. Barber, Mr. Wray, and Mr. Phillips, for the other parties.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. From the terms of the testator's will, it appears that the subject of the appointment, and of the gift in default of appointment, is the same; namely, the principal sum of £2500, with interest from the wife's death. The widow has appointed £2300 only, and the interest on the part of it, viz., on £670 from the death of her son William. I think that those who take under the power can only take the sums appointed by her. William, therefore, takes £670 immediately; and the other appointees have the time for payment of these legacies postponed until the death of William, and are entitled to interest only from that date.

I cannot follow the argument that there is a gift to William Henderson by implication; I see no foundation for any such inference: there is a gift to persons in default of appointment, and there must be a distinct appointment in order to defeat the gift.

The interest, which is part of the subject of appointment and of the gift over not appointed, must go as in default of appointment; and the parties taking in default of appointment are therefore entitled to the interest accruing between the death of the widow and the death of her son William.

[300] KENDALL v. GRANGER. July 2, 1842.

[S. C. 11 L. J. Ch. 405; 6 Jur. 919. See Nightingale v. Goulburn, 1847, 5 Hare, 490; In re Macduff [1896], 2 Ch. 456.]

Gift of personality to trustees, to be "applied for the relief of domestic distress, among indigent but deserving individuals, or encouraging undertakings of general utility." Held, void as a charitable bequest.

The question in this cause was as to the validity of a charitable bequest.

The testator William Kendall, after giving certain legacies, proceeded as follows:—"All the rest and residue of my goods, chattels, testamentary estate, and effects and property real and personal (according to their respective natures and quality, including trust estates), I give, devise and bequeath to the above-named Frederic Granger and John Squance, their heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, upon trust, with all reasonable expedition, to sell and dispose thereof, as [301] follows:—After converting the whole into money, to divide the produce, and pay to each of the daughters, of my brother lately deceased, who have arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and those now minors when they attain that age, £400. The remaining surplus monies, I will and direct, shall be at the disposal of the said Frederic Granger and John Squance, to be by them applied for the relief of domestic distress, assisting indigent but deserving individuals, or encouraging undertakings of general utility, in such mode and proportions as their own discretion may suggest, irresponsible to any person or persons whomsoever. Provided only, that should any difference or difference of opinion occur as to the application or distribution of any part of such surplus; that I direct, that such differences, as they may arise, shall be submitted by my trustees to the judgment of the above-named Edmund Pollexfen Bastard, and that his decision shall be binding and conclusive on the subject in controversy. It is farther my express wish and intention, that, if practicable, the whole of such surplus monies be distributed and disposed of within three years after my decease."

He appointed Granger and Squance his executors.

The testator died in 1832, leaving both real estate and pure personality of considerable value.

This bill was filed by his heir at law and next of kin, against the trustees, to have it declared that the alleged gift of the residue to charity was void.

The case came on for further directions, and the only question was, whether this was a valid charitable gift as regarded the pure personality.

Sol* (7 Sim. 352, and 1 Myl. & Cr. 286), James v. Allen (3 Mer. 17), Vezey v. Janssen (Sim. & St. 69), Mitford v. Reynolds (1 Phil. 185. And see Nash v. Morley, 5 Beav. 177).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question arising upon the will is, whether the trustees are bound to apply the fund wholly to a charitable purpose, for, to make it valid, it must, according to the decisions, be obligatory on them. It is not a question whether the trustees may apply it to a charitable purpose, but whether, by the words of the will, they are bound to do so. The decisions go to this further extent, that they must have no option between a charitable and any other purpose.

This Court has adopted a very narrow construction in deciding what is to be deemed a charitable purpose. It must be either one of those purposes denominated charitable in the Statute of Elizabeth, or one of such purposes as the Court construes to be charitable, by analogy to those mentioned in that statute. The difficulties always arise from the vagueness of the language used by testators. There is a charitable purpose which is not a benevolent [303] purpose, and yet, a trust to apply funds to a benevolent purpose has been held not to be a charitable trust, on the ground that there are benevolent purposes which the Court cannot construe to be charitable purposes; and the trustees, being directed to apply it to benevolent purposes, may apply it to benevolent purposes which are not charitable, according to that narrow construction. So it is also with the word "liberality," which is particularly more vague, for persons may take very different views of what is or is not liberal. In this case the direction is to apply this fund "for the relief of domestic distress, assisting indigent but deserving individuals." I confess, in my view, that if the sentence had ended here, I should have said that this was a good charitable purpose, for its object is to relieve distress by assisting indigent but deserving individuals, and that would be a valid charitable purpose because of the word "indigent;" but the testator goes on to say "or encouraging undertakings of general utility, in a" ends and proportions as their own discretion may suggest, irresponsible to any person or persons whatsoever." Now a charitable purpose may very well, I conceive, be a purpose of general utility; but the question, which seems to me to arise in this case, as in the case of a gift to benevolent purposes, is, are all purposes of general utility necessarily such purposes as this Court deems to be charitable? I think, that in my opinion, according to the decisions which have taken place in this Court, they are not. The words "general utility" are so large, that they comprehend purposes which are not charitable, and, comprising purposes which are not charitable, trustees have an option to apply them to purposes which are not charitable, and consequently to divert the trust fund from those purposes which this Court is in the habit of considering charitable.

[304] I do not venture to say that I am well satisfied with all the decisions that have taken place on this subject. I think that there are older cases, shewing perhaps that the Court would, in a case where charitable purposes were mentioned, have decreed that the application should have been made to those purposes; but I do not feel myself at liberty to depart from the decisions which have been made on that point. Conceiving myself bound by authority, I must declare that this is not a purpose which can be carried into effect as a charitable purpose.

[304] RICHARDS v. COOPER. July 22, 1842.

Second mortgagee can sustain a bill of foreclosure against the mortgagor and subsequent mortgagees, without making the eigné mortgagee a party.

The Plaintiff, who was the second mortgagee of some property, filed his bill of foreclosure against the assignees of the mortgagor, and the mortgagees subsequent to himself, but without making the first mortgagee a party.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. W. James, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Bagshawe, for Wood, the fourth mortgagee, objected, that the first mortgagee ought to have been made a party to the suit, for his client was desirous of redeeming, and ought to have the opportunity of redeeming all parties without the necessity of bringing another suit against the first mortgagee.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] overruled the objection, and made an ordinary decree for foreclosure. (NOTE.—See The Bishop of Winchester v. Beavor, 314; Rose v. Page, 2 Sim. 471; Farmer v. Curtis, Id. 466.)

[305] LOCKHART v. HARDY. July 28, 1842.

In an administration suit, it is referred to the Master to take an account of debts, &c., and claims are made against the estate of such a nature that the Master cannot conveniently dispose of them, application must be made to the Court, which will either give special directions to the Master to proceed, or direct the action, or such other proceeding as the exigency of the case may require.

This was a creditor's suit, and by the decree in the cause the usual accounts of debts, &c., had been directed to be taken by the Master.

The testator had been tenant for life of some property, with power to cut timber and housebote. The Petitioner, who was the party entitled to the estate under, carried a claim into the Master's office, alleging that the tenant for life had sold timber off the estate to the value of several thousand pounds, and claimed the amount as a debt due from the testator's estate.

The Master was of opinion that he was not authorised to take an account of this claim, the claim being for waste and not for a debt, and no such question being raised by the bill.

The remainder-man now presented a petition, asking that the necessary directions should be given to the Master.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Lloyd, in support of the petition, contended, that in this case there was no necessity to file a bill to substantiate the claim of the Petitioner, which was as much a debt due from the testator's estate as any other debt. That the Petitioner could not bring an action at law, and that the Master ought therefore to investigate this claim. That as all demands on the estate must be disposed of before there could be an administration, the intention of the reference was to [307] determine all claims on the estate, and that the Master's jurisdiction must therefore be commensurate.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Shapter, contra. This is not a proper case for the determination of the Master upon affidavit. The course of proceeding in the Master's office is not adapted to such inquiry, where the defence is that the Plaintiff acquiesces and also a claim of set-off. The Master, too, has no jurisdiction to award the costs of the investigation in case the Petitioner should fail.

Paynter v. Houston (3 Mer. 297), and Baker v. Martin (5 Sim. 380), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It has been referred to the Master in this case, to take the necessary accounts of the estate and of the debts, in order to make a clear fund for distribution; for that purpose it is necessary that all claims against the estate must first be disposed of. It may happen that claims may be brought forward of such a nature that the Master has no authority under the decree to dispose of them; and it may be impossible for him to come to a satisfactory conclusion on them. Lord Eldon said, "That it was the Master's duty to go on with the accounts until he found a difficulty arising from the want of sufficient powers, and that then an application must be made to the Court, either by the Master or the parties, to do that which is necessary, in order to supply the defect of his authority."

I think that where such difficulties arise in the Master's office, they must be brought before the consideration of the Court, and the Court will either give special directions to the Master to proceed, or, if it sees that the Master cannot conveniently determine the matter, it will direct a bill to be filed, an action to be brought, or such other proceedings to be taken, as may be deemed proper, according to the exigency of the case. In this case it may be that the best mode of determining the question will be by filing a bill.

It was ultimately arranged that the Petitioner should file a bill, the Defendants consenting not to set up the Statute of Limitations, otherwise than they would have been entitled to do, if the claim had been investigated in the Master's office.

[307] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Informant, and THE MASTER, &C., OF THE HOSPITAL OF THE HOLY JESUS IN NEWCASTLE, Plaintiffs; and THE CORPORATION OF NEWCASTLE, Defendants. July 14, 21, Nov. 15, 1842.

The 39 Eliz. c. 5, enables "all and every person and persons" to found hospitals, and to create them bodies corporate. Held, that a corporation may exercise the powers given by the Act to "person and persons."

A corporation voluntarily founded a hospital under the 39 Eliz. c. 5, and procured real estates to be conveyed to it, which, however, were subsequently managed by the founders. The founders afterwards sold the hospital property, and conveyed it for valuable consideration to the purchasers, giving them an indemnity; and they applied the purchase-money, together with other monies of their own, in the purchase of the W. estate. The founders accounted to the hospital yearly for more than the rental of the estate sold. Held, that the hospital was entitled to such a proportion of the W. estate, as the purchase-money of the charity estate contributed towards the purchase of the W. estate.

By the 39 Eliz. c. 5, made perpetual by the 21 Jac. 1, c. 1, it is enacted, "That every person and persons seised of an estate in fee-simple, their heirs, [308] tutors, or assigns, at his or their wills and pleasures, shall have full power, strength, and lawful authority, at any time during the space of twenty years next ensuing, by deed inrolled in the High Court of Chancery, to erect, found, and establish one or more hospitals, Maisons de Dieu, abiding-places, or houses of correction, at his or their will and pleasure, as well for the finding, sustentation, and relief of the aged, poor, needy, or impotent people, as to set the poor to work, to have continuance for ever, and from time to time to place therein such head and members, such number of poor, as to him, his heirs and assigns shall seem convenient: and the same hospitals or houses so founded shall be incorporated and have perpetual sessions for ever;" and that such hospital, &c., shall be a body corporate and sole, and have power to sue and be sued in the corporate name, and have a common seal.

Under the provisions of this Act, the Corporation of Newcastle, in the year 1683, did an hospital, called "The Master, Brethren, and Sisters of the Hospital of the Holy Jesus," for the relief of poor freemen of Newcastle and their families; and for endowment, they purchased and caused to be conveyed to the hospital, two estates called Ederley and Whittle.

The estates, nevertheless, continued to be managed by the Corporation of Newcastle, as if they had been part of the corporate property; the revenues were applied by them for the purposes of the hospital, and the vacancies in the master, brethren, and sisters of the hospital, from time to time, filled up by them as the founders and governors.

In 1715 it became desirable for the Corporation of Newcastle to purchase an estate, called the Walker estate, [309] for the sum of £12,220, and not having sufficient money for that purpose, they determined on selling one of their own real estates, called the East Heddon estate, and the two estates called Ederley and Whittle, with which they had endowed the charity. They accordingly sold their own estate for £10,000, and the Ederley and Whittle estates for £3815, and they carried the money into the corporate chest, and applied it in the purchase of the Walker estate.

In 1716 and afterwards, they applied to Parliament to sanction the transaction, proposed to secure to the charity, out of the Walker estate, a substitute for the property sold: but failing in obtaining the sanction of Parliament, they took upon themselves to convey the two charity estates to the purchasers, and covenanted with them that they should enjoy them as against the hospital, and to use their best endeavours to obtain the sanction of Parliament confirming the title. They gave bonds of indemnity to the purchasers for performing the covenants in the deed, and conveyed a part of the Walker estate to trustees, upon condition that their estate should cease, if they should not obtain the sanction of Parliament for vesting the estates in the purchasers free from the claims of the hospital, and if the purchasers should quietly enjoy the estate, without interruption from the hospital.

The Corporation continued to apply for the use of the hospital, a sum exceeding the value of the two estates sold. The Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 W. 4, c. 76) passed in 1835, and an important change was made in the constitution of the Corporation of Newcastle. The members and title of the corporation were varied, and the property of the corporate property was carried to the account of [310] "The Borough of Newcastle," which was made applicable to the payment of the debts of the corporation and borough expenses; in case of a deficiency, it was to be raised by the borough rate. (Sect. 92.)

As the above transactions having been investigated, a suit in the nature of an information and bill was instituted in 1836, by the Attorney-General and the hospital of the Corporation of Newcastle, which prayed a declaration that the hospital was entitled to such a proportion of the Walker estate, as the sum of £3815 bore to the sum of £12,220, and for a conveyance thereof; for an account of the rents from the year 1838, and for a partition if necessary.

The Walker estate had latterly produced about £4000 a year, and the expenditure on the hospital amounted latterly to about £600 a year.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Purvis, and Mr. Blunt, in support of the bill and information. The Defendants improperly sold the estates of the charity, and received the purchase money which they have invested in the Walker estate: the charity is therefore entitled to its share of the property purchased with the produce of its estates. I said that the hospital is bound to follow the land, and to recover it back from the hands of the present owners; but a cestui que trust has his option of which remedy will pursue, and he may adopt that which he thinks most beneficial. If the Plaintiffs proceeded against the present owners, the latter would have their remedy over against the Walker estate under the indemnity deed.

[311] Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Koe, and Mr. Bates, for the Defendants, contend first, that the Plaintiffs were bound to seek relief against the estates, by following them into the hands of the representatives of the purchasers.

Secondly, that the conveyance to the hospital was voluntary, and was avoided by the subsequent conveyance for valuable consideration to the purchasers. (27 Eliz. c. 2.)

Thirdly, that the hospital had not, under the Act of Elizabeth, been created a corporation; for, by that statute, only "person or persons" were authorized to be corporations for the purposes of the Act; that the Act did not give that power to corporations; that consequently the hospital had no power to sue in a corporate character, and no relief could therefore be granted on this record.

Fourthly, that as the Defendants held the Walker estate under a licence in fee simple from the Crown, and as the hospital had no such licence, it could only recover for the benefit of the Crown.

And, lastly, that the new Corporation of Newcastle were not liable for any loss of trust committed by the old one, otherwise the effect would be to throw upon the present ratepayers the burthen of answering for the torits of the old corporation.

Mr. Purvis, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. From the course which this case has taken on the part of the Defendants, I find it necessary to read the [312] pleadings in this case, in order to ascertain the questions there raised, and the points really in controversy. If, on reading those pleadings, I find it necessary to refer to the question which has been urged, I will mention it again, in order that it may be further considered, but subject to that question, there is nothing to hinder me from now delivering my opinion upon the case. I will assume, for the present, that this hospital was founded and endowed. If that be so, what then is the case? There were several estates conveyed to the hospital, by the direction of the Corporation of Newcastle, for the use of the hospital, and by different persons; and supposing the hospital to have been well founded and endowed, the corporation could not, after it had been done, by any means, alter the rights of the charity. This position I apprehend, in conformity with the doctrine of the Court, at all times acted upon, though the endowment was voluntary, and though the person who made it, might have abstained from doing so, yet, after he has made the endowment and founded the charity, he could not, of his own authority, alter that endowment. (See Att. General v. Dulwich College, 4 Beav. 255.) The conveyance was made to the hospital, but the estates seem to have been managed by the Corporation of Newcastle. The revenue derived from the estates, and, if I correctly understand the statement, is made, probably more than the revenue derived from the estate, was benevolently applied by the town for the purposes of the hospital, and this continued for a number of years.

In the year 1715 it became desirable, for the corporation of the town to purchase the Walker estate. It appears, from entries in their books, that they had no pecuniary means for that purpose; nor had they means, through the unincorporated property in their [313] own hands, to raise the money for that purpose. What they proposed to do was, to raise money for the purpose, by selling the estate called Heddon, which was their own, and by selling two of the estates with which they had several years before endowed the charity. They had no right to do that, no right to sell those estates not vested in them; and so far as they had any rights as trustees and visitors, those rights could only be exercised in conformity with the trust.

and treated. The whole sum they had to raise amounted to £12,220. They needed to make the sale, and sold their own estate, the East Heddon, for £5300. They sold the charity estate at Whittle for £2200, and sold the charity estate at Berley for £1615, and by these means they brought money into their own coffers the amount of about £9000. As the estate of Walker was conveyed to them, and does not appear that there was any charge on it, I assume that they obtained the remaining sum by other means. All this was done in a manner which they knew to be invalid. They applied to Parliament for its assent. What they proposed was, that Parliament should sanction the alienation of the charity estates, and sanction a substitute being given to the charity out of the Walker estate. After long consideration it appears they failed in obtaining the sanction of Parliament, on the ground, I assume, that they did not shew that what they proposed was beneficial to the charity. Not being able to obtain the authority of Parliament, they proceeded in the best way they could to satisfy the purchasers; they took upon themselves to give conveyances to the purchasers, and gave bonds of indemnity; they procured advances to be made to trustees for the further indemnity of the purchasers, and the purchasers had therefore a good notice of this transaction as the vendors.

[14] The matter has gone on from that time to this; and it appears, from the account made in the corporation books, which is in no way disputed, to be a thing fully manifest, that the purchase-money arising from the charity estates was paid with funds belonging to the corporation, and applied in the purchase of the Walker estate. The counsel for the Defendants properly abstained from endeavouring to draw from the figures that it must not have been so. After a long lapse of time persons who advise the hospital have thought fit to have this transaction investigated, and the question is, what are the rights of the parties under the circumstances as stated, which I state without prejudice to the question I adverted to in the

It has been singularly put at the Bar, that if there are two remedies, if the charity either follow the estate, or sue for the substitute obtained by the trustee for the breach—if it has an option, then that that course ought to be adopted which is most beneficial to the person who committed the breach of trust. That proposition is a new one; I have always understood that if the cestui que trust suffers from a breach of trust, he is entitled to that remedy which is most beneficial to himself; and I find every day that with respect to the restitution of property, in cases where property has been laid out on an improper security, the cestui que trust chooses that which is most beneficial to himself. And that is the law of this Court.

But it is said that this is a new corporation. I have had on more than one occasion to consider the effect of the Municipal Corporation Act on this point, and I considered that it is not a new corporation, but a newly-constituted government corporation; that what is called the new corporation remains subject [315] to the liabilities of the old corporation, and which are to be satisfied in the same manner as if no alteration had taken place. (Attorney-General v. Kerr, 2 Beav. 429.)

But some hardship occurs where liabilities are fixed on the ratepayers in a town which they were not subject to before the Act; but the liabilities of the old corporation are transferred with their corporate property to the new corporation, which is a continuation of the old corporation, with a change of government. There are many very great political changes effected by the Act, but in other respects the corporation is not legally

It comes, therefore, to this position, that the corporation, having the possession and power over the charity property, sold it, and received into their own coffers the purchase-money, and laid it out as their money with other money which was their own, in the purchase of another estate. As this was a breach of duty in persons who had the control of the property, the cestuis que trust have a right to such relief they will have, and they claim relief against the estate that was sold. What they say to the Defendants is this: "You purchased the estate for £12,220; we desire to have such a proportion of the estate as our purchase-money bore to the whole; we ask to have so much of the estate as will correspond in the proportion which our part of the purchase-money bore to the whole purchase-money laid out."

I cannot think there can be a reasonable doubt of their right to that, provided they have the right to sue. I think the result of this case must depend upon that question :—raised probably by surprise, but if it is properly raised by the pleadings, the Defendants have a right to have the benefit of it.

[316] I will read the pleadings, and see whether the question as to the constitution of the charity, is raised on these pleadings, for if it is not, I think it is too much to say that the Defendants are entitled to advance it by surprise on the other parties at the hearing.

July 21. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case an objection was raised during the argument for the Defendants, with respect to the constitution of the charity and the right of the hospital to sue in a corporate character. It was doubtful whether that question had been raised by the pleadings, and on looking at the pleadings it certainly is very doubtful whether the question is properly raised or not ; for although, on one or two occasions it is submitted to the Court, whether there was a due constitution of the corporation, it is more than once admitted, in the same answer, that there was a corporation ; it becomes however quite immaterial, because on looking into the Commentaries of Sir Edward Coke on this very statute, he has fully provided for and fully answered all the objections raised on that point. (1) The decree must be, that the Corporation of Newcastle are to be considered as trustees of such a proportion of the purchased estate as the purchase-money derived from the charity estate bears to the whole purchase-money ; and it must be referred to the Master to inquire what that is, if it be necessary to make any inquiry. It was alleged on the hearing, [317] that it would appear that the whole of those sums were not really derived from the sale of the charity estate, as part of those sums had been applied in purchasing up leasehold interests granted by the hospital and existing at the time. No detail was entered into upon the subject, and I am unable to form an opinion upon it ; but if necessary it must be referred to the Master to inquire what proportion of the whole purchase-money was paid with the purchase-money derived from the charity estates.

I think the whole £3815 being the amount of the monies arising from the sale of the Whittle and Ederley estates, must be taken to have been so applied, unless the Defendants can shew that they could not have obtained such a price except by putting themselves in a situation to give possession, which could not have been done without buying up the leases ; the real purchase-money obtained will then be the whole purchase-money received, less the sum given for surrendering up the leases. If the Defendants can prove those sums, I should certainly be disposed to say they ought to be deducted. What I take to be established is, that £12,220 was the whole purchase-money of the Walker estate ; and the amount of those several sums of £2200 and £1615, must, prima facie, be taken as having been applied in the purchase. But if this was really not the value of the charity estates, but the value of the estates and the existing leases, then you would have to deduct the value of the existing leases provided the state of the account between the charity and the corporation is ascertained, for there is not the means of doing it otherwise. The purchase-money after the deductions, will be the amount of the charity estate applied to the purchase of the Walker estate.

[318] I do not think the expenses ought to be deducted at all. The arrangement was merely for the advantage and benefit of the corporation, and they, therefore, must pay the costs of it.

Declare the hospital entitled to such part of the Walker estate as is commensurate with the amount of the purchase-money contributed by the charity estate, and that the whole amount of the produce of the charity estates must be deemed to have been contributed, unless it shall appear that some portion of it was applied in the purchase of existing leasehold interests granted by the hospital ; and refer it to the Master.

(1) 2 Co. Inst. 722, n. 1.—“These words” [i.e., all and every person and person] “regularly doe extend to any body politick or corporate, but not to such as are restrained by any Act of Parliament to alien, &c., but doth extend to such bodies politick and corporate as may alien : as maiors and comminalties, bayliffs and burgesses, &c., and the like, and to all other persons whatsoever.”

quire whether any and what sums were so applied in the purchase of such leasehold interest. (NOTE.—An appeal is pending in the House of Lords [12 CL & F. 402].)

[319] KELLAWAY v. JOHNSON. July 22, 1842.

consols were settled to the separate use of the wife for life, with a power to appoint it by will, and the settlement contained a power for the trustees, with the consent in writing of the wife, to alter the securities. The trustees, without such consent, sold the consols, and invested the produce in long annuities, which they afterwards sold and lent the money on bond, which was afterwards received by the husband, who invested it in leaseholds. The wife received the long annuities until sold, and afterwards joined her husband in executing a deed, reciting that the sale of the long annuities and the subsequent investments had been with her consent. Held, that the appointees of the fund under her will were entitled, as against the husband and trustees, to have the consols replaced, and that the interest over which the wife had a general power of appointment was not liable to make good the breach of trust.

Since the orders of August 1841, it is not necessary to make all the persons committing a breach of trust parties to a suit for its restitution.

By the settlement, made on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Letts in 1797, a sum of £3000 consols was vested in trustees, upon trust for Mrs. Letts for her separate use for life, with remainder to her husband for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage, and if there should be none (which event happened), in trust, as to one-half for such persons as Mrs. Letts should by will appoint, and in default for her next kin.

The settlement contained a power for the trustees, with the consent of Mr. and Mrs. Letts, and the survivor, testified in writing under their hands or hand, to sell the consols, and invest the produce "upon any other public, or on real security or securities of the interest, or in the public stocks or funds, or in the purchase of freehold or copyhold hereditaments; and from time to time, with such consent and approbation, to alter and transmute the same, and to sell and dispose of the hereditaments so to be purchased; and such hereditaments were to be considered as money, and personal estate.

In 1799 the four trustees sold out the consols, and the produce, amounting to the sum of £2040, was invested in the purchase of £102 long annuities.

[320] In February 1801 the long annuities were sold by the trustees, and the produce, amounting to £1760, 15s., was lent on bond. The bond was afterwards paid, and the amount was received by Mr. Letts.

The dividends on the £3000 and the long annuities, until sold, were received by Mrs. Letts; but no other part of the income, so far as appeared by the evidence, had been received by her.

By an indenture, dated in September 1801, and executed by and made between Thomas Letts and Esther his wife of the one part, and two of the trustees of the other part, after reciting the sale by the four trustees of the said long annuities, at the request and by the consent and approbation of Mr. and Mrs. Letts (testified by their signing and executing that deed), and the placing out the produce thereof, with the consent and approbation on such bond as aforesaid, and that the said Thomas Letts had received nearly the whole of the monies thereby received, and was desirous of placing out the same in the purchase of leasehold premises, or other personal security to the best advantage he could, and after reciting that he had, with £1250, purchased certain leaseholds, Mr. Letts thereby acknowledged the £1250 was the produce of the trust monies, and that he would, at the request of his wife or the trustees, assign the leaseholds to the trustees; and he covenanted with the trustees that it should be lawful for his wife to receive the rents for her life.

Mrs. Letts died in 1818, without having had any child, having, by her will, Letts a settlement was made of a sum of £3000 consols, the dividends of which were to be paid to the wife for life for her separate use, with remainder to Mr. Letts, and remainder to the children of the marriage, and if no children, one-half of the principal was to go to the husband, and the other half to such persons as the wife should appoint by will, and there was a gift over in default of appointment. There was a power for the trustees, with the consent in writing of the husband and wife, to sell the stock, and invest the produce on public or real securities, or securities of interest, or in the public [324] stocks or funds, or in the purchase of freehold or leasehold hereditaments. The stock was sold out, not for any of the purposes mentioned in the settlement, but for the purpose of applying it in the purchase of long annuities. In February 1801 these long annuities were sold for £1760, 15s. The money, instead of being invested in any of the securities pointed out, was lent on bond; and the bond was afterwards paid off, and Mr. Letts, who received the money, applied it in the purchase of a leasehold estate.

A more clear breach of trust was never committed. The wife afterwards executed a deed of 1801, which did not bind her, because she was induced by the husband, to take the benefit of the breach of trust, to execute this deed. The wife by her deed executed the power, and the Plaintiffs are entitled under the will. She died in 1801, having had no children and she left her husband surviving. He died on the 1st of February 1834, and his executors are the first-named Defendants on this bill. The question is, if the representatives of Mr. Letts and the trustees who were named are not answerable; and it is clear that the trustees are answerable, as well as the representatives of Mr. Letts, who had the benefit of the breach of trust.

If the stock had not been improperly sold out for an improper purpose, there would have been no loss or diminution of the trust fund. All the trustees were liable to it; all the trustees concurred in selling the long annuities; and each and every one of them is answerable for any future loss, the root and cause of such loss being the original selling out of the stock. The estates of the trustees, therefore, are all liable; the stock must be replaced with the dividends since the death of Letts. The leasehold estate, in the purchase of which the trust fund was invested, still exists, and the Plaintiffs have a right to make it available to satisfy the breach of trust.

[35] I think it is not necessary to have all the persons liable before the Court; under the New Orders, if one trustee only was present, I should make a decree against him, leaving him to seek contribution from the other trustees.

It was declared that the estates of Letts and of the trustees were liable to pay one moiety of the £3000 consols, and to make good the dividends accrued since the death of Mr. Letts, and to pay the costs of the suit; and it was declared that the leasehold estate and the rents received since the death of Mr. Letts, were jointly liable to the claim of the appointees of Mrs. Letts.

[325] WILLIAMS v. WENTWORTH. July 20, 21, August 1, 1842.

Taylor v. Taylor, 1851, 3 Mac. & G. 429; 42 E. R. 327; In re Meares, 1879, 10 Ch. D. 553; In re Rhodes, 1890, 44 Ch. D. 99.]

A will will raise an implied contract, and give a valid demand or debt against the testator or his estate, for monies expended for the necessary protection of his person and estate.

On a commission of lunacy, A. B. was, upon inquisition, found lunatic, and the finding was confirmed upon the trial of a traverse. Before the costs had been paid to be raised A. B. died. Held, that under the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 104, the estate of the lunatic was liable for the costs of the proceedings.

In this case, the Plaintiff, representing himself to be a creditor of Charles Henry [name obscured], filed his bill, on behalf of himself and all other the creditors of the [name obscured] person, to obtain payment of his and the other debts out of the real and personal estate of the debtor. The heir at law put in a demurrer to the bill, and alleged that upon the bill it did not appear that the Plaintiff was a creditor.

The case was this:—Charles Henry Tubb was a lunatic; the Plaintiff petitioned for a commission of lunacy, which was duly issued. Upon the inquisition, a verdict of lunacy was obtained, and upon the trial of a traverse, [326] was confirmed. By an order of the Lord Chancellor, it was referred to the Master to tax the costs: to inquire what fund there was for payment, and if no fund, whether it would be proper to raise the amount by sale or mortgage of the real estate. Pending the proceedings before the Master, the lunatic died; and the Lord Chancellor acting under his jurisdiction in lunacy, had no longer power to raise the costs by sale or mortgage of the lunatic's estate, but under an order afterwards made, the costs were taxed at the sum of £1168, 16s. 8d. The Master's report was confirmed, and by an order, made by the Lord Chancellor "in the matter of the lunacy," it was declared that the costs had been properly incurred for the benefit of the lunatic, and the bill also alleged, that they were necessary for the protection of the person and estate of the lunatic.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Dixon, for the heir at law, in support of the demurrer. The Plaintiff has no valid demand as against the real estate of the lunatic. He must rest his claim on the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 104, which makes the real estate of persons "assets to be administered in Courts of Equity for the payment of the just debts of such person, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty." This is not a debt on specialty: if it were, it would be plainly invalid, being created by a lunatic; is it then a debt on simple contract? Now this claim is not in the ordinary use of the term a "debt" at all; nor is it possible that any contract could be entered into between the lunatic and the Plaintiff. It would be extraordinary indeed, if a stranger by his voluntary interference could charge the heir. In Carter v. Beard (10 Sim. 7) a person who was a lunatic, [327] but had not been found to be so by inquisition, died, seized of a small freehold estate, but not possessed of any personal property. His step-father had received the rents of the estate, and had expended more than the amount of them in maintaining the lunatic; he had also paid the lunatic's funeral expenses. It was held that he was not entitled, under 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 104, to be paid either the surplus expenditure, or the amount of the funeral expenses out of the lunatic's freehold estate.

Under the 1 W. 4, c. 65 (sect. 28), the Lord Chancellor has power to sell or charge the real estates of a lunatic, for the payment of his debts or engagements, or the costs of obtaining the commission of lunacy; but the powers are expressly limited. (Sect. 30.) That power has not been exercised, and upon the death of the lunatic, the Lord Chancellor had no longer the power to charge the estate, which then became the estate of the heir, and was not the estate of the lunatic.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. Willcock, in support of the bill. In the case of a lunatic the law raises a contract, by implication, for necessities, in the same way as it does in the case of an infant, and, as against a husband, for necessities supplied to his wife. Manby v. Scott (1 Sid. 112), Baxter v. Lord Portsmouth (5 B. & C. 170), Wentworth v. Tubb (1 Y. & C. (Ch. Ca.) 171; affirmed by the Lord Chancellor, Nov. 11, 1842). In Howard v. Lord Digby (2 Cl. & Fin. 634), Lord Brougham considered a lunatic was as liable for money paid to his use for necessities, &c., as a person of sound mind, for otherwise he might be left destitute; and his Lordship [328] ship, after stating the facts of Lord Portsmouth's case, said, "The practice is the same in Chancery on matters of lunacy. Nothing is more common than for the Chancellor to confirm a Master's report making allowances to A. B. for monies paid for the use of the lunatic—to C. D. for having maintained the lunatic; to E. F. for having clothed the lunatic. Upon what ground are all these allowances made? Not from kindness, not from charity, not for the convenience of the parties, but because they are debts; because, in the eye of that Court, be it a Court of law or a Court of Equity, or the Chancellor sitting in Lunacy, they are valid debts incurred by the insane person, and are discharged by the justice of the Court."

In Carter v. Beard, the Vice-Chancellor of England conceived that the expenditure by the lunatic's step-father beyond the rents, for the maintenance of the lunatic, was an act of bounty," and that the funeral expenses were "not a debt contracted by the matic;" in fact, that they could not constitute a debt of the deceased party, as they are not due at his death.

The words "simple contract" comprise an implied contract as well as any other. The personal estate of the lunatic would formerly have been liable to this demand, and now, by the statute, the real estate is equally liable.

They also cited Brown v. Joddrell (3 Car. & P. 30), Dane v. Lady Kirkwall (8 Car. & 679), The Earl of Bath v. The Earl of Bradford (2 Ves. sen. 587).

[329] Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I will consider this case.

August 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It was argued in this case that however beneficial to the lunatic, the expenditure may have been, yet, as the lunatic was incapable of contracting, no debt could be constituted; but I am of opinion, that in the case of money expended for the necessary protection of the person and estate of the lunatic, the law will raise an implied contract, and give a demand or debt, against the lunatic or his estate, and that under the circumstances of this case, a debt was constituted, and that payment of it may be obtained out of the real estate, if the personal estate be insufficient. Any other conclusion, as it appears to me, be extremely dangerous, as well as contrary to the principles upon which several cases have been decided. That which is necessary for the protection of the person and estate of the lunatic, may well be subject to demand and consideration; but when a demand is made in respect of a necessary of that kind, I do not see how it is to be distinguished, in principle, from a demand in respect of the supply of food and clothing. A debt is constituted by the law of a contract, which, in such cases, the law will supply, and it rests, as I conceive, upon a far better foundation than the rule which has sometimes been laid down—that a man shall not be allowed to stultify himself. Overrule the objection.

[330] BAMPTON v. BIRCHALL. July 22, August 1, 1842.

A suit abates after a demurrer has been filed, but before it has been heard, the Plaintiff and those representing him may file a bill of revivor and supplement the purpose of having the demurrer disposed of; but the equity of the original bill being challenged by the demurrer, the Plaintiff in the second bill is not at liberty to claim the same or additional relief by adding supplemental matter in corroboration of the original claim, and not required for the purpose of shewing against whom an order to revive may be properly obtained.

The 10th of the General Orders of August 1841 does not apply to a cause which has abated before those orders came into operation.

A demurrer to the Plaintiff's previous bill having been allowed (5 Beav. p. 67), the Plaintiff, in June 1842, filed a new bill. It stated that on the 14th of May 1832 a bill was filed by William Blackburn, as the assignee, under an Act for the relief of Insolvent Debtors, of Thomas Standish otherwise Stanley, and representing Sir Frank Standish, on the 12th of May 1812, died seised of real estates with and without issue, leaving Thomas Standish or Stanley his heir at law, and on the death of Sir Frank Standish, Frank Hall Standish took possession of the estates without having any title thereto, and that the Plaintiff had commenced a writ of ejectment to recover possession of the estates, but that there were various terms and incumbrances, which Frank Hall Standish intended to set up in bar to the action; and that the bill prayed, that he might be restrained from doing so, and that all impediments to the fair trial of the action might be removed, and that the Plaintiff might have such further relief.

To this bill a general demurrer for want of equity had been put in, but had been disposed of.

That eight years after the bill was filed, namely, in December 1840, Frank Hall Standish died, and that the Defendants by virtue of some pretended will of the said F. H. Standish, "by which they pretended they had become the devisees in fee, or legal [331] personal representatives of the said F. H. Standish" entered into possession of the estates without having any title thereto. That the insolvent died in July 1836, leaving, as this bill alleged, James Standish his heir and the heir of Sir Frank Standish. That the Plaintiff Blackburn died in March 1841, and soon after his death the present Plaintiff was appointed assignee of the insolvent's estates: and that in this way all the rights and interests of the Plaintiff in the original bill had devolved upon the Plaintiff to the present bill; and that all the rights and interests of Frank Hall Standish, the Defendant to the original bill, had devolved upon the Defendants to this bill, who were entitled under the will of Frank Hall Standish.

The present bill also alleged the continued existence of outstanding terms of years and that certain mortgages and leases were subsisting:—that some satisfied terms had become vested in the Defendants, and that some of the mortgages or incumbrances were vested in Frank Hall Standish at the time of his death, and had since become vested in the Defendants, and that others were vested in other persons; that the action brought against Frank Hall Standish by the original Plaintiff had become wholly abated, and that the Plaintiff had commenced a new action against the Defendants or their tenants, and that the Defendants threatened and intended to set up the outstanding terms, mortgages, &c., as a defence; that the Plaintiff was under the circumstances unable to recover at law; that very little was due on the mortgage, and that it had been paid out of the rents. It charged that the original bill became abated by the death of Frank Hall, otherwise Frank Hall Standish, and that the Plaintiff as such assignee as aforesaid was entitled to have the same revived, and charged that Frank Hall Standish and the Defendants [332] since his death had verbally and in writing, admitted the several matters and things in the original bill and in the present bill stated and charged to be true.

The bill prayed that the original suit might be revived, and for a declaration that the Plaintiff was entitled to the full benefit of the proceedings in the original suit, and of the supplemental matter against the new Defendants, and if necessary that the demurrer might be set down to be argued; it then prayed a declaration that the Plaintiff was entitled to the estate, or that an issue might be directed for trying the right, or that the Plaintiff might be at liberty to try his title by ejectment; and if it should appear that the Defendants were entitled to any mortgage, that the necessary accounts might be taken of the rents received, and that the Defendants might be decreed to pay to the Plaintiff what should be found due from them; that the legal estate and the title-deeds might be conveyed to the Plaintiff, and that the Defendants might be restrained from setting up the outstanding terms on the trial of any action commenced or to be commenced against the Defendants.

To this bill a demurrer was filed for want of equity and for want of parties.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Elmsley, in support of the demurrer. First as to the want of equity. There is no authority for a bill framed like the present, it is neither a bill of revivor and supplement, nor an original bill, but is a mixture of both.

A demurrer having been filed to the original bill, the present Plaintiff has no right to call for any answer from the representatives of the original Defendants. He is [333] not entitled to revive the suit merely for the purpose of availing himself of the previous proceedings, so as to prevent the Statute of Limitations running; but if he be entitled to do so, he can only state by way of supplement, such matters as may be necessary for the purpose of reviving the abated suit.

The original bill was to restrain the setting up of certain outstanding terms upon the trial of an action at law then commenced. That action is wholly abated, and cannot, by the rules and principles of the Common Law Courts, be revived; it is therefore useless to revive a suit in equity in aid of an action which has wholly determined. The Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27) is applicable to the action which has since been brought, and there is no sufficient acknowledgment in writing stated upon this bill to avoid its operation. It is not stated that the acknowledgment was signed by the Defendants, nor that it was delivered to the erson entitled. (Sect. 14.) It is therefore insufficient to prevent the operation of the ecent statute, which not only bars the remedy, but extinguishes the right. (Sect. 34.)

If the Plaintiff claims as representing the deceased Plaintiff, he must be bound by ll the proceedings in the former cause. He must come forward upon the strength of he title of the party he represents, and of him alone; here the Plaintiff claims under new title, upon subsequent acknowledgment, and he seeks assistance in respect of a ew action at law commenced by himself.

Again, as the Plaintiff has not set down the original demurrer, it must be held efficient. 34th General Order of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 174.)

[334] Secondly, the personal representative of Frank Hall Standish is a necessary arty to this suit, in order that he may account for the receipt of the rents by his ator. The allegation is, that the Defendants "are the devisees in fee, or the legal eonal representatives of Frank Hall Standish." This allegation is to be taken ainst the pleader, and the Defendants must be therefore considered to be the vices, and not the legal personal representatives of Frank Hall Standish; Balls v. larygrave (3 Beav. 284).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bilton, contra. The question on this demurrer is not hether the Plaintiff is entitled to an answer, or whether he is not entitled to all the ief prayed, but whether he is entitled to none. The Plaintiff, on whom the rights e original Plaintiff have devolved, has a clear right to have the bill revived for e purpose of having the pending demurrer disposed of. This part of the relief not be denied him, and it was the fault of the Defendants, who had the power of tting down the demurrer, that it was not done: Anonymous (2 Ves. jun. 287). It es not appear that in fictitious proceeding, like an action of ejectment, the death of e nominal parties would prevent its being ever continued.

Under the prayer for further relief contained in the original bill, an issue might directed. All the authorities were examined in the case of Strickland v. Strickland eav. 242, but not reported on this point), and the result was, that in these cases e Plaintiff might either have an issue, or an injunction to restrain the setting up of estanding terms. If he succeeded in the issue, he would be entitled to the mesne [35] profits from the filing of the bill. The Statute of Limitations, therefore, would t affect the pending suit. The Plaintiff is right in stating the new facts by way of pplement. The practice is, that if facts arise after the filing of the original bill, the intiff has a right to bring them forward and put them in issue by a supple- mental bill.

The acknowledgment in writing is sufficiently stated, and it will be for the intiff to prove all the requisites at the hearing. A demurrer would not hold to a ll for specific performance which stated the contract to be in writing without stating to be signed, nor to a bill to establish a will which was alleged to be in writing and ly executed, but omitting the statement as to attestation.

The present Plaintiff has, at all events, a right to relief in respect of his alleged mortgage title.

The 32d New Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 174), renders it unnecessary to ke the personal representative of Frank Hall Standish a party, and it applies to rt only of the relief, which might be waived at the hearing. The 34th General der does not apply to an abated suit.

Mr. G. Turner, in reply. The first action at law became wholly abated by the th of the parties before judgment, and it could not, therefore, be revived by scire ias. (2 Saunders, 72 k. (5th edit.) Where the Plaintiff in a suit dies, his repre- entative cannot file a bill of revivor as representing the original Plaintiff, and in an ependent right of his own. In Cholmondeley v. Clinton (2 Mer. 171) an alternative e was not permitted.

[336] Russell v. Sharp (1 Ves. & B. 500), Perry v. Jenkins (1 Myl. & Cr. 118), Wren v. Kymmersley (cited 1 Myl. & Cr. 122, and Redesdale, 68), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (after referring to the statements as e original bill, and after stating the deaths of the parties, and that the rights of e Plaintiffs and Defendants respectively to the original bill, had devolved on the intiff and Defendants to the present bill respectively), proceeded thus:—

This is, prima facie, a proper state of things for a bill of revivor and supplement.

Revivor is necessary in consequence of the deaths of the parties. The facts shew the devolution of title are proper to be stated by way of supplement. I think that the circumstance of a demurrer being pending, does not, of itself, make any difference. As either party might set down a demurrer to be argued, neither under the old rule of the Court, complain, or take advantage of the delay if he had himself acquiesced; and if an abatement took place whilst the demurrer was pending, there seems no reason why the Plaintiff might not revive for the purpose of having the demurrer disposed of. The new rules make it the duty of the Plaintiff to set down the demurrer, and give to the Defendant the allowance of the costs if that duty be neglected, and the rule is applicable to all pending cases, and I apprehend, to all cases so circumstanced that the proceeding can be taken. I think that it can be applied to a case in which, from the abatement, no proceeding could be taken.

I think that in a case like this, the Plaintiff might be at liberty to revive the suit for the purpose of having [337] the demurrer disposed of. The purpose of revivor and supplement proceeds further than merely for the purpose of having the demurrer disposed of. It alleges the continued existence of outstanding terms of years, and that the mortgages and leases are subsisting; that some satisfied terms have become due in the Defendants, and that some of the mortgages were vested in F. Standish at the time of his death; that the action brought against F. Standish by the original Plaintiff had become wholly abated, and that the Plaintiff had commenced a new action against the Defendants, or their tenants; and that it is intended to set up the outstanding terms, as a defence; and it charges, that F. Standish and the Defendants have, verbally and in writing, admitted the Plaintiff's title; and it not only prays that the original suit may be revived, but also a declaration that the Plaintiff is entitled to the full benefit of the proceeds of the original suit, and of the supplemental matter, against the new Defendants, if necessary, that the demurrer may be set down to be argued; and it prays for relief, not inconsistent with the relief asked for by the original bill, but of an extensive character, and founded on the supplemental matter.

It appears to me that whilst the equity of the original bill is challenged by the demurrer undisposed of, a party claiming in the same right as the original Plaintiff (supposing him to be at liberty to file a bill of revivor and supplement, and to add supplemental matter as may be necessary to shew by and against whom a revivor may properly be obtained) is not at liberty to claim the same, or to ask for relief, by adding supplemental matter, in corroboration of the original claim. I think that relief required for the purpose of shewing by and against whom an order to set down the demurrer may properly be obtained. This bill attempts to do that, and on that ground I am of opinion, that the demurrer must be allowed, and I think that it is proper that I should give leave to amend. [NOTE.—An appeal in this case was argued before the Lord Chancellor, and stands for judgment.]

[338] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE MERCHANTS VENTURERS' SOCIETY
May 28, 30, August 1, 1842.

[S. C. 11 L. J. Ch. 355; 6 Jur. 772; affirmed on appeal, 17 L. J. Ch. 100.]

A. B. entered into an arrangement with a body corporate for the endowment of a school, and conveyed real estates to them of a computed definite value, and stipulated to maintain the charity for certain fixed sums of rents of a computed definite amount, to which they agreed to abide. The corporation was bound to maintain it, though the rents should fall, and certain persons were bound to the corporation. There was a clause of forfeiture on their non-performance. Held, nevertheless, upon the context of the foundation deed, that the corporation were bound to maintain the charity, even if the rents should fail, so that the charity was entitled to the benefit of any increase in the rents.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General, and the

for the Defendants, who, it was admitted, were bound to keep up a charity for maintenance and education of 100 boys, even in case of a deficiency of the charity estates for that purpose, were entitled to the surplus of the rents, exceeded the necessary amount. There was a second question, which is stated 336. The first question arose under the following circumstances:—

About the year 1706 Mr. Edward Colston, a native of Bristol, was desirous of building a hospital or charity there, for maintaining and educating fifty poor boys, putting them out as apprentices, and that such charity should be conducted by a society there, called the Society of Merchants Venturers of the City of Bristol, of which Mr. Colston was a member. It [339] was proposed that the charity should be supported by a sufficient revenue arising from land, which, as to the greater part, was to be purchased for the purpose, and after a correspondence between Mr. Colston and the society, as to the expense of maintaining the charity, the society, with a view to the endowment of the charity, and acting on the behalf of Mr. Colston, and at his expense, procured to be conveyed to him a mansion-house in St. Augustine's parish, Bristol, and the manor of Beere, and lands in Somersetshire. These hereditaments, together with the manor and rectory of Locking, and certain lands there which belonged to Mr. Colston, were computed to be of the annual value of £720, subject to the payment of taxes and outgoings; and the society having reckoned on maintaining the charity of fifty boys at £634, 5s. per annum, it was concluded that if independent provision were made for the payment of taxes and some of the revenue arising from the estates would be more than sufficient to pay the outgoings, and the charges for fifty boys. But before the arrangement was made, Mr. Colston desired to extend the benefit of the charity to fifty more boys, making the whole 100 boys, and for that purpose to appropriate fee farm rents to the amount of £558, 16s. per annum, and the society, considering that the charge of educating fifty boys would be £553, 5s., agreed to accept the trust.

Accordingly, by an indenture bearing date the 25th of November 1708, and made between Edward Colston of the first part, Sir John Duddleston and several other persons named as feoffees of the second part, and the Society of Merchants Venturers of the third part, it was witnessed, that Colston conveyed to the feoffees and their assigns a mansion-house at St. Augustine's Back, the manor of Beere, with divers tenements there (some [340] of which were held by tenants on leases for lives), the rectory and advowson of the vicarage of Locking, and the tithes and profits of the manor and rectory of Locking, the advowson of the vicarage of Locking, and the tithes and profits of the manor and rectory of Locking, to hold to the feoffees in fee, with a proviso, that the feoffees were to permit the society to hold the manors and premises with the appurtenances, to grant, renew, and fill up leases, and copyholds, and receive the fines, and likewise the rents, issues, and profits of the manors and premises, upon the trusts, confidences, and for the only ends and purposes following. The trust was to permit the mansion-house to be used for the habitation of fifty boys and schoolmasters, to maintain the boys and put them out apprentices, and to maintain the house.

And then proceeded as follows:—"And forasmuch as the said master, assistants, and commonalty of the Merchants Adventurers have computed the costs and charges of the maintenance of the said fifty poor boys, in manner and form of a good schoolmaster to teach them to read, write, and learn arithmetic, and the church catechism, and the charges of the reparation of the said house, with the allowance of £10 for placing each boy apprentice, will amount to the sum of £634, 5s. per annum, he, the said master, assistants, and commonalty of Merchants Adventurers, do consent to accept of the said £634, 5s. per annum, and which shall be in the first place taken out of the rents and profits of the said manors and premises, as a sufficient allowance for the purposes aforesaid, and that the surplus of the rents and profits of the said manors and premises shall be [341] disposed and applied towards the payment of the said charges, wherewith the said manors and premises are, and shall be chargeable unto. And for preventing and avoiding of all disputes and controversies touching the yearly value of the said manors, lands, and premises; and to the end the fund and provision hereby made shall not, on any pretence, be deemed or taken to be deficient, it is agreed, by and between the said parties to these presents, and hereunto so declared, that the said manor and lands above mentioned to have been purchased of the said Edmund Bowyer, are of the yearly value of £450, and the said manor and lands of Locking are of the yearly value of £250, and eight cellars and lofts, being a parcel of and belonging to the said great house on St. Augustine's Back, are estimated to be of the yearly value of £20. All which rents, amount in the whole to the sum of £720 per annum, out of which the said sum of £634, 5s. per annum being deducted there will remain the yearly sum of £85, 15s.; out of which said £85, 15s., all the outgoings wherewith the said manors and premises are, or shall be subject or liable unto, are to be paid and discharged.

"And whereas the taxes payable out of the said premises are computed to amount unto the yearly sum of £62, 14s. 8d., as by the first schedule hereunto annexed appears, which taxes are to be paid by the said Edward Colston in manner herein expressed.

"And whereas the outgoings necessarily incident thereto are by the first schedule computed to amount to the yearly sum of £66, 15s., and the same being taken out of the said £85, 15s., there will then remain the yearly sum of £19, which said sum of £19 shall, and ought to be, applied for the uses and purposes after mentioned.

[342] "And it is hereby farther agreed, that true accounts shall be taken yearly for two years now next coming, as well of the taxes as of the outgoings, whereunto may appear how much the same may yearly amount unto; that in case the said £66, 15s. for outgoings shall not be sufficient to make good the same, that then the said £19 shall be wanting may be supplied by the said Edward Colston and his executors. And in case, either by the ceasing or decrease of taxes or otherwise, the same shall be more than sufficient, that then the surplus thereof shall be applied to the advance of the house, either by increase of the number of boys, or making good contingencies after mentioned.

"And forasmuch as the monies to be raised by fines, or granting and releasing leases and copies, and other casual profits are, in the said calculation of £720 per annum, valued and computed to be yearly £100: it is therefore agreed, that a particular account shall be taken and kept of such fines or other casual profits once within ten years such accounts shall be made up; and in case the same shall amount to more than sufficient to make good the said £100 per annum, with interest of such monies as shall be in the meantime advanced to make up the said £100 per annum, that then such surplus (if any) shall remain as a stock, to be used and make good any contingencies that may happen to the prejudice or damage of the manors and lands hereby conveyed, or any deficiency in the outgoings or otherwise."

The deed afterwards contained a provision for the appointment of the boys by the said Edward Colston and the society, and it provided as follows:—"Provided always that in case the said master, wardens, assistants, and commonalty of the said Merchants Adventurers shall sink or [343] lessen the number of fifty boys, and shall not bring them up again to the number of fifty within one year, or refuse to admit the said foreigners, or any of them, unless for the cause or reason after mentioned; that in such case, it shall and may be lawful for the said Edward Colston, during his life, or for his executors after his death, and afterwards for his said nominees, or survivors or survivor of them, or the greater number of such survivors, and in their several neglects or failure, for the Governors of Christ's Hospital in London, to enter into and upon the said manors and premises, and to apply the rents, issues, and profits thereof, for the sole use and benefit of the said Christ's Hospital; and the said trustees, their heirs and assigns shall, from thenceforth, stand seised of the said manors and premises accordingly."

The deed afterwards contained a proviso, that upon the deaths or removal of the fifty boys, no successors should be admitted till one full quarter of a year had expired from such death or removal of a predecessor, to the intent that a certain allowance might, from time to time, remain and be for the benefit of the boys. It was also provided, that if by fire, floods, hurricane, famine, wars, or any other inevitable accidents, either on the manors and lands, or the tenants thereof, or by should be disabled to pay the rents, or by reason whereof the rents should be lessened, or the expenses of reparation augmented, then, and in that case, the number of poor boys might be lessened, so long only and no longer, than until the charges and expenses thereby occasioned should be raised, and the loss made good. The society then covenanted with Colston, his heirs and assigns, that they would, for ever, observe, perform, and keep all and every the trusts thereby in them reposed, in such order, method, and [344] manner, as the same were therein agreed, appointed, and declared."

The deed then recited, that the society had been put into possession at Lady Day 1709, and that no boys could be admitted till Lady Day 1709; and the society covenanted, that they would be accountable for the said manors, lands, and premises so mentioned to be conveyed, according to the valuation and certainty of rents and profits before agreed, deducting out of the same all such outgoings as were mentioned in the first schedule, and would pay and apply the clear rents and profits thereof (after deductions being made as aforesaid), in such manner as the said Edward Colston should appoint, and should and would, at the end of every ten years, not only account for all fines for renewal of estates, and what should be saved by the not taking in till after the determination of thirteen weeks from the going out or removal of the predecessor, to the intent that if any surplus might happen, over and above what the said master, wardens, assistants, and commonalty of Merchants Adventurers should have expended in supporting and maintaining the said charity and school, that the same might be applied for the advantage of the said house; and Colston covenanted to pay the taxes mentioned in the schedule, or make sufficient provision therefor.

The deed, then reciting that Colston had resolved to add fifty boys more to the first fifty, whereby to increase the number to one hundred, witnessed, that he had and confirmed to the same feoffees, and their heirs divers fee-farm rents, amounting in the whole to £558, 16s.; to hold the same to the feoffees, in trust, after the death of March 1710, to permit the Society of Merchants Venturers, for ever, to receive, and enjoy [345] the same, upon the trusts, confidences, ends, and uses following:—namely, to provide for, take care of, and maintain fifty other, more boys over and besides the first fifty boys, and in the same manner.

It was then recited that the society had computed that the yearly costs and charges of maintaining the charity for the additional fifty boys would amount to the sum of £553, 5s., which Colston agreed to, and that the society consented to accept of the sum of £5a. as a sufficient allowance for the purpose, and that, after making all the charges, there would remain the sum of £5, 11s. of the fee-farm rents. It was then recited that £15, 11s. would be required for a receiver to collect the rents, and that the net rents would be sunk £10, and it provided that this sum of £10 should be paid out of the £19 surplus of the revenue appointed for the first fifty boys, and that the remainder of that surplus should be paid to a clergyman to teach the boys their grammar. The society covenanted that they would, at all times thereafter for ever, observe, perform, and keep the trusts thereby in them reposed, for the said last fifty boys in such order, method, and manner as they were thereby agreed and intended; and Colston covenanted to pay the taxes charged on the fee-farm rents, or make sufficient provision for payment of them, so that the fee-farm rents thereby granted should not be burthened or chargeable with any of them, nor the charity thereby granted for the said last fifty boys thereby lessened.

Edward Colston, by his will, after reciting his covenants to pay and discharge all the taxes on the lands and fee-farm rents settled on them for his hospital, directed his executors to pay and discharge them, till his personal estate should be laid out in and then to charge the lands with such taxes; and he gave to the [346] society an annual rent of £39, 17s. 6d., which he charged with payments to charities unconnected with the school, amounting to £28. And reciting the settlement of the manors of Beere and Locking upon the hospital, and the covenants of the merchants, he declared, that in case they should have duly performed the same, and it should appear that the said two manors had not let for or produced the yearly sums they had been let for, and that by reason thereof the society had been bond fide losers in their income by their agreement, that then they should appropriate to themselves, out of the remaining part of the fee-farm rents of £39, 17s. 6d. thereby devise (being £11, 17s. 6d.) so much thereof as should be found to be wanting and necessary to enable them to comply with the said trust, so as they might not be losers thereby; but if the same should not be wanted, then the overplus was to be applied for cloth for his almsmen.

After the death of Colston his representatives made provision for the future outgoings.

The present information also sought relief in respect of the following transaction which took place after the execution of the trust deed:—Some of the lands which the society purchased for Colston from Bowyer, remained after the purchase, and was, at the date of the trust deed, in the occupation of Bowyer, at the yearly rent of £2500, and Bowyer proposed to pay £2500 as a fine for a lease of the same lands, to be granted to him for the lives of himself and his wife, and the survivor of them, at the yearly rent of £5. The proposal was complied with by the society, and carried into effect, and by indenture dated the 26th of March 1709, and made between the feoffees of the first part, the society of the second part, [347] and Bowyer and wife of the third part; the manor of Beere and the lands therein referred to were demised to Bowyer and his wife: To hold to them, their heirs, and assigns, for their lives, and the life of the survivor of them, at the yearly rent of £315. On the 28th day of the month, by an indenture made between the same parties, after reciting that Bowyer had proposed to buy £310 per annum, part of the rent of £315 and make his wife's part per annum during the lives of himself and his wife, and the survivor of them, it was witnessed, that in consideration of £2500 paid by Bowyer and wife to the trustees of the society, Bowyer and his wife were released from the payment of £310, and the annual rent of £315 reserved by the lease; and the society covenanted to pay the £310 per annum to the use of the charitable trust, and according to the intent and meaning of the settlement. It appeared that only £500, part of the £2500, was actually paid in money; payment of the remaining sum of £2000 accepted by the assignment of a mortgage debt of £2000 from one John Hobbs secured on a lease for years of the manor of Stogursey, granted to Hobbs by Eton College; and after a lapse of some years, and by the neglect of Hobbs to pay the debt, the society became the owners of the manor of Stogursey, and have ever since continued the owners thereof under the leases granted by Eton College.

The information prayed that the charity founded by Edward Colston in the year 1708 might be established, and that it might be ascertained of what the property belonging to the charity consisted, and whether the Defendants were indebted to the charity in any sum of money; and that in taking the accounts which were asked of the Defendants might be charged with the sum [348] of £500; and that it might be declared, either that the manor and lands of Stogursey were held by the Defendants in trust for the charity, or otherwise that the charity was entitled to the £2000, to be charged in account against the Defendants, and that various questions might be taken; and, if necessary, that a scheme for the application of the income of the charity might be settled.

The Defendants, by their answer, insisted that the society had entered into a contract with Colston, by the terms of which they were bound to maintain boys, &c., whatever might be the amount of the rents of the property, and that they were, by their contract, entitled to the surplus, if any.

The property, it appeared, produced about £3000 a year; but the answer stated that payments, on the whole since the date of the deed, exceeded the receipts, so that the sum of £3409. The Defendants also stated, that, from the establishment of the charity, the society, in their accounts rendered to Colston, gave credit merely for the rents at the estimated and agreed amount, and debited him with the agreed amount of charges. They also relied on certain proceedings in this Court relating to the charity which took place in 1760, in a cause of The Attorney-General v. Merchants Venturers' Society, binding the rights of the parties.

[349] The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Bristol (3 Mad. 319, and 1 W. 294).

August 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This information prays that a charity founded by Edward Colston in the year 1708 may be established, and that it may be ascertained of what the property belonging to the charity consists, and whether the Defendants are indebted to the charity in any sum of money; and that, in taking the accounts which are asked, the Defendants may be charged with the sum of £500; and that it may be declared either that the manor and lands of Stogursey are held by the Defendants in trust for the charity, or otherwise that the charity is entitled to the sum of £2000, to be charged in account against the Defendants; and that various accounts may be taken, and, if necessary, that a scheme or the application of the surplus income of the charity may be settled.

It appears that in and before the year 1706 Mr. Edward Colston, a native of Bristol, was desirous of establishing an hospital or charity there, for maintaining and educating fifty poor boys and placing them out as apprentices, and that such charity should be conducted by the Society of Merchants Venturers of the City of Bristol, of which Mr. Colston was a member. It was proposed that the charity should be maintained by a sufficient revenue arising from land, which, as to the greater part thereof, was to be purchased for the purpose. And after a correspondence between Mr. Colston and the society as to the expense of maintaining the charity, the society, with a view to the endowment of the charity, and acting on the behalf of Mr. Colston [360] and at his expense, procured to be conveyed to them a mansion-house in St. Augustine's Back in Bristol, and the manor of Beere and lands in Somersetshire. These hereditaments, together with the manor and rectory of Locking, and certain lands there, which belonged to Mr. Colston, were computed to be of the annual value of £720, subject to reduction for payment of taxes and outgoings; and the society having reckoned the cost of maintaining the charity for fifty boys at £634, 5s. per annum, it was considered, that if independent provision were made for the payment of taxes and some outgoings, the revenue arising from the estates would be more than sufficient to pay the other outgoings and the charges of fifty boys. But before the arrangement was completed, Mr. Colston desired to extend the benefit of the charity to fifty more boys, making in the whole 100 boys, and for that purpose to appropriate fee-farm rents to the amount of £558, 16s. per annum, and the society, considering that the charge of the additional fifty boys would be £553, 5s., agreed to accept the trust.

The trusts might have been very simple, if the computed revenue of £720 had consisted merely of annual rents, and if the taxes and outgoings could have been ascertained sums; but in the computation which was agreed to, the fines paid on leases, and the renewal of leases on which some of the lands were held, were computed at the annual sum of £100, and might, in fact, turn out to be greater or less in any year, and the taxes and other outgoings, which were computed, the taxes at £2, 14s. 8d. and the other outgoings at £66, 15s., making together £129, 9s. 8d. per annum, were variable, and would, if deducted from the computed rent of £720, leave it to £590, 10s. 4d., and make it less than the computed sum of £634, 5s., the computed charge for the first fifty boys; and moreover, the surplus of the [361] £68, 16s., the amount of the fee-farm rents after paying £553, 5s., the computed annual charge for the additional fifty boys, would leave only a surplus of £5, 11s., which would not be sufficient to pay a receiver of the rents. These circumstances were to be provided for, and the provisions gave rise to some peculiarities and to the complication in the foundation deed. There is a combination of contract or covenant and trust, which has given rise to the question which is to be determined in the Court.

The Attorney-General contends, that the Society of Merchants Venturers took the estates which were conveyed to them, as trustees only, and for the benefit of the charity; and that they took the trust accompanied by an obligation to maintain the charity for 100 boys, even if the revenue of the charity estate should be insufficient, unless such insufficiency were occasioned by fire, hurricane, or other inevitable accident.

The Defendants contend, that the estates were conveyed to them absolutely, for their own use, subject only to the condition of their maintaining the charity for 100 boys according to the directions of the founder.

After considering the accounts and other documents produced, I think that the question depends on the construction of the deed of the 25th of November 1708, which requires great attention and consideration. It clearly purports to be a contract on the part of the society to accept and perform a trust; and from the argument on both sides, it would seem to be admitted, that if the rents were to fall, the society would nevertheless be bound to perform the trusts, and thence the Defendants deduce an argument, that they were entitled to any profit which might arise from an increase of rent.

[352] The deed was made between Edward Colston of the first part, Sir John Duddleston and several other persons named as feoffees of the second part, and the Society of Merchants Venturers of the third part, and it was thereby witnessed, that Colston conveyed to the feoffees and their heirs, the mansion-house at St. Augustine Back, the manor of Beere, with divers hereditaments there, some of which were held by tenants on leases for lives, the manor and rectory of Locking, the advowson of the vicarage of Locking, and divers hereditaments there: to hold to the feoffees and their heirs, with a proviso, that the conveyance was upon the trusts only, and to the intents and purposes following; that is to say, that the feoffees should permit the society to hold the manors and hereditaments with the appurtenances, to grant, renew, and fill up leases and copyhold estates, and receive the fines, and likewise the rents, issues, and profits of the premises, upon the trusts, confidences, and for the only ends and purposes following: and the trust was to permit the mansion-house to be used for the habitation of fifty poor boys and schoolmasters, to maintain the boys, and put them out apprentices, and repair the house. So that we have merely trust; but the deed then recites, that the society have computed the yearly costs and charges of the trust at £634, 5s. per annum, and that Mr. Colston agreed thereto, and that the society consented to take the £634, 5s., which should be in the first place, taken out of the rents, as a sufficient allowance for the purposes aforesaid, and that the surplus of the rents and profits should be applied towards the payment of such outgoings wherewith the manors and premises should be chargeable. No suggestion here that any part of the surplus should be applied to their own use; the surplus was, in this place only, made applicable to the payment of outgoings; but the deed proceeds:—And for preventing and avoiding all disputes and controversies about the yearly value of the manors, lands, and premises, and to the end the fund and the provision thereby made should not, on any pretence, be deemed or taken to be deficient, it was agreed and declared, that the manor and lands purchased from Bowyer were of the yearly value of £400, the manor and lands of Locking were of the yearly value of £250, and that the cellars and lofts of the house were esteemed of the yearly value of £20, in the year 1708, from which being deducted £634, 5s. for the society to answer the purposes of the charity, there remained a surplus of £85, 15s., out of which all the outgoings, wherewith the manors and premises were or should be subject or liable unto, were to be paid and discharged. It is to be observed, that the sum of £85, 15s. was known to be insufficient for the payment of the taxes and other outgoings; and the society, having stipulated for their own protection that the sum required for the costs and charges of the charity should be first taken out of the rents, appear to have been willing to rely on the means provided to answer the outgoings. The taxes were computed to amount to £62, 14s. 8d., and were to be paid by Mr. Colston. The remaining outgoings were computed at £66, 15s., and were to be paid out of the £85, 15s., of which a yearly sum of £19 would be required, and care was taken that the sum of £19 should not go for the benefit of the society, by providing a specific application of it, for the benefit of the charity. The taxes and outgoings might increase or decrease. All the taxes and any increase of outgoings, beyond the £66, 15s., were to be paid by Colston; but if by ceasing or decrease of taxes the same should be more than sufficient, the surplus thereof was to be applied to the advantage of the house, either by increase of boys or making provision for contingencies. It appears, therefore, that an increase of sums applicable to the charity was in the contemplation of the parties, in the event of taxes and outgoings becoming less. An increase by improvement of rent is not specifically provided for; but on the computed rent of £720, it was provided that £634, 5s., should a first taken for the charity, and that £19, part of the residue, should be appropriated to other purposes: and these applications, allowing of £66, 15s. being applied for outgoings, it is agreed, that if the whole sum of £66, 15s. should not be wanted for outgoings, any surplus should be applied to the benefit of the house. To greater sum than £66, 15s. was to be applied for outgoings, because Colston was to supply any deficiency. Another instance of regard to the interest of the charity immediately follows. The deed recites, that as the monies to be raised by fines on granting or renewing leases and copies and other casual profits were, in the calculation £720 per annum, valued and computed at £100 per year; it was agreed, that a particular account should be taken and kept of the fines and casual profits, and that such accounts should be made up once in ten years; and if the same amounted to more than sufficient to make up £100 per annum, with interest of any monies advanced in the meantime to make up the £100 per annum, then that such surplus should remain as a stock to supply any contingencies that might happen to the prejudice of the manors and lands, or any deficiencies in the outgoings, or otherwise. Thus any surplus of the computed income, which arose from fines and casual profits, was to be applied for the benefit of the charity, and it does not seem likely that a surplus of rents, of which fines are in a sort the anticipation, was intended to be applied in a different manner. The clause shews that it was anticipated, that in some years the society might be required to advance money, to make up the computed annual sum of £100, and these advances were to be paid with interest, before a surplus applicable to the purposes of the charity was to be declared. The deed afterwards contained a provision that upon the death or removal of any of the fifty boys, no successor should be admitted till one full quarter of a year had expired from such death or removal of a predecessor, to the intent that a quarter's allowance might, from time to time, remain and be for the benefit of the house. We have, therefore, express provision for the charity being benefited, first, by any diminution of outgoings; secondly, by any excess of fines and casual profits beyond the average annual sum of £100; and, thirdly, by delaying admissions for a full quarter of a year after vacancies occurred; and on the other hand, it was provided, that if by fire, floods, hurricane, famine, wars, or such like calamitous accidents, either on the manors and lands, or the tenants thereof, whereby any should be disabled to pay the rents, or by reason whereof the rents should be lessened, or the expenses of reparation augmented, then, and in that case, the number of poor boys might be lessened, so long only, and no longer than until the charges and expenses thereby occasioned should be raised, and the loss made good. The society then covenanted that they would, for ever observe, perform, and keep all and every the trusts thereby in them reposed, in such order, method, and manner as the same are therein agreed, declared, and appointed. The deed then, reciting that Colston had resolved to add fifty boys more to the other fifty, whereby to increase the number to 100, witnessed, that he granted and confirmed to the same feoffees and their heirs, divers fee-farm rents, amounting in the whole to £558, 16s.; to hold the same to the feoffees, in trust after the 25th of March 1710, to permit the Society of Merchants Venturers for ever to take, receive, and enjoy the same, upon the trusts, confidences, ends, and purposes following: namely, to provide for, take care of, and maintain fifty other and more boys, over and [356] besides the first fifty boys, and in the same manner. It was then recited that the society had computed that the yearly costs and charges of maintaining the charity for the additional fifty boys would amount to the sum of £553, 5s., which Colston agreed to; and that the society consented to accept £553, 5s. as a sufficient allowance for the purpose; and that, after deducting all the allowance, there would remain the sum of £5, 11s. of the fee-farm rents. It was then recited that £15, 11s. would be required for a receiver to collect the rents, and that thereby the rents would be sunk £10; and it provides that this sum of £10 should be paid out of the £19 surplus of the revenue appointed for the fifty boys, and that the remainder of that surplus should be paid to a clergyman to teach the boys their catechism.

Such is the purport of the deeds, so far as relates to the application of the revenue to the charity. The indications in favour of the case of the Defendants are, first, that the society stipulated to maintain the charity for certain fixed sums payable out of rents of a computed definite amount, to which they agreed to abide, and consequently might have the same number of boys to maintain at the same costs, although the rents in particular years should fall to any amount, provided the fall did not arise from fire, hurricane, or other inevitable accident. Having to bear the risk of loss, they argue that they ought to have the benefit of profit. Secondly, there is a clause of forfeiture (Attorney-General v. The Cordwainers' Company, 3 Myl. & K. 534; and Attorney-General v. The Coopers' Company, 3 Beav. 29), which would be idle if it were not contemplated that they had something valuable to lose. It does not appear that any defalcation of rent was contemplated, except from two causes, first inevitable acci-[357]-dent, in which case the costs and charges were to be reduced till the loss was made good; and, secondly, the amount of fines and casual profits being less than the computed annual sum of £100, in which case it seems to have been intended, that the society should advance money to make good the deficiency, and that such money should be afterwards repaid with interest. Colston undertook heavy burthens, and it is said that the society undertook a risk of loss. In these circumstances, if an increase of ordinary rent had been contemplated, Colston, if he had not desired the surplus to be applied for the benefit of the charity, would probably have desired relief from his own burthens, and the society, if they had not intended to treat the whole as subject to the trust, would probably have desired to secure the profit by express stipulation. But it does not appear that any increase of rents was contemplated otherwise than as there might be more money received from fines and casual profits than would be sufficient to make up the average annual sum of £100, and in this case the surplus is appropriated to the benefit of the charity. Add to these circumstances the general words by which it appears that all the property was conveyed for the purposes of the trust thereby established, the care taken to provide for the application to the purposes of the trust of the full amount of the computed revenue, the care taken to secure for the benefit of the charity any saving from the diminution of outgoings, and the burthen assumed by Colston of providing for the payment of taxes and outgoings, beyond the computed amount, in order that the charity might have the full benefit intended, it appears to me that the object was to establish a trust for the benefit of the charity alone.

The deed, though founded in contract, appears to me to result in trust. The purpose of Colston was [358] charity; he conveyed valuable estates, and besides that entered into very burthensome covenants. The society may also have had a charitable purpose; but whether they had or not, they obtained the patronage of the vicarage of Locking, the nomination of the schoolmasters, and of one-half of the boys who were to have the benefit of the charity. It may have been well worth their while to enter into the covenants, which by this deed they bound themselves to perform. The advantages they acquired might well be such, that the fear of forfeiting them would operate as a motive to induce them to execute the trust faithfully. I have, under these circumstances, come to the conclusion, that all the rents arising from the manor and lands comprised in the deeds, ought to be applied for the purposes of charity.

The particular transactions which the information complains of, though carried into effect after the execution of the trust deed, were the result of a negotiation previously entered into. It is said that the consent of Colston was asked, but there is no proof that it was given; and the terms of his trust deed appear to me inconsistent with the supposition that he did consent. The case is. [His Lordship recapitulated the circumstances of the transaction with Bowyer in the terms before stated, and then proceeded.] In respect of this transaction the information prays that the Defendants may be charged with the sum of £500 which they received, and that it may be declared that the Defendants hold the manor of Stogursey in trust for the charity, or that they ought to be charged with the sum of £2000 which was secured by an assignment of the mortgage of Hobbs.

I am of opinion that the society had no right thus to deal with the trust property for their own benefit, and [359] that they are chargeable with any profit which arises from the transaction, and that in making the inquiry as to the profit they ought to be charged in account with the sum of £2500, and to have credit for the sum of £310 which they paid or accounted for during the lives of Bowyer and his wife, and I think that the Defendants should be charged with the amount of the rust as the Master shall find to have been made by the transaction, and interest thereon.

The terms of the decree were afterwards discussed, and it was ultimately arranged to the effect following :—

EXTRACT FROM DECREE.—“Declare the lands, &c., are held on charitable trusts, and that the Defendants are not entitled to appropriate any part of the rents to their own use; and declare that, under the circumstances, the Manor of Stogursey is vested in the Defendants, in trust for the same charitable purposes. Let the Master inquire what the property consists; take an account of the rents, &c., from the filing of the information, and approve of a scheme.”

[360] HOTHAM v. SOMERVILLE. July 9, August 4, 1842.

F. & W., as solicitors for the tenant for life, held the title-deeds which afterwards passed into the possession of W. & C., their successors. The tenant for life died, and the estate then stood limited, first, to F. & W. for 500 years to secure a sum of £2000, with remainder to trustees for 600 years to secure a jointure and portions, with remainder to A. B. in tail.

A. B. being an infant, a suit was instituted on his behalf, in which the £2000 was raised on the security of the term. Upon that occasion, F. & W. covenanted with the mortgagees to produce the title-deeds from time to time, and not to part with them; but they were relievable from the covenant on certain terms. A receiver was appointed in the suit, and the Court directed the costs of the solicitors of the suit to remain charges upon the estate at interest. W. & C. were solicitors in the suit for A. B.

A. B., upon coming of age, presented a petition for the delivery of the title-deeds. Held, that (independently of the covenant) W. & C. held the deeds for A. B., and not for the termors, but the covenant having been entered into for the benefit of the infant, F. & W. were not bound to part with the deeds, until released from their covenant. Held also, that W. was not entitled to hold the deeds for the trustees of the term of 600 years, or for any costs other than those of seeing himself properly released from the covenant, and that he had no right to require them to be delivered to the receiver in the cause.

The circumstances of this case are fully detailed in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Glasse, for the Petitioner William B. Hotham.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Faber, for other parties supported the petition.

Mr. Bigg, for Mr. Fulwer Craven.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Hallett, for Mr. White, in opposition.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This petition prays that the respondent may deliver up certain deeds and documents to the solicitor of the petitioner.

In the year 1808 the estate to which the Petitioner is entitled, was, under the authority of an Act of Parliament, purchased and conveyed to William Hotham of Bognor, William Hotham of York, and Jane Cowan, in [361] fee, in trust for the subsisting uses of the will of Sir Richard Hotham: viz., to the use of William Hotham of Bognor for life, with remainder to the use of the first son of the same William Hotham in tail, with other remainders over, and there was power, enabling the tenant for life to secure a jointure for his widow, and portions for his younger children.

On the occasion of this purchase, the title-deeds of the estate were delivered to Messrs. White & Fownes, as the solicitors of William Hotham of Bognor, the tenant for life.

In the year 1809 William Hotham of Bognor, in pursuance of arrangements made on his marriage in 1807, executed deeds, whereby he granted an annuity, by way of jointure, to his wife, and charged the estate with portions for his younger children; but the wife having died in October 1810, leaving a daughter Jane Marianne, the only issue of the marriage, that deed ceased to have any operation.

Jane Cowan, one of the trustees named in the Act of Parliament, having died before the year 1819, Mr. Fownes, one of the solicitors of William Hotham of Bognor, was appointed a trustee in her place, and deeds were executed in the month of February 1819, whereby the estate, formerly vested in William Hotham of Bognor, William Hotham of York, and Jane Cowan was conveyed to William Hotham of Bognor, William Hotham of York, and James Somerville Fownes. (NOTE—afterwards took the name of Somerville.)

The deeds had passed from the possession of White & Fownes into the possession of Fownes & White, [362] who had succeeded to their business, and were held by Fownes & White as the solicitors of William Hotham of Bognor.

William Hotham of Bognor was about to marry again; previously to his doing so, and in order to make provision for his daughter and only child of his first marriage, and to provide a jointure for his intended wife, and portions for the younger children of his second marriage, he, by an indenture dated the 26th day of February 1819, charged the estate with the sum of £2000, as the portion of his daughter Jane Marianne; and pursuant to his power, and for better securing the payment of the £2000, he demised the estate to James Somerville Fownes, and Richard Samuel White, for the term of 500 years, on trust to raise the £2000, with a proviso for the cesser of the term when the trusts should be performed.

By this deed Messrs. Fownes & White, who were the solicitors of William Hotham of Bognor, and who held the deeds for him, became the trustees of the term of 500 years, for securing payment of the daughter's portion; but the acceptance of the trust did not vary the custody, which remained, as before, in the hands of Fownes & White, as the solicitors of William Hotham of Bognor.

In pursuance of arrangements made on the second marriage of William Hotham of Bognor, a deed, dated the 20th of March 1819, was prepared. It was not executed till some years afterwards, when circumstances had in some respects changed. The effect ultimately was to secure a jointure of £60 a year to the second wife, and portions for the younger children of the second marriage; and for these purposes a term of 600 years was vested in Henry Osborne and Fulwer Craven, [363] in trust to secure the jointure and the portions subject to prior charges.

Of the second marriage there were three children, the Petitioner William Beaumont Hotham, Richard Henry a younger son, and Georgiana an only daughter; and, under these circumstances, the estate, subject to a fee-farm rent, stood limited to William Hotham of Bognor for life, remainder to William Hotham of Bognor, William Hotham of York, and James Somerville Fownes, as trustees to preserve contingent remainders in remainder to Somerville and White for the term of 500 years, in trust to raise the portion of £2000 for Jane Marianne, the only child of the first marriage; remainder to Osborne and Craven for the term of 600 years, in trust to secure the jointure and to raise the sum of £2500 for the portions of the younger children of the second marriage; remainder to the Petitioner in tail. In the year 1835 the title-deeds were in the possession of White & Carew, the successors of Fownes & White and solicitors of William Hotham of Bognor.

On the 17th of January 1835 William Hotham of Bognor died. The trusts to preserve contingent remainders ceased, and the Petitioner, then an infant, became tenant in tail in possession, subject to the charges and the terms of 500 years and 600 years, vested in trustees for the purposes before mentioned.

Mr. White contends, that, at this time, Messrs. Fownes & White, the trustees of the term of 500 years, became entitled to the custody of the deeds, and that White & Carew held them, as solicitors for Fownes & White; but from the time when the deeds of February 1819 were executed, up to the death of William Hotham of Bognor in January 1835, the deeds were in the possession first of Fownes & White, and afterwards of White & Carew, as the solicitors of William Hotham of Bognor, and I am of opinion that, after the death of William Hotham of Bognor, it was the duty of White & Carew to hold them for the owner of the inheritance.

If the trustees of the terms had been wholly independent of White & Carew, White & Carew would not have been justified in giving up the deeds to them; and the circumstance that White was one of the trustees, and also one of the solicitors, does not, as it appears to me, make any difference. Those who had a right to the services of Mr. White, as solicitor, were not to be prejudiced in any way by the fact of his having under the circumstances of this case become a trustee of the term.

The tenant in tail in possession, being an infant, could not authorise the trustees of the 500 years' term to possess themselves or retain possession of the deeds; and Messrs. White & Carew, who, upon the death of the tenant for life, became the solicitors of the infant and his next friend, had towards him a duty to preserve the deeds for his use.

The Petitioner, the tenant in tail in possession, being an infant, Messrs. Fownes & White entered into possession of the estate. They were trustees of the term; but I think that they must be deemed to have taken possession for the benefit and protection of the infant, and not adversely to him. Messrs. White & Carew, who had possession of the deeds, acted as solicitors for the infant or his next friend, and in that character filed a bill, to have the rights and interests of the persons having claims on the estate declared, and to have the proper accounts taken.

[365] A decree declaring the rights was made on the 12th December 1836, and it was ordered, that Fownes & White should, with the approbation of the Master, raise a sum of £2000, the portion of Jane Marianne, the costs of the suit, and the costs of raising the money. By subsequent proceedings it was ultimately ascertained, that a sum of £3037, 13s. 11d. was proper to be raised; and Lady Charles Somerset having advanced that sum, a deed, dated the 9th day of June 1838, was executed by Somerville and White of the first part, James Reeves of the second part, Jane Marianne of the third part, and the mortgagees of the fourth part; and by this deed it was witnessed, that Fownes & White assigned the residue of the term of 500 years, except the last day thereof, to the mortgagees, to secure the repayment of the debt, and they covenanted that they had done no act to incumber, and took from the mortgagees a covenant that the person entitled to the inheritance should continue in possession of the estate, until default should be made in payment of the mortgage or interest thereof.

It appears to me, that in the treaty for the mortgage White & Carew were acting not only as solicitors for Fownes & White, the trustees of the term of 500 years, but also as solicitors for the infant tenant in tail, and with a proper regard for his interest. It was assumed indeed, as I think without sufficient reason, that White & Carew held the deeds for Fownes & White; or, in other words, that Fownes & White, as trustees of the term, had possession of the deeds; but they seem to have been aware, that they, as trustees of the term, had not a right to part with the deeds, even to the mortgagees who advanced the money; and it was therefore announced, at an early period of the treaty for the mortgage, that the deeds would not be parted [366] with; and this proper resolution was adhered to, after a requisition for them had been made by the solicitor of the mortgagees. Messrs. White & Carew appear to me to have been well aware of their duty to the infant tenant in tail, for whom or for whose next friend they were acting as solicitors; and they seem, likewise, to have contemplated the time when it would be their duty to deliver up the deeds to him; and Messrs. Fownes & White, supposing that they had the deeds, or perhaps, not very accurately considering in what character, or for whom they were held by White & Carew, but recollecting that their character of trustees of the term arose out of their character of solicitors for the tenant for life, were very properly willing, for the benefit of their client, the infant tenant in tail, to enter into a qualified covenant for their production; and, accordingly, in their letter to Messrs. Annesley & Reade of the 14th of March 1838 they say, "We will give you a covenant from Messrs. Fownes & White for the production of the deeds, and we daresay the guardian of the infant tenant in tail will join them in the covenant, in which the usual proviso will be inserted for relieving them therefrom, in the event of their parting with the deeds, and delivering to the mortgagee a new deed of covenant for their production by the party to whom they may be handed over: but we cannot consent to the deeds being taken out of the hands of the parties who now hold them." Ultimately, by a deed dated the 9th day of June 1838, being the same as the date of the mortgage, and which was executed at the same time, and made between Fownes & White of the one part, and the mortgagees of the other part, after reciting that the tenant of the first estate of freehold was an infant, that the deeds were then in the custody of Fownes & White, and that it might be doubted whether they would be justified in delivering [367] up the deeds to the mortgagees, and on other accounts, it was agreed that the deeds should be retained by Somerville and White, upon their entering into the covenant after mentioned; Fownes & White covenanted that they would, from time to time, during the continuance of the security, or during such part of that period as the deeds should remain in their custody or power, at the request of the mortgagees and without expense to them, produce the deeds and deliver copies thereof to the mortgagees, and would also keep and preserve the deeds undefaced, and would not deliver them over to any other person, unless or until such person should, at his own expense, at the expense of the estate, give to the mortgagees a good and valid covenant to the satisfaction of the mortgagees, for the production of the deeds, or unless or until Fownes & White, or one of them, should have given to the mortgagees two calendar months' previous notice in writing, of their or his intention to deliver up the same, with the intent that the mortgagees might be enabled, before the actual delivery of the deeds, to take such proceedings as they might be advised in relation thereto. And it was declared, that on the procuration and delivery of such covenant, or on the expiration of two months after service of such notice, in case the deed should not be delivered to the person named in such notice, the covenant of Fownes & White should cease.

It appears to me that this transaction was of a nature to be beneficial to all parties. It was beneficial to the infant that the charge should be raised, which probably not have been done at that time without the covenant of Fownes & White, who acted for the benefit of the infant Plaintiff, and at the same time provided means of relieving themselves from all care and responsibility, after the infant should come of age, by [368] the declaration that their covenant should cease on their delivering the deeds to another person, on the expiration of two months' notice of their intention to do so.

Considering the transaction as beneficial to the infant, and that the infant received the benefit, I must do justice to Messrs. Fownes & White, and cannot take the deeds out of their hands without relieving them from their responsibility. I am of opinion, that whoever may have been previously entitled to the possession of the deeds, Messrs. Fownes & White were afterwards entitled to hold them, for the purpose of performing the covenants which they had entered into, until they were duly relieved from those covenants; and it therefore appears to me, that after the execution of this deed, the title-deeds ought to be deemed to be held by White & Carew, as the solicitors of Fownes & White.

By a decree on further directions, made in the cause on the 6th day of December 1840, it was, amongst other things, declared, that the costs due to the solicitors were to remain as charges on the estate, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. from the date of the Master's report. This must have been done for the purpose of avoiding the expense of raising further sums of money before the Plaintiff attained his age of twenty-one; and I cannot doubt but that it was the intention of all parties, that things should remain in the state they were until the time arrived, and then that the course most beneficial and least expensive should be adopted.

If that were the intention, as I suppose it to have been, the execution of it has been much impeded by the disputes which have since taken place.

[369] In March 1841 Mr. Henry White was admitted into the firm of White & Carew, which was thereupon changed to White, Carew & White; but in the month of May following, Mr. Carew retired from the partnership, and it was agreed amongst other things, that the deeds relating to the business of all clients should not give an authority for their removal or delivery to Mr. Carew, but should remain with Messrs. White, and that the deeds relating to any business in which Mr. White was a trustee, should remain with Messrs. White.

I am of opinion that agreements of this kind, however much they may affect interests, or, what is perhaps thought much more important, the feelings of the creditors who enter into them, ought not to be allowed to have any operation whatever against the clients, whose business and interests cannot, without their own express consent, be made the subject of any such arrangement; and I think, that the right to the possession of these deeds is to be determined without reference to that arrangement.

Soon after the dissolution of partnership, the next friend of the infant Plaintiff and the several members of the Hotham family thought fit to employ Mr. Carew as their solicitor; and they, together with Mr. Fownes, authorised, or signed letters purporting to authorise, Mr. Carew to receive the deeds in question into his custody.

Mr. Carew thereupon demanded the deeds from Mr. White, who objected and refused to deliver them, on the ground of the covenant which he and Fownes had entered into with the mortgagees. I think that Mr. White's objection was at that time well founded; and that, whatever Mr. Fownes may have thought proper [370] to do (and his conduct as to this matter appears to have been somewhat vacillating), Mr. White, having entered into these covenants for the benefit of the infant, had a right to insist on being relieved from them before he gave up the deeds.

The means of obtaining relief from the covenant were obvious on the face of the deeds; and I think it would have been better if Mr. White had suggested the propriety of adopting them, or had himself given notice of his intention to deliver them up, so that the mortgagees might have intervened, if they thought proper. He did nothing of this kind, and seems to have relied, in some degree, upon his saving a right to retain the deeds under the agreement of dissolution. On the other hand, it does not appear that the proceedings of Mr. Carew to obtain the concurrence of Messrs. Annesley & Reade to the deeds being delivered to him, as solicitor for Mr. Fownes, were of such a nature that Mr. White was bound to be satisfied with them. And, in the result, this petition is presented by the Plaintiff, praying that the deeds and documents may be delivered to Mr. Carew, and that Messrs. White & Co., having refused to deliver them under the circumstances in the petition mentioned, may pay the costs of the application and consequent thereon.

Upon consideration of the whole case, I am of opinion that Mr. White is not, at his moment, bound to deliver up the deeds and documents relating to the estate; but that, upon being properly relieved from the covenant, he will be bound to deliver them up. I think that he has no right to hold them for Mr. Craven, the surviving trustee of the term of 600 years, or for any costs, other than the costs which he may be put to in seeing that he [371] is properly relieved from the covenants, and that he has no right to require that they should be delivered to the receiver.

Not thinking Mr. White bound to deliver up the deeds at this time, I can give no costs against him. If he had contented himself with saying that he would deliver up the deeds on being relieved from the covenants, and being paid his costs, or, of being so relieved, I should have thought him entitled to his costs of this petition. Considering the many objections which have been made, and the difficulties raised about doing that which I am persuaded Mr. White would have been prompt to do for the Plaintiff's benefit, if he had not been biassed by his reliance on the agreement made on the dissolution of the partnership with Mr. Carew, I do not think that he ought to have costs. I shall, therefore, give no costs of this petition to either side, as between the Petitioner and Messrs. White. The Petitioner must pay the costs of the other parties who have been served, except Mr. Fownes.

All that is required is, that a covenant (to be entered into by the persons to whom the Plaintiff desires the deeds to be delivered) should be approved by the mortgagees. Mr. White, upon being satisfied that such a covenant has been entered into, may, and I think ought, to deliver the deeds to such person. He can, if he thinks fit, give notice to the mortgagees that he has been required and accordingly intends to deliver up the deeds to the Plaintiff, or to Mr. Fownes, leaving the mortgagees to take such steps as they may think proper.

If an order is required, I think that it should be that Messrs. White do deliver up the deeds to the Plaintiff, [372] or such person as he shall appoint, upon Messrs. Fownes & White being satisfied that the Plaintiff, or such other person, has entered into a good and valid covenant to the satisfaction of the mortgagees, for the production of the deeds, according to the intent of the deed of covenant of the 9th of June 1838.

[372] STARTEN v. BARTHOLOMEW. STARTEN v. BARTHOLOMEW. Nov. 2, 1842.

Two suits were instituted for similar objects, one was attached to the Lord Chancellor and the other to the Master of the Rolls' Court. A reference was made at the Rolls to inquire which was most for the benefit of the infants.

Mr. F. Bayley moved, that it might be referred to the Master to ascertain which of the above two suits was most for the benefit of the infant. He stated that the only difficulty was as to the jurisdiction, one of the causes being marked M. R. and the other L. C. (9th and 12th Orders of May 5th, 1837. See Ord. Can. p. 114, 115.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Before the abolition of the Exchequer, such a reference might have been obtained upon a motion in this Court alone where there were two suits, one in this Court and the other in the Exchequer. I am therefore inclined to make the order. The registrar, however, had been in the habit of inquiring as to the practice.

The registrar made inquiry, and the order was afterwards made.

[373] BARWELL v. BARWELL. Nov. 4, 1842.

Upon an application for an injunction to stay proceedings at law, affidavits cannot be read against the answer as to facts therein stated on information and belief. An application was made, after answer, for an injunction to stay proceedings at law and was refused. The Plaintiff was ordered to pay the costs.

This was a motion, after answer, for an injunction to restrain proceedings in an action at law.

The case made by the bill was, that in 1837 the Plaintiff Edward Barwell borrowed of David Barwell a sum of £200, and gave his promissory note for that sum. In 1838 and 1839 they had some joint dealings in a speculation in potatoes, in the course of which the £200 became paid.

The Defendant, who was the executrix of David Barwell, commenced an action at law on the promissory note; and the Plaintiff filed this bill for taking the account between Edward and David, and for an injunction to restrain the action.

The Defendant, by her answer, stated, she had been informed, and believed it true, that in every case of joint speculation between the parties the accounts were immediately settled, and was the subject of a separate and distinct account, and there was no open account at the death of the testator, and that the accounts of the speculation were never blended with the account of what was due on the promissory note; and she stated, she was confirmed in such belief by the entries she was enabled to obtain inspection of, and she believed that the £200 and interest was due from the Plaintiff to the testator.

Mr. Turner moved for the injunction. He proposed to read an affidavit contradicting the statement as to the [374] settlement of the accounts, and the effect of the entries. He contended that he was entitled, by the practice of the Court, to do so on the affidavit; because the Defendant had contradicted the allegations of the bill on information and belief only, and without stating the ground of such belief; Ord. v. White (3 Beav. 357; and see Castellain v. Blumenthal, 12 Simons, 47).

That as the Defendant professed that her belief was supported by the entries in the books, an affidavit was admissible to shew their effect.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I stated what was my impression on the subject when the case of Ord v. White was before me; but I did not decide the point. When the case comes regularly before the Court, it will be seen what that impression was well founded. Lord Eldon often had occasion to observe on the great degree of credit which must be given to the answer on an application for an injunction to stay proceedings at law; but as to receiving affidavits, he seemed to me to have expressed different opinions in two cases; nobody ever doubted that an affidavit is inadmissible where a Defendant distinctly states his belief. The motion must be refused.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Tennant asked for the costs of the motion, on the ground that this was not a case of shewing cause on the answer, but was an independent motion.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The Plaintiff is not right in this motion, he must therefore pay the costs.

[375] DAVIS v. PROUT. Nov. 4, 1842.

After one of several Defendants has answered, the Plaintiff can only obtain one order of course to amend. Any further leave must be obtained upon special application.

This was a motion to discharge an order to amend, obtained, as of course, by the Plaintiff.

The bill was filed in April 1841 against several Defendants. Owen, one of them, filed his answer in June 1841. In January 1842 the Plaintiff obtained an order of course to amend his bill. It was accordingly amended in February 1842, but it required no answer from Owen.

Hamby, one of the original Defendants, did not answer the bill until May 1842.

In July 1842 the Plaintiff obtained a further order of course to amend.

Mr. Tripp moved to discharge it; and in support of the motion, contended that after the answer of one Defendant had been filed, it was not competent for the Plaintiff to obtain more than one order of course to amend his bill; and that if a Plaintiff, in such a case, required a second order to amend, he must obtain it on special application, accompanied with the requirements of the 13th Order of 1828 (Ord. Can. 8); Attorney-General v. Nethercoat (2 Myl. & Cr. 604).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, contra, contended that a Plaintiff was at liberty to obtain one order of course to amend this bill after the last Defendant had answered, then, for the first time, the Plaintiff would be able to see [376] the case made by Defendants. That in The Attorney-General v. Nethercoat the sole original Defendant put in his answer, and there, as the right to amend as of course had expired, it was held that it could not be revived by adding a new Defendant. That if the rule were otherwise, one Defendant might, by collusion, delay putting in his answer, and prevent the Plaintiff amending his bill, and thus enable the other Defendants to obtain an order for dismissal for want of prosecution. They cited Swann v. Swann (2 Myl. & K. 362).

Mr. Kinglake, for the other Defendants.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This general order was made for the benefit of all Defendants who have answered, and for each and every of them. As appears in the present case, the amendments were made under such circumstances, that if a special application had been made to the Court, leave to amend would have been given without the least hesitation; but the question is, whether the case comes within the order, and whether the Plaintiff was right in obtaining an order as of course, without the affidavit required by the 13th Order. I think he is not. This order is irregular, and it must therefore be discharged.

[377] LIDBETTER v. SMITH. Nov. 14, 1842.

The Plaintiff may obtain the order absolute to confirm a sale under the Court, though the order nisi has been obtained by the purchaser, but the application was, in this case, refused, on the ground of there having been great laches on the part of the Plaintiff.

A sale had been made under the Court, and the purchaser obtained the order nisi to confirm the Master's report. He served it on the 26th of January 1841, but refused to proceed any further in the procuring the confirmation of the sale.

In the present month the Plaintiff in the cause gave notice to the purchaser to proceed, or otherwise that he, the Plaintiff, would prosecute the order.

Mr. Romilly now moved to confirm the Master's report. He stated that the only question was, whether the Plaintiff could proceed to confirm the order nisi obtained by the purchaser, or whether he must proceed de novo. He cited Chillingworth v. Chillingworth (1 Sim. 291), in which Sir John Leach held that a vendor might confirm an order nisi obtained by the purchaser, if the latter neglect to do so.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] thought that the case cited was an authority for the application; but he said that in this particular case the laches of the Plaintiff himself had been such, that he could not make the order.

[378] SLOGGETT v. SOREL. Nov. 17, 1842.

The Long Vacation is not to be excepted in the computation of the six days for referring exceptions for impertinence, to a bill.

On the 17th of October 1842 the Defendant delivered exceptions for impertinence to the Plaintiff's bill.

On the 28th of October he obtained an order for referring them to the Master, which was served on the Plaintiff on the following day (the 29th of October).

All these proceedings took place in the Long Vacation.

Mr. Pemberton now moved to discharge the order of reference, for irregularity. He argued as follows:—By the 11th Order of April 1828 (Ord. Can. 7), no order for referring any pleading for impertinence can be obtained, "unless such order be obtained within six days after the delivery of the exceptions." The 19th Order (Ord. Can. 14), directing that the Long Vacation is not to be reckoned in the computation of time, does not apply to this case. It applies only to the cases of "referring exceptions to any answer, or for obtaining a Master's report upon any exceptions."

Mr. Follett, contra. By the 19th Order the Long Vacation is not to be computed in the time for obtaining "a Master's report on any exceptions," it therefore is not to be computed in any of the steps necessary for obtaining it. By the [379] 11th General Order, the order of reference is to be obtained within six days; but this does not impose upon the party obtaining it, the necessity of serving the order. It would be useless to obtain such an order where it is unnecessary to serve it, and where it is impossible to proceed on it before the Master during the Long Vacation. The general words, in the 19th Order, as to obtaining the Master's report upon exceptions, must embrace the whole process necessary to obtain it.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Unless there has been some contrary decision on the point, and none has been cited, I must adhere to the terms of the order. The 19th Order excepts the Long Vacation in the cases of amending bills, filing, delivering, or referring exceptions to any answer, and for obtaining the Master's report; the case, therefore, of a reference of a bill for impertinence is not, by this order, excepted further than as to obtaining the Master's report.

The 11th Order directs that the order of reference for impertinence should be obtained within six days after the delivery of the exceptions. This may be done in the Long Vacation as the office is then open. By the following order, the Master's report must be obtained thereon, within a fortnight, which is extended by the 19th Order, by excluding the Long Vacation.

The consequence of all this is, that where exceptions to a bill are taken in the Long Vacation, the order of reference must be obtained within six days, although it is not necessary to obtain the Master's report in the Long Vacation. The Defendant has not obtained the order of reference within the six days limited by the [380] 11th Order, and has not brought himself within the 19th Order. The order is irregular and must therefore be discharged with costs.

[380] LORD HUNTINGTOWER v. SHERBORN. Nov. 19, Dec. 22, 1842.

After a demurrer had been put into a bill, the sole Plaintiff became bankrupt. Upon the motion of the Defendant who had demurred, the Court ordered that the assignee should remedy the defect in the suit within a month, or that the bill should be dismissed without costs.

A party ordered to take a step within a fixed time, or that the bill should be dismissed, if desirous of an extension of the time, must give notice of motion so as to enable him to bring it on before the expiration of the time fixed.

A bill was filed (5 Beav. 162), to which the Defendant put in a demurrer. Before it came on to be argued, the Plaintiff became bankrupt. The demurrer came on and was struck out of the paper, there being no appearance on either side. A motion was now made, on behalf of Sherborn, that the assignees might file a supplemental bill in a fortnight, or that the bill might be dismissed without costs.

Mr. Beavan supported the motion, and referred to Chowick v. Dimes (3 Beav. 290. and see Lee v. Lee, 1 Hare, 617, and Dryden v. Walford, 1 Y. & C. (C. C.) 625), and the cases in the notes.

Mr. Tripp suggested that in a case of demurrer, the order asked could not be granted.

Mr. Romilly, for the assignees, asked for further time to file a supplemental bill, because the Defendant Sherborn, as he said, disputed the bankruptcy.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS made the order, giving the assignees a month to file their supplemental bill, and said that they might apply for further time if circumstances should warrant it.

[381] Dec. 22. On the 22d of December 1842, and after the expiration of the month, the assignees applied for further time. The notice of motion had been given previous to the expiration of the month.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] refused the application with costs, on two grounds, first, because the notice of motion ought to have been given so as to have enabled the assignees to move before the expiration of the time limited by the first order; and secondly, because the affidavits were not sufficient to entitle the assignees to the indulgence asked.

[381] LEE v. READ. Nov. 21, 1842.

A Defendant is not bound to discover the principal fact, or any one of a long series or chain of facts, which may contribute to establish a criminal charge against himself, and he cannot waive this right by any agreement.

During the proceedings in the cause, the Plaintiff indicted the Defendants in respect of the same transactions, the time for answering was extended until after the trial of the indictment.

In October 1840 the Plaintiff mortgaged a vessel called the "Pearl" to the Defendants for £196, and in April 1842 the Defendants took possession of the vessel.

According to the Plaintiff's representations, the Defendants, having taken possession, proceeded to cut her in half, and to lengthen her, and to make other considerable alterations and repairs; but, according to the Defendants' case, they broke her up, and employed part of the materials in building another ship, which they called the "Lightning."

The Plaintiff filed this bill for redemption in August 1842, insisting that the two vessels were identical. The bill charged "that with a view to obtain the registry of the ship called the "Lightning" in the names [382] of the Defendants, they made divers written and other statements and representations to the Custom House officers or clerks, or other persons to whom such application for registry was made, respecting the ship now called the "Lightning," and particularly respecting the registering of the said ship; and they thereby stated and represented (amongst other things) that the said ship or vessel was an entirely new vessel, and that the Defendants were absolute owners thereof, or to that effect; and they also made other representations, with a view to induce the officers or clerks to register the said ship or vessel by the name of the "Lightning," and in the names of the Defendants as the absolute owners thereof. The Plaintiff charged that all such statements and representations to the officers or clerks were wholly untrue, and that the same would so appear upon the Defendants stating and setting forth true and correct copies of all such statements or representations as were in writing, and when and by whom the same were written and signed, and the true and correct words or the true and exact meaning and effect of all such statements and representations as were not in writing, and when, where, and by whom, and to whom the same were respectively made, and what answers were given to all, or any, or either of such statements and representations. The bill prayed for a redemption of the ship, and to restrain the Defendants "from procuring the name of the Plaintiff to be withdrawn from the registry, as the sole owner thereof, and from causing any new registry thereof to be made in the names or name of the Defendants."

On the 7th of September the Plaintiff moved for the injunction, which the Court refused, but made a special order permitting the Defendants to apply to the Board of Customs for such new registry, the Plaintiff undertaking, in case of obtaining it, to hold the said vessel by the same title and subject to the same liabilities as he held the "Pearl" under the former registry.

The Defendants accordingly applied to the Board of Customs for a new registry, and filed various statutory declarations, &c. On the 24th of September the Commissioners decided that the vessel was not a new vessel, and ought not to be registered in the name of the "Lightning."

On the 27th of October 1842 the Plaintiff preferred an indictment at the Central Criminal Court, in London, against the Defendants and several other parties, for a conspiracy to defraud the Plaintiff of his right to the ship, and to impose upon the Board of Customs, by falsely representing the vessel to be a new vessel, knowing the same to be the old one repaired.

On the 4th of November the Defendants obtained a warrant for a month's further time to answer. On the 5th of November, the Defendants' solicitors wrote to the solicitor of the Plaintiff, referring to this warrant, and stating "if you will consent to three weeks or a month, it will save the expense of the order." On the 7th of November, the Plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the Defendants' solicitors as follows: "I consent to the Defendants having fourteen days' further time to put in their answer. This consent to be in lieu of an order, and to be peremptory. If you agree to the above please to write me so." On the following day (November the 8th), the Defendants' solicitors replied, "We agree to the Defendants having fourteen days' further time to put in their answer, and that it shall be peremptory."

On the 14th of November the Defendants applied to the Master for a fortnight's time to put in their answer [384] after the indictment for conspiracy had been disposed of, which the Master refused to grant, on the ground of the peremptory undertaking. It was now moved on behalf of the Defendants, that they might have a fortnight's time to answer after the trial of the indictment.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, in support of the motion. The Defendants went before the Commissioners in pursuance of the order of the Court, and the Plaintiff thereupon, on his own evidence, indicted all the parties, not for perjury but conspiracy. Having thought fit to proceed criminally against the Defendants, he has no right to enforce an answer which may tend to criminate them. If the proceedings be not stayed in the meantime, the Defendants, who cannot answer the bill without furnishing some admissions affecting the criminal charge, must decline to answer, and they will thus be deprived of the opportunity of making a defence in support of their civil rights.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Dixon, contra. The peremptory undertaking prevents the Court granting any indulgence. The Defendants might at least answer such parts of the bill as do not tend to criminate them; and under the New Orders (Ordines Can. 175), they may object by answer to discover the rest. The Defendants cannot set up their own criminality, as a reason for depriving the Plaintiff of his civil rights.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The only question is as to the form of the application.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

[385] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale.] As to the principle upon which the Court acts in these cases, there is, I apprehend, no doubt whatever. A Defendant is not to be called upon to discover the principal fact, or any one of a long series or chain of facts which may contribute to establish a criminal charge against himself. He may protect himself by demurrer, plea, or answer, or in any way in which he can bring the matter fairly under the consideration of the Court. It being a right to protection given to him by the law, I apprehend he cannot, by any agreement, deprive himself of the benefit of it. The point comes before me rather suddenly this morning; but I think I recollect a case in which it was held that a Defendant cannot make an agreement by which he is to deprive himself of that right to protection which by law he is entitled to. If that be so, he might, under his hand and seal, have covenanted to put in a full and perfect answer to every interrogatory, and yet, after having done that, he might claim the protection of the law of this Court, in respect of the discovery required of him. To what extent that may go, it is not necessary for me to state upon the present occasion; because all that has happened here is, that after the indictment was preferred, the Defendants obtained an enlargement of the time, which they agreed should be peremptory. For anything I can see here—for anything that has been argued or alleged to the contrary—there is not one fact in this bill which must not necessarily be proved at the hearing of that indictment. It has been argued that possibly it might not be so; but all the facts stated both in the original and amended bill, so far as I have heard them, are facts which constitute part of the narrative, and of that statement of circumstances which must necessarily be brought before the jury upon the trial.

[386] Now if this be so, the Defendants might undoubtedly protect themselves in this suit, by stating that there was a criminal prosecution pending against them, and that they could not answer any one of the facts stated in this bill, without contributing towards the establishment of that criminal charge. The question is, whether, under the circumstances of the case, they are at all bound to do that; and I cannot agree with the Plaintiff's counsel that the rule laid down in these cases must be extended to any case whatever, or that we shall have Defendants coming here every day and asking an enlarged time to answer, because, forsooth, there might be some criminal charge at the same time brought, or about to be brought, the prosecution of which would be facilitated by the discovery made to the bill. That is not the case here. The case is that an indictment has been actually preferred since the commencement of the proceedings here pending, and at the very time the Defendants are called upon to put in an answer, which must necessarily discover those very matters which will be in issue at the trial. The only hesitation I have had in the course of these proceedings is, as to the form of the order; and I think that, considering the very peculiar circumstances of the case, the time when this indictment was preferred, and the circumstances which must of necessity be substantiated in it, I shall not do wrong in granting this motion in the form now asked.

With respect to costs, that which has happened is very material. I think that the party ought to have applied for protection at a much earlier period; and I think I cannot grant this motion without making the Defendants not only pay the costs of it, but of the applications to the Master, and any other costs which have been incurred in the negotiation for further time. I think the Defendants ought to pay those costs; and upon their paying these costs, let this motion be granted.

[387] There are many authorities upon this subject, which, if it had been necessary to establish the principle at all, it would have been very material to have gone into. They are very important, and cases have occurred, I think before myself, in which I have had to look very minutely through every interrogatory in the bill, for the purpose of discovering whether there was any interrogatory which could be answered without having a bearing upon a criminal charge. I have been obliged to do so on more than one occasion; and if this had come on in the ordinary course, I might have been compelled to do so here, and I certainly should not have hesitated to perform that part of my duty. The circumstances under which the indictment was preferred, and the fact of its being now pending, are my reasons for making this particular order. (See Thorpe v. Macaulay, 5 Mad. 229; Wigram on Discovery, 80, and Redesdale, 194.)

[388] ROBINSON v. WOOD. Nov. 24, 1842.

[S. C. 12 L. J. Ch. 93. See Harris v. Beauchamp Brothers [1894], 1 Q. B. 808.]

A judgment having been obtained against a party to whom a sum standing to the credit of the cause had been ordered to be paid, the Court, on the application of the judgment creditor, stayed the delivery to the debtor of the Accountant-General's cheques.

The Defendant, Thomas Wood, was entitled to one-sixth of the residuary estate of the testator in the cause, which, in June 1842, had been ordered to be paid to him.

This share consisted of two sums of £211, 17s. 5d. and £1103, 16s. 6d. cash, the produce of stock standing to the credit of the cause; and for the payment of which the Accountant-General had prepared cheques on the Bank of England.

The Petitioners, Charles Wade and John Pavier, had, in June 1841, obtained a judgment against Thomas Wood, in the Common Pleas, for the sum of £2500. They caused it to be duly entered, and in November 1842 they issued a fi. fa., which was delivered to the Sheriff of Middlesex, who, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, sought to seize the cheques in the hands of the Accountant-General.

The petition prayed that the Accountant-General might be ordered not to deliver to Thomas Wood, or his solicitor or agent, the cheques drawn and signed by the Accountant-General, or any other cheques for the said sums of £211, 17s. 5d. and £1103, 16s. 6d., or either of them or any part thereof, without the authority of the Petitioners; and that the Accountant-General might be ordered to deliver the said cheques to the Petitioners or to the Sheriff of Middlesex.

[389] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Parry, in support of the petition, referred to the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 12, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82.

The Defendant did not appear.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] considered the Petitioners entitled to the first part of the prayer of the petition, staying the delivery of the cheques, and he gave leave to mention the case as to the other part of the prayer of the petition, which he did not now finally dispose of. (See Hulkes v. Day, 10 Sim. 41.)

[389] GARDNER v. DANGERFIELD. Dec. 15, 1842.

On a motion for the production of documents, the Defendant was permitted to shew by affidavit, that they could not be left in the office without great inconvenience; but as the ground for this indulgence was not stated by the answer, he was ordered to pay the costs.

On a former day, a motion having been made by the Plaintiff, that the Defendant might deposit with the Clerk of Records and Write the documents admitted by his answer to be in his possession, it was stated, on behalf of the Defendant, that most of them were in constant use, and could not be produced without great inconvenience to the Defendant. It was therefore asked that they might be produced at Cheltenham, where the Defendant resided.

The ground for this indulgence not having been stated in the Defendant's answer, was allowed to file an affidavit to verify the circumstances, (1) and the case stood over.

The affidavit was now produced and the order made.

[390] Mr. Turner and Mr. Parry, for the Defendant.

Mr. Pemberton asked for the costs.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Defendant must pay the costs, as he ought to have made this statement in his answer.

[390] SIMMONS v. WOOD. Dec. 15, 1842.

An application by the Plaintiff to take a traversing order off the file, cannot be made ex parte.

This was an application, on behalf of a Plaintiff, to take a traversing note off the file. The subpoena had been served previously to the General Orders of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 170) coming into operation; and it having been held, that a traversing order could not be filed in such a case (Gregory v. Gregson, 1 Hare, 108), the Plaintiff was desirous of having it taken off the file.

Mr. Cankrien moved, ex parte, for that purpose, and proposed to undertake not to enforce an answer until the expiration of the ordinary time.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he could not make the order in the absence of the other parties, who might be seriously affected by it; that the Plaintiff could not compel an answer while there was a traversing note on the file, but immediately on its being taken off, he might insist on the Defendant's putting in an answer, and in default might forthwith proceed as for a contempt; the Plaintiff must consequently give notice.

[391] COOPER v. WOOD. Dec. 9, 22, 1842.

Substituted service of a subpoena ordered on the solicitor of a Defendant residing out of the jurisdiction.

It was moved, on behalf of the Plaintiff, that service of a subpoena to appear upon Mr. Fisher a solicitor, might be good service on the Defendant Mr. Wood.

The bill was filed by the assignees of a bankrupt, to set aside a mortgage executed to the Defendant before the bankruptcy.

Fisher was concerned for the Defendant Wood, and, on his behalf, had given notice to the Plaintiff to pay off the mortgage, or in default that he would sell the property, and he had also been concerned for the Defendant in a suit of foreclosure, filed by a prior mortgagee of the same property.

The affidavit stated that application had been made to Fisher to appear for the Defendant, who stated that he would write to him, and if he gave instructions, would appear. It also stated, that the witness had been informed and verily believed, that Fisher was the solicitor for or on behalf of Wood; but that Fisher would not accept service of the subpoena, knowing that Wood, being out of the jurisdiction of the Court, personal service on him could not be effected. It proceeded to state that the Deponent had heard and believed, that Wood was residing out of the jurisdiction of this Court in order to evade service of process.

Mr. Hardy, in support of the motion.

[392] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that he should not hesitate to make the order; but he thought that another application should be made to Fisher, and reasonable time ought to be given him to communicate with Wood.

Dec. 22. The cause was again mentioned, when a further affidavit was produced, stating that Fisher had written to Wood, but had not received any instructions from him to appear.

(1) See Parsons v. Robertson, 2 Keen, 605; Morrice v. Swaby, 2 Beavan, 500; Smith v. Masse, 4 Beavan, 417; Curd v. Curd, 1 Hare, 274; Llewellyn v. Badeley, Ib. 527; Hughes v. Biddulph, 4 Russ. 190; and Parkhurst v. Lowten, 1 Mer. 394.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] made the order.(1)

[392] BUTCHER v. LEACH. Jan. 30, 1843.

Bequest of the interest of the residue to the widow for the maintenance of the testator's children; and after her decease, the property "to be shared equally amongst all his children, if they should have attained twenty-one, and if any had not attained that age, then that his executors should act as trustees until the eldest attained that age, and then pay him his share, and each one as he or she attained that age." A child who died under twenty-one, in the lifetime of the widow, had not to have a vested interest.

The testator, John Willeter Dearle, by his will dated in 1821, after directing investment of his residue in Government securities, and making a provision for his widow, ordered and directed his executors to pay to his widow all the interest and proceeds of the monies placed out at interest, as they should become due and payable half-yearly, for the maintenance and education of his children; and he further "declared it to be his will, that after the decease of his wife, all his effects and [393] property should be shared equally amongst all his children, if they should have attained the age of twenty-one; and if any had not attained that age, then that his executors should act as trustees until the eldest attained that age, and then pay him his share, and each one as he or she attained that age, unless his executors were satisfied with his or her conduct; then and in that case, he ordered and directed his executors to detain the money of such an one until he or she should be twenty-five years, in the lifetime of the widow.

Mary Redford Dearle, one of the children of the testator, died under twenty years, in the lifetime of the widow.

The question was, whether Mary Redford Dearle took a vested interest.

Mr. Winstanley, for the Petitioners, the surviving children, who had all attained twenty-one.

Mr. Hallett, contra, cited Wadley v. North (3 Ves. 364).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am of opinion that the child who died under twenty-one, in the lifetime of her mother, had not a vested interest. The Petitioners are therefore entitled. (See Taylor v. Bacon, 8 Simons, 100.)

[394] JOHNSTON v. TODD. Feb. 14, 1843.

A. and B. were found to be next of kin by the Master, who rejected C.'s claim. excepted to the report, and upon an issue directed by the Court, he was found to be sole next of kin. A. alone moved for a new trial. Held, that B. might be heard in support of the motion.

The question in the cause was who was entitled to the residuary estate of Robert Marshall deceased. (3 Beav. 218.)

On a reference to the Master, he found the Plaintiffs and certain of the Defendants to be his next of kin. Peter Marshall, who was not a party to the cause, having claimed to be next of kin, the Master of the Rolls directed an issue, to wit, "whether Peter Marshall of, &c., was the next of kin of Robert Marshall, the testator, at the time of his death, which took place in or about the month of December 1835."

(1) See Kinder v. Forbes, 2 Beav. 503; Weymouth v. Lambert, 3 Beav. 333; Leach v. Hardwicke, 5 Beav. 222; Hobhouse v. Courtney, 12 Sim. 140.

Peter Marshall was directed to be Plaintiff in the issue, and the Plaintiffs in equity were to be Defendants at law, and the Defendants in equity were all to be at liberty to attend the trial.

The jury found in favour of the claim of Peter Marshall, whereupon the Plaintiffs in equity gave notice of motion for a new trial of the issue, but the Defendants in equity gave no such notice.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Parry, for the Plaintiffs in equity, were heard in support of the motion; after which,

Mr. George Turner, for the Defendants in equity, was proceeding in support of his motion, when

Mr. S. Wortley, Mr. Anderson, and Mr. Monteith, for Peter Marshall, objected that he could not be heard, his [395] clients not having given notice of motion. They argued, that this was like the case of exceptions to a Master's report, in which case but the excepting parties could be heard against the report; or the case of an appeal, in which the Appellants only could be heard against the decree. They cited Webb v. Sargon (3 Beav. 408. And see Bonserv v. Cox, 4 Beav. 379; and Attorney-General v. Potter, antè, 168), to shew that the same principle applied to the case of a motion.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. There is a distinction between the case of an appeal from the whole decree and from part.]

Mr. Turner, contrà. The general rule is, that the Court will not make an order affecting the interests of parties, without giving them all an opportunity of being heard.

In the instances referred to, there was an existing order or decree of the Court, in which a party could not complain unless he gave notice or appealed; here there is none, the object of the issue being only to inform the conscience of the Court.

Mr. S. Wortley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is strange that no direct authority has been produced on this point; but as the matter stands, I think Mr. Turner must be heard. The Master has found in favour of his clients, and all proceedings which have subsequently taken place were for the purpose of assisting the Court in determining on the validity of the Master's finding.

[396] All persons interested in a report have a right to support the Master's finding, and I therefore think the parties are entitled to be heard, because that which is now asked to be done tends to disturb the report.

[396] CATTELL v. SIMONS. Feb. 15, 1843.

The Plaintiff was ordered to pay some costs to the Defendant, and, on the other hand, the Defendant was ordered to pay other costs to the Plaintiff. The Plaintiff, being in contempt for non-payment of the costs, moved that the costs might be set off. Held, that it was competent for the Plaintiff, though in contempt, to refer, for scandal and impertinence, an affidavit filed on the part of the Defendant in opposition to the motion.

The Defendant was ordered to pay certain costs to the Plaintiff, under an order of the 5th of November 1842, and which costs had been taxed. On the other hand, the Plaintiff was ordered to pay certain other costs to the Defendant, which had also been taxed, but were less in amount than the costs payable to him by the Defendant.

On the 11th of January the Defendant caused an attachment to be issued against the Plaintiff for non-payment of the whole of the costs ordered to be paid to the Defendant by the Plaintiff.

On the 16th of January 1843 the Plaintiff gave notice of motion to set off the costs due to him from the Defendant from those payable to him by the Defendant, and to set aside the proceeding for compelling the Plaintiff to pay. In opposition to this motion the Defendant filed an affidavit which, under an order of course obtained by the Plaintiff on the 6th of February 1843, was referred for scandal and impertinence.

Mr. Pemberton, for the Defendant, now moved to discharge the order of the 6th of February 1843 for irregularity, on the ground that it was not competent [397] for the Plaintiff, who was in contempt, to take that step.

Mr. Teed and Mr. W. T. S. Daniel, contra.

Wilson v. Bates (3 Myl. & Cr. 197) was cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case the Plaintiff was ordered to pay costs to the Defendant, and a subpoena and an attachment were issued for compelling payment; and in the result the Plaintiff is clearly in contempt for non-payment of these costs.

There being, however, a previous order, by which the Defendant was ordered to pay costs to the Plaintiff, the Plaintiff was desirous of being relieved from the process of contempt; and for that purpose, gave notice of motion, that the costs might be set off. This was a motion which the Plaintiff was clearly entitled to make, being an application for relief against the process of attachment. For the purpose of this motion an affidavit was filed by the Defendant, which, it is alleged, is scandalous and impertinent. The question is, whether, pending this proper motion, the Plaintiff is in contempt is not entitled to an order referring it to the Master to ascertain whether the affidavit is scandalous and impertinent. It being necessary to use evidence for this motion, I am of opinion that it is proper that such evidence should be clear and free from scandal and impertinence. I must therefore refuse this motion with costs.

[398] GOODCHILD v. TERRETT. Feb. 1, 11, 21, 1843.

In a creditor's suit, since the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 104, making the real estate subject to the debts, it is not necessary to establish the will against the heir.

This was a creditor's suit. The 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 104, was applicable, and therefore the real as well as the personal estate was liable to the debts, and it seemed probable that it would be necessary to resort to the former for payment.

One of the Defendants, a feme covert, was alleged and admitted herself to be the heiress at law of the testator.

Two questions arose, first, whether it was necessary to prove the will per testes; and, secondly, whether there ought to be an inquiry as to who was the heir at law.

Mr. Parker, Mr. Rasch, and Mr. C. Hall, for different parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS held that as the claim of the creditors against the real estate was paramount to the title both of the heir and devisee, and did not depend on the will, it was not necessary to establish the will.

His Lordship, however, recommended the parties to take the reference, as in case it should become necessary to make a sale of the real estate, it would be very convenient to have the heir at law ascertained by the report of the Master, the admission of a married woman being quite ineffectual for that purpose. (NOTE.—The heir at law and the devisee are necessary parties. Brown v. Weatherby, 10 Simons, 128.)

[399] ROBEY v. WHITEWOOD. June 22, July 7, 1843.

A Defendant was taken under an attachment for not answering, and not having been brought to the Bar within the proper time, was discharged. The Court directed, that unless he answered within a fortnight, a new attachment should issue against him.

This was a foreclosure suit. The Defendant Edward Whitewood appeared, having neglected to put in his answer, an attachment was issued against him, under which he was arrested on the 24th of June 1842. He was brought up to the Bar at the Court on the 11th of May 1843, and was turned over to the Fleet.

On the 27th of May 1843 he was, however, discharged, in consequence of the day in bringing him up. (11 G. 4 & 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. 15, rule 5. Williams v. Townsend, 6 Sim. 296.) On the 6th of June the Plaintiff gave the Defendant notice, that if he did not put in his answer within ten days, or signify his willingness to do so within a reasonable time, application would be made to the Court for a new attachment.

The Defendant having failed to put in his answer, Mr. Shebbeare now moved that an attachment might be issued against the Defendant for not answering the bill.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, after some hesitation, made the order.

July 7. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] again mentioned this case, and observed that some difficulty had been felt in the registrar's office as to the notice in such cases; and [400] having referred to Williams v. Townsend (6 Sim. 296) and see Hughson v. Cookson, 3 You. & C. 579; 1 Daniel's Pr. 579, note (c.); and Arn. & Ven. 117, his Lordship said, that the way in which the Plaintiff might move an answer would be by amending his bill, and issuing a new subpoena to serve the amended bill; but that he thought it unnecessary to put the Plaintiff to a circuitous proceeding; that he saw nothing which ought to deprive the Plaintiff of equity, or why he should not be allowed to proceed in his suit, and the only objection seemed to be as to the form of the order.

His Lordship ordered that the Defendant should put in his answer within a fortnight after the service of the order, and in default, that the Plaintiff should be at liberty to sue out a new attachment.(1)

Fees of the steward of a manor, who is a solicitor but acts in the character of steward only, are not taxable under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

The statute does not authorise the taxation of every pecuniary demand or bill of a solicitor, for every species of employment in which he may happen to be engaged. He may be taxed though no part of the business was transacted in any Court of Law or Equity, but such business must be connected with the profession of an attorney or solicitor:—business in which the attorney or solicitor was employed because he was an attorney or solicitor, or in which he would not have been employed if he had not been an attorney or solicitor, or if the relation of attorney and solicitor and client had not subsisted between him and his employer.

This case came on upon a petition for the taxation of the bill of fees and charges of Mr. Ward, the steward of the manor of Cookham. Mr. Ward was a solicitor of the Court.

The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37, provides that no solicitor shall commence an action for the recovery of any fees "for any business done" until the expiration of one month after he shall have delivered a bill of such fees; and that upon the application of the party chargeable therewith, the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls may cause such bill to be taxed, "in case the business contained in the bill or any part thereof shall have been transacted in the High Court of Chancery,

NOTE.—The Defendant was afterwards arrested on a second attachment, and on a motion to discharge him out of custody, the regularity of the above order was argued on the 6th of December 1843. The Master of the Rolls, however, made the order regular. See post.

This and the four following cases have been inserted out of their regular order, for the convenience of the branch of the profession peculiarly interested in them.

or in any other Court of Equity, or in any matter of bankruptcy or lunacy, or in case no part of such business shall have been transacted in any Court of law or Equity."

The circumstances which gave rise to this application were as follows:—

A portion of the estates sold under the decree in the cause of Allen v. Aldridge was copyhold, held of the manor of Cookham, of which Mr. William James Ward was steward, and for the purpose of completing the sale, it [402] became necessary that certain surrenders and admissions should be made at a special court of the manor.

On the 14th of July 1843 a court was held for the purpose; but before the required surrenders and admissions were made, Mr. Ward, the steward, claimed for the amount of £74, 15s. 2d. which were complained of at the time, but Mr. Ward stated that the fees which he demanded were the usual fees, and that he would take no less.

The court was adjourned till the next day, when the sum of £74, 15s. 2d. was paid for the steward's fees, the parties, as they alleged, protesting against the fairness of the charges.

This petition was presented by the Plaintiffs and Defendants in the cause. It alleged that Mr. Ward, the steward of the manor, was a practising solicitor and that his charges were excessive, and they therefore prayed that his bill of fees might be taxed.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Stinton, in support of the petition.

The thirty-seventh section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, enacts, that a solicitor shall not bring an action to recover "any fees, charges, or disbursement for any business done by such solicitor," till one month after he has delivered his bill; and upon application of the party chargeable, the Lord Chancellor or Master of the Rolls may direct a taxation, "in case no part of such business" (that is of any business "shall have been transacted in any Court of law or Equity.")

It does not therefore require that the relation of solicitor and client should exist, nor that any part of the business should be done in Court, nor is it necessary [403] that the business should be of a nature which can only be properly done by a solicitor. Thus, for instance, a certificated conveyancer may undertake conveyancing business and his fees would not be taxable under the Act; yet if the same business were done by a solicitor, there can be no doubt that the fees and charges for it would be taxable under the provisions of this statute. The only qualification seems to be that the business must be connected with matters of law. These charges which are all for law business are therefore taxable.

The Court has interfered summarily in the case of a steward of a manor. Thus in Rawes v. Rawes (7 Sim. 624), the steward of a manor, who was also a solicitor, was ordered, on the petition of the lord and in a summary manner, to deliver up the court rolls to the receiver in the cause. And the same principle was acted on in Hughes v. Mayre (3 Term. Rep. 275).

Mr. Kindersley, contra. The fees of a steward of a manor are not taxable under this Act. To bring a case within the statute, the relation of solicitor and client must first be shewn to exist. The thirty-seventh section gives the right of taxation to the party chargeable, that is, to the client. The twenty-eighth section gives a similar right to the party who is liable to pay or who has paid, and by the thirty-ninth section the same right is given to the cestui que trust; but in both the latter instances the relation of solicitor and client must first be established, as between the solicitor and his direct employer who is the "party chargeable." Here the Respondents were neither the attorney of the tenant nor of the lord; he is the representative merely of the latter, and might fill the office of steward, though he were not a solicitor. [404] Can the accidental circumstance of being a solicitor make these charges taxable when they would not otherwise be the subject of taxation?

In the instances of a coroner, or of the officers in the Prerogative Court, or the clerk of the city companies, or the secretary of bankrupts, their fees cannot be the subject of taxation in this Court; but suppose the persons who filled those offices happened, accidentally, to be solicitors, would that circumstance draw with it the right of sending their account of fees to the Taxing Master for taxation? There is no remedy in the present, as in those cases, if there be an extortionate charge, at common law. The fees of a manor depend on the custom, which varies in different manor; these are not matters that come properly within the province of a taxing officer. To send this sort of matters to the Taxing Masters will be to refer to them to decide on the custom of all the manors in England, and their decision on the question of quantum would be final. The cases cited do not apply, they were cases between the lord and his steward, who as an attorney had obtained possession of his lands. The Court always interfered in such cases.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. The object of the Act was to render all the fees and charges of a solicitor taxable, provided they were connected with law business. It is not necessary that the relation of solicitor and client should exist, as parties interested in the fund out of which payment is to be made are entitled to demand a taxation.

The steward has duties to perform towards the tenant as well as the lord, he has the custody of the rolls in which the tenant has a recognised interest, and in surrenders and searches he is employed on behalf of the tenant as well as the lord.

[405] The proper remedy is by an application for taxation; for the steward says, "I will not admit you unless you pay certain fees." The tenant being thus obliged to pay, has no other remedy. If he brought an action, the answer would be that the payment was voluntary; and if he indicted for extortion, he could not, on such a proceeding, recover back the money.

Feb. 19, 1844. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This petition is presented by the Plaintiffs and Defendants in the cause. They allege that Mr. Ward, steward of the manor, is a practising solicitor, and that his charges are excessive, and they therefore pray that his bill of fees may be taxed.

The question is, whether the charges of the steward of a manor who happens to be a solicitor, but was not employed as such, and who acted only as steward of the manor on the occasion in question, are taxable under the statute, and I am of opinion, they are not.

The statute does not authorise the taxation of every pecuniary demand or bill which may be made or delivered by a person who is a solicitor, for every species of employment in which he may happen to be engaged.

The business contained in a taxable bill may be business of which no part was transacted in any Court of law or Equity; but I am of opinion that it must be business connected with the profession of an attorney or solicitor—business in which an attorney or solicitor was employed, because he was an attorney or solicitor, or in which he would not have been employed, if he had not been an attorney or solicitor, or in which the relation of attorney or solicitor and client had not subsisted between him and his employer.

[406] It may perhaps, on some occasions, be questionable, whether the business contained in a solicitor's bill be or be not such as to make the bill taxable under the statute; but in the present case I do not see any reason to doubt. The relation of attorney and client did not subsist between Mr. Ward and the Petitioners, or any of them, or between Mr. Ward and any other person in relation to this matter. He was employed by the Petitioners because he was a solicitor, but because he was steward of the manor, and he might have been steward of the manor, without being a solicitor. His bill is not as to any part of it a solicitor's bill; it is the bill of charges due to be payable to the steward of a manor, and nothing else; and I am of opinion that the statute gives me no jurisdiction over it. I dismiss the petition with costs.

On payment of a bill, an order for taxation is not to be obtained as of course, even if a party liable to pay the same.

By the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, any party entitled to the order may obtain it, as of course, and without special directions, within one month after delivery, and with such special directions as the Court may order to be imposed, after the expiration of one month from the delivery, but not after verdict, writ of inquiry, or payment. In those cases a special order made upon special circumstances, to be proved to the satisfaction of the Court is required.

A mere volunteer, under no previous liability, does not by paying a solicitor's bill acquire a right to tax it.

In January 1843 Mr. Whately assigned his estate to Messrs. Becke & Flower, who were solicitors, on trust to pay the expenses and divide the residue amongst the scheduled creditors. Messrs. Becke & Flower accepted the trusts and incurred the expenses therein.

- In June 1843 Mr. Whately took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, and Mr. Hearne was appointed [407] his assignee. The solicitor of the assignee applied to Messrs. Becke & Flower for the delivery to him of the deed of the assignment and other documents, and the assent of the creditors under the trust deed having been obtained, Messrs. Becke & Flower were willing to do so, on payment of the costs incurred in the preparation of the deed and otherwise about the trusts. On the 15th of August 1843 the particulars of these costs were sent by Messrs. Becke & Flower to the solicitor of Mr. Hearne, the assignee.

On the 10th of November 1843 Mr. Hearne, the assignee, by his solicitor, paid the amount of the charges under protest, at the same time stating that it was his intention to apply for an order for taxation.

On the 16th of November 1843 Mr. Hearne, as assignee of Mr. Whately, obtained ex parte an order for the taxation of the bill of Messrs. Becke & Flower.

A petition was now presented by Messrs. Becke & Flower to discharge the bill, and order for taxation, with costs.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in support of the application. This order is perfectly irregular as an order of course. First, it was obtained ex parte after payment, and under the forty-first section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, it was necessary that the Court should determine whether under "the special circumstances of the case," the required taxation, and that it should impose "such terms and conditions" as should seem right; secondly, it was obtained after the expiration of a month from the date of the delivery of the bill; and after the expiration of that time, by the thirty-seventh section, a taxation can only be obtained "with such directions [408] subject to such conditions as the Court or Judge making such reference shall think proper."

Lastly, the business was never transacted by Messrs. Becke & Flower as solicitors of the insolvent or his assignee, neither of them was therefore a party chargeable by such bill, nor was the Respondent "liable to pay" within the meaning of the thirty-eighth section, and consequently he had no right to get any order for taxation.

Mr. Craig, contra. The right of this party to have the bill taxed arises under the thirty-eighth section. It enacts "That where any person, not the party chargeable with any such bill within the meaning of the provisions thereinbefore contained, shall be liable to pay or shall have paid such bill, either to the attorney or solicitor, executor, administrator, or assignee, or to the party chargeable with such bill as aforesaid, it shall be lawful for such person, his executor, administrator, or assignee, to make such application for a reference for the taxation and settlement of such bill as the party chargeable therewith might himself make." Here, the right to have the bill taxed accrued to Mr. Hearne upon payment of the bill, and the provision in the thirty-seventh section, cannot therefore apply.

The payment was made under protest, and reserving the right to taxation. If, as is argued on the other side, Mr. Hearne, the assignee, is not "the party chargeable," the bill has not been delivered a month, and the order was not obtained as of course within a month after the right to taxation accrued.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. The thirty-eighth section of the Act applies to a party not chargeable, but who pays a bill, in the same situation as the party chargeable.

[409] A stranger having no interest in the matter cannot, by paying a solicitor's bill, acquire, under this Act, a right to tax it.

Feb. 19, 1844. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This petition is presented by solicitors to discharge an order, obtained as of course, to tax their bill, the instance of a person who had paid the bill without having been liable to do so. Two objections were made to the order sought to be discharged.

First; it was obtained as of course after payment of the bill, and three months or it was delivered.

Secondly; it was obtained by a mere volunteer, who, being under no liability, simultaneously paid the bill.

I am of opinion that, after payment of a bill, an order for taxation is not to be made as of course even by a party liable to pay the same. Under the Act, any party entitled to the order may obtain it as of course, and without special directions, one month after delivery, and, with such special directions as the Court may think fit to be imposed, after the expiration of one month from the delivery, but not before a verdict, writ of inquiry, or payment. In those cases a special order, made upon special circumstances to be proved to the satisfaction of the Court, is required.

This order must be discharged, with costs, upon the first objection, that it was made as of course after payment, and without any special direction after the expiration of a month from the time when the bill was [410] delivered. It is therefore unnecessary for me to give any opinion upon the second objection; but I may say that I see no reason to think, that payment by a mere volunteer under no previous liability (which the Respondent has admitted to be the case here), can, upon a fair construction of the Act, give any right to obtain an order to tax the bill.

Order discharged, with costs.

A bill of costs of a mortgagee's solicitor for business done in relation to the mortgage, and the sale of the mortgaged estate, is taxable at the instance of the mortgagor, under the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, though no part of the business may have been conducted in any Court of law or Equity.

The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, as regards taxation, is retrospective with respect to bills previously taxable, and also as to bills thereby made taxable, provided the latter remained unpaid at the passing of the Act.

Payment before the Act came into operation of a previously taxable bill, would not preclude taxation under the Act, upon a proper application made in due time.

Payment before the Act came into operation of a bill not previously taxable, precludes taxation.

This was a petition by a mortgagor for the taxation of the bill of costs of the solicitor of the mortgagee, which had been paid before the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, came into operation. The circumstances were as follows:—In 1841 Mr. Ratcliffe, the mortgagor, mortgaged some property to Mr. Bullman. The mortgage contained a clause of sale in case of default, and Mr. Ratcliffe, who was in possession, attorned to the mortgagee.

Mr. Bullman employed Lees as his solicitor; and the interest of the mortgage being in arrear, Lees, as solicitor of the mortgagee, proceeded to sell the estate. He at the same time distrained for rent, and brought an action at law for the mortgage.

[1] The transaction was completed before the passing of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73 (August 1843). Mr. Lees rendered to the mortgagee an account of his costs, amounting to £92, 11s. 9d. (omitting all charges for the proceedings at common law), and gave a receipt for the same on the 26th of July 1843. An account was also made out of the receipts and payments in respect of the transaction, and after deducting for the purchase-money and the money levied under the distress, it shewed a balance of £8, 10s. due from the mortgagor to the mortgagee.

Mr. Ratcliffe now presented a petition for the taxation of the bill, alleging in his petition specific errors and overcharges in the bill of costs.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Fleming, for the Petitioner, contended that the Act gave jurisdiction to tax the bill, and that the special circumstances of this case, (on which they commented at length) required it. They argued that the right to tax the bill of costs could not be defeated by the fraudulent omission of all the taxable items.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bagshawe, contra. The bill and accounts were fully settled before the Act came into operation, and cannot now be taken into consideration under the authority of that Act. Before the Act, the mortgagee was not entitled to refer the bill of the mortgagor's solicitor for taxation, and he cannot therefore do so now; for the Act had no operation in a transaction finally settled before it came into operation. In addition to this, the bill contains no items taxable according to the old law.

[412] As to the specialties complained of, viz., the amount of charges, they have all been occasioned by the default and misconduct of the Petitioner.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I will reserve this case for consideration; but if I depended merely on its specialties, I must say I think there are circumstances to warrant the interference of the Court.

The case depends upon the question, whether these are matters properly to be considered under the authority of the recent Act of Parliament. The principal objection is, that all the accounts were fully settled and disposed of before the Act came into operation. To decide this case I must look at the affidavits to ascertain what really took place; for if there be jurisdiction under the Act to tax costs and charges arising out of an employment before the Act, the only question will be, whether the jurisdiction is excluded by the payment which is alleged to have been made.

I will read the affidavits; but I wish it to be understood that the decision on the construction of the Act will not be influenced by the imputed misconduct of the parties. They may however be observed upon on a proper occasion.

Feb. 19, 1844. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This petition is presented by a mortgagor, and it prays for the taxation of a bill of costs delivered to the [413] mortgagee by his solicitor, for business done in relation to the mortgage and the sale of the mortgaged estate.

The relation of solicitor and client subsisted between the mortgagee and the solicitor whose bill it is desired to tax, and a just bill being payable by the mortgagor or out of the mortgaged estate, this is one of the cases in which the bill is made taxable under the statute, although no part of the business contained in it may have been transacted in any Court of law or Equity.

But three objections are stated: first, that the whole of the business was done before the statute came into operation; secondly, that the bill was actually paid by the mortgagee before the statute came into operation; and, thirdly, that the bill, even if it were taxable before payment, cannot, after payment, be taxed without special circumstances, which, in the present case, do not exist.

Upon the last point I expressed my opinion at the hearing of the petition, and a subsequent perusal of the affidavits has strongly confirmed the view which I then took of the case, that the special circumstances are such, as to make taxation proper if the bill were taxable, notwithstanding that the business charged for was done, and the amount paid, before the statute came into operation. I have therefore now to consider only the two first points.

I entirely concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice Patteson, who has held that the statute applies to matters which occurred before it passed, although the bills had been delivered before that time. This opinion has reference to bills which were taxable under the law existing before the Act was passed; and if there had been no [414] payment, it appears to me that the Act would have been equally applicable to bills which were for the first time made taxable by the statute. In this case, if there had been no payment, the solicitor might have been put to his action, or to his right of forcing a lien, and the mortgagee would have had a right to resist the demand, and to shew its exorbitancy by legal means, and this Act coming into operation, would have enabled him to ascertain the just amount by taxation; and I think that a mortgagor would, under the Act, have had the same right. I am therefore of opinion, that it is no sufficient objection to the taxation of this bill that the business was done before the Act came into operation.

I am further disposed to think, that the payment of a previously taxable bill before the Act came into operation, would not have precluded taxation under the Act, on a proper application made in due time, because, as the law before stood, taxation might have been had upon a proper case after payment, and the client made, the solicitor received payment, knowing that taxation might have been had. By the payment of a bill which was not taxable, the demand of the solicitor was satisfied, and the mortgagor, as the law then stood, could not, after payment, obtain an order for taxation; there was an end of the solicitor's claim, and of the client's right or power to recover an over-payment by taxation; and, after some doubt, it came to me that the Act does not apply to a case where a bill not previously taxable was paid before the Act was passed.

It was argued, that there was not sufficient proof, that the bill was in fact paid at the time when it is alleged to have been paid; but on the evidence I think that, upon the petition, I must consider that the bill was paid at the time alleged.

[415] I am, therefore, under the necessity of dismissing this petition; but, having regard to the conduct of the Respondent, it must be without costs.

[415] SAYER v. WAGSTAFF. Feb. 9, 19, 1844.

[S. C. 13 L. J. Ch. 161; on appeal, 14 L. J. Ch. 116; 8 Jur. 1083. See In re London, &c., Banking Company, 1865, 34 Beav. 336.]

petition being presented for the taxation of a solicitor's bill: Held, that the application was to be considered as made at the latest at the time of answering the petition, and not at the time of service of the petition, or the day appointed for hearing. In cases of accidental delay in the office, the period may be carried further back.

Where a debtor delivers to his creditor his promissory note for the amount of the debt, the debt may be considered as actually paid, if the creditor, at the time of receiving the note, has agreed to take it in payment of the debt, and to take upon himself the risk of the note being paid; or if, from the conduct of the creditor, or the special circumstances of the case, such an agreement is legally to be implied. But in the absence of any special circumstances, the transaction does not amount to a discharge of the original debt, but a mere extended credit.

A solicitor delivered his bill of costs on the 14th of October 1842, for which, the client, on the 3d of November 1842, gave his promissory note, which was paid on the 14th of November 1842. On the 15th of November 1843 the client presented a petition for the taxation of the bill, which was answered on the 16th, and was heard on the 21st. The day appointed for hearing was the 24th. Held, first, that the bill must be considered as paid on the 17th of November 1842; and, secondly, that the application for taxation must be considered as made at the latest on the 14th of November 1843, and consequently that the application for taxation had been made within twelve months, according to the forty-first section of the 6 & 7 W. 4. c. 73.

This was a petition by a client for the taxation of his solicitor's bill.

The facts which were not in dispute, were as follows:—

The signed bill, amounting to £135, 2s. 8d., was delivered to the Petitioner on the 14th of October 1842, and payment was then requested.

On the 3d of November 1842 the Petitioner, with a view to discharge the bill, gave to the Respondent his promissory note for £135 payable in fourteen days, and on the 17th of the same month of November, the promissory note was duly honoured and paid.

[416] On the 15th of November 1843 the present petition for taxation was brought to the secretary's office. On the following day the common answer or order requiring the parties concerned to attend on the then next petition day (the 24th of November) and that notice should be given, was written on the petition, and signed by the secretary in the usual manner. The petition was served on the 31st of November, and might have been heard on the 24th, if the parties had been ready and the state of business in Court had allowed it.

The Respondent alleged, that the bill had been paid more than twelve calendar months before any application had been made to tax it, and that, therefore, taxation was precluded by the proviso in the forty-first section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

The Petitioner, on the other hand, alleged, that the bill in question had been paid less than twelve calendar months at the time he applied for the order to tax it; and that, under the special circumstances, there ought to be a reference for taxation notwithstanding payment.

The questions therefore raised were, first, as to the time when the bill was paid, and, secondly, as to the time when the Petitioner, according to the terms of the forty-first section, "made the application for such reference" for taxation.

A third question arose, in the event of its being determined that the application was made within twelve months, which was this: whether "the special circumstances of the case," in the opinion of the Court, appeared to require a taxation of the bill. It was, however, arranged between the parties, that the third question should not be discussed until the preliminary question had first been disposed of.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. George Turner, in support of the petition, contended that the forty-first section did not in all cases preclude taxation, where the application was not made within twelve months after payment; and that if such had been the intention of the Legislature, it would have been distinctly expressed. That before the statute, a solicitor's bill could be taxed after payment, if there were special circumstances, Horlock v. Smith (2 Myl. & Cr. 495); and that now the Court under its general jurisdiction over its officers, had still the power, in a proper case and under special circumstances, of sending a bill for taxation, although twelve months had expired.

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The forty-first section seems to impose two conditions: it says that payment shall not preclude taxation if "the special circumstances of the case shall require it, and provided the application is made" within twelve calendar months after payment.]

The forty-first section only applies to bills of costs "taxed and settled;" for this section only provides for the case "of any such bills as aforesaid," and, therefore, refers to the bills mentioned in the clause immediately preceding, namely, a bill "taxed and settled." The thirty-seventh section authorises all bills to be taxed; and the forty-first creates an exception limited to those bills which have been "taxed and settled."

Secondly, they insisted that the application for taxation had been made within twelve calendar months [418] after payment; and in support of this position they contended, that payment of the bill of costs took place on the 17th of November when the promissory note was paid; that giving a promissory note was but a promise and not a payment, and created a mere suspension of the right to sue, for it had been repeatedly decided, that upon the dishonour of a bill given for a debt, the original cause of action revived.

Next they argued, that the application for taxation must be considered as having been made on the day on which the party had presented his petition, and applied to have a day fixed for the hearing, or at least on the day on which it was answered. They contended that this was like the case of filing a bill, in which to save the Statute of Limitations, proceedings were said to have commenced upon filing the bill, and not upon service of the subpoena. Coppin v. Gray (1 Y. & C. (C. C.) 205).

[THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. There are four periods at which it may be argued that the application was made; first, the time of presenting the petition; secondly, time of answering it; thirdly, the time of service; and, fourthly, the day appointed for hearing.]

The time appointed for hearing cannot be considered the time at which the application is made, otherwise if the application be made before the Long Vacation, the next petition day would be three months off, so that in effect, three months might be taken from the twelve months given to the party to apply for a taxation. Neither can the time of service be the period: the words [419] of the Act preclude that construction, in that "the application for such reference" be made, &c. The other two periods remain, in either of which cases the Petitioner is in time.

Mr. Cooper and Mr. Moore, contra. The Petitioner has not come within twelve months after payment, and has therefore no right to any order for taxation. After payment, the forty-first section of this Act precludes the taxation of a bill in all cases, and in cases of fraud, unless the application be made within twelve months. In case of fraud the Court, we admit, has still jurisdiction over its officer, but by another proceeding, and not by the taxation of his bill of costs.

Secondly, the bill must be considered as having been paid on the 3d of November, when the promissory note was given. A note duly honoured must, for the purpose of this Act, be considered as payment as from the day on which it was given. The Court thereby settles and adopts the bill of costs, and the solicitor may then transfer the right to another party. In Ross v. Clifton (Bail Court, November 22, 1843) a bill of exchange had been given in August 1842, for the balance of a bill of costs. Mr. Justice Patteson referred to a case in which Mr. Justice Coltman was of opinion that payment was made when the securities were given; and Mr. Justice Patteson added, as to the question whether what took place in August 1842 amounted to payment, "I hesitate in determining that it did not, after the opinion ascribed to my brother on the point." The rule there in question was however discharged on other grounds.

[420] Thirdly, it is not necessary to argue whether the time of hearing is to be the period at which the application is to be considered as having been made. It is sufficient for the purpose of the Respondent to carry it to the time of service. That is the period best adapted for the purpose of giving effect to the intentions of the Act. All orders, of course, like the present, take effect from the service; and if it were otherwise, a party might present the petition, and wholly neglect to serve it, the solicitor, having no notice of the pendency of a petition, might nevertheless prevent availing himself of the benefit of the lapse of time afforded by the statute.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The petition must necessarily be served before the day appointed for hearing, which is always the next petition day.]

If the proceeding had been by motion and not by petition, the application for taxation could not be said to be made when the notice was served, but when the petition was brought before the Court.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved judgment.

[421] 19. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There can be no doubt that the bill in question was paid on the 17th of November 1842; but the Respondent insists that it ought to be deemed to have been paid on the 3d day of the same month, when he received from the Petitioner the promissory note, which was afterwards duly honoured and paid.

Again, the Petitioner alleges that his application for an order to tax the bill, if made on the day when [421] he left his petition at the secretary's office, must, at least, be held to have been made on the 16th of November 1843, when the petition was answered. On the other hand, the Respondent insists that service of the petition was necessary to make the application effectual; and that, therefore, the application ought to be deemed to have been made on the 21st of November 1843, on which day the petition was served.

I shall first consider the time when the application for a reference was made.

Any party desirous to have a matter heard on petition takes his petition to the secretary's office. The secretary makes an entry in his book of the cause or matter on which the petition is presented, and writes upon the petition itself the usual order for the parties to attend on the day appointed for hearing the petition, and for notice to be given. The petition is, from the time when such order is made, a regular proceeding in Court, upon which affidavits may be made; and any party interested to inquire whether a petition in his matter has been presented or not, may ascertain the fact on application to the secretary. Previously to the time appointed for hearing, and before the petition can be set down to be heard, a copy of it is to be left for the perusal of the Judge who is to hear it, and the petition itself is to be filed before any order upon it is passed. (Ord. Can. 53.)

And such being the course of proceeding, I am of opinion, that an application for the purpose stated and prayed by the petition must be considered as made, at the latest, at the time when the order appointing the [422] time for hearing the petition, is signed either by the Judge to whom the petition is addressed, or by his officer acting under his directions. If it should happen that a petition was duly brought to the office, and without any default of the Petitioner, but by some accident or neglect in the office, the answer or order was not made at the time when it ought to have been, the application might be considered as made even before the answer or order for attendance was signed (Richards v. Wood, 2 Myl. & K. 621; Barnes v. Wilson, 1 Russ. & Myl. 486; Dearman v. Wych, 4 Myl. & Cr. 550); but no such question arises here. The petition was answered; and I must consider that the application for reference to tax the bill in question was made on the 16th of November 1843.

Now the proviso in the forty-first section of the statute is, "that the application for such reference be made within twelve calendar months after payment." It is the application, not the service of a petition or the time appointed for hearing a petition, but the application alone which is to take place, or be made within twelve months after payment; and I have now to inquire whether the 16th of November 1843, the time of the application in this case, was within twelve calendar months after payment of the Respondent's bill.

If the bill was paid on the 3d of November 1842, as the Respondent alleges, more than twelve months had elapsed between the payment and the application for the reference; but if the payment was not made till the 17th of November, as the Petitioner alleges, then, at the time of the application for the reference, twelve months had not elapsed from the time when the bill was paid.

[423] The substantial question is, whether a debt is to be considered as paid, at the time of the delivery to the creditor of a promissory note for the amount payable on a future day, on which, or in due time after which, the note is afterwards duly honoured and paid.

The debt may be considered as actually paid, if the creditor, at the time of receiving the note, has agreed to take it in payment of the debt, and to take upon himself the risk of the note being paid, or if, from the conduct of the creditor or the special circumstances of the case, such an agreement is legally to be implied.

But in the absence of any special circumstances throwing the risk of the note upon the creditor, his receiving the note in lieu of present payment of the debt, is no more than giving extended credit, postponing the demand for immediate payment, and giving time for payment on a future day, in consideration of receiving this species of security. Whilst the time runs, payment cannot legally be enforced, but the debt continues till payment is actually made; and if payment be not made when the time has run out, payment of the debt may be enforced as if the note had not been given. (1) If payment be made at or before the expiration of the extended time allowed, it is then, for the first time, that the debt is paid.

There may, as I have said, be special circumstances, from which it may be concluded that a note or bill of exchange was taken as payment of the debt for which it was given; and it is said that, in a case before Mr. [424] Justice Colman & Chambers, he held that payment was to be considered to have been made at the time when a bill and note were given as securities for payment. There may have been circumstances leading to that conclusion in the case referred to; there are, I think, no such circumstances in the case now before me. I have thought it right to examine the affidavits, for the purpose of ascertaining whether there was any evidence that Mr. Sanders took this note in lieu and full satisfaction of the debt due to him.

(1) See Puckford v. Maxwell, 6 Term Rep. 52; Owenson v. Morse, 7 Term Rep. 64; Tempest v. Ord, 1 Mad. 89; Atkinson v. Hawdon, 2 Ad. & E. 628.

the bill of costs, and I find no such evidence. Mr. Sanders did not take upon himself the whole risk of the note. The Petitioner was not released from the debt. If the note had not been duly paid, Mr. Sanders would have been entitled to enforce payment of the amount due to him upon his bill, and might have brought an action against the Petitioner to recover it.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the bill was not paid till the 17th of November 1842, and that the application for the reference to tax the bill was made on the 16th of November 1843, being one day less than twelve calendar months after the payment. The bill may be taxed, if there are such special circumstances as to make taxation proper, and the petition must be further heard as to that point.

The petition stood over to the next petition day to be heard on the special circumstances.

[425] In re DOWNES. Feb. 10, 19, 1844.

Application by cestui que trust for the taxation of a bill of costs paid by his trustees more than twelve calendar months, refused.

Where a cestui que trust applies for taxation, then if there has been no payment, the rules under which taxation is to be directed are such as are pointed out by the thirty-seventh section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, and if there has been payment, by the forty-first section.

Whenever the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73 applies, the Court cannot in any case whatever send a bill for taxation as against the solicitor, if it has been paid more than twelve months, but the Court may, after that period, direct a taxation as between a trustee and his cestui que trust, to justify the payments of the former.

The words "any such bill," in the forty-first section, do not mean the bill mentioned in the section immediately preceding, viz., any bill "previously taxed and settled;" nor are they limited to such bills as under the provisions of the Act are sought to be taxed by a party directly chargeable.

Where a solicitor's bill has been paid by a trustee, the cestui que trust cannot after the expiration of twelve months from payment, obtain a taxation, as against the solicitor, although he had no notice of the payment until after the twelve months had expired. Semble.

This petition was presented by persons interested in the estate of John Bullock, deceased, praying that several bills of costs paid by the trustees of John Bullock's estate might be taxed.

On the first hearing of the petition, the Court expressed an opinion that the only question upon which any question arose was to be considered as paid on the 2d day of November 1842, and the application for a reference to tax the bill having been made more than twelve calendar months after payment, the question was, whether the bill was taxable under the Act.

Mr. Turner, in support of the petition.

As the Petitioners are interested in the property out of which the trustees have the bill in question, the Court is, by the thirty-ninth section of the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, authorised to refer the bill for taxation. That clause directs, "that in any case in which a trustee has become chargeable with such bill, the Court, on the application of a party interested in the property out of which the trustees may have the bill, may refer the same for taxation."

[426] The fact of payment for more than twelve months does not, under the thirty-ninth section, preclude the taxation.

The forty-first section must be limited to some particular bills, and cannot be extended to all paid bills; for the thirty-seventh section, which extends to all bills paid or unpaid, authorises a taxation after twelve months "under special circumstances to be proved to the Court." Now, by the forty-first section, "the fact of any such bill as aforesaid," is in no case to preclude taxation, provided the application for the reference be made within twelve calendar months after payment. The words "any such bills as aforesaid" have reference to the bills mentioned in the section immediately preceding the fortieth, which are bills "previously taxed and settled;" therefore, to bring the case within the forty-first section, the bill must have been previously taxed as well as settled.

Lastly, the words "any such bill as aforesaid," contained in the forty-first section, apply only to bills sought to be taxed by parties directly chargeable, and not those sought to be taxed at the instance of parties out of whose property the bills are payable as in the present case, who may have no notice of the payment until long after twelve months have expired.

Mr. Kindersley, contrâ. The proviso in the forty-first section, "that the application for the reference be made within twelve calendar months after payment," precludes any taxation after that period.

The forty-first section is the first which relates to bills which have been paid. The thirty-seventh relates to unpaid bills alone, which may be taxed as of course [427] within a month after delivery of the bill, or with special directions and conditions after that period until the expiration of twelve months: but no reference is to be made after verdict, &c., or after twelve months, "except under special circumstances, to be proved to the satisfaction of the Court." The thirty-eighth and thirty-ninth sections relate to taxation at the instance of third parties; but they only give to such persons similar rights to those to which the parties chargeable are entitled.

The forty-first section applies to all cases in which payment has been made.

Mr. Headlam, for the trustees.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

Feb. 19. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This petition is presented by persons interested in the estate of John Bullock, deceased, praying that certain bills of costs, paid by the trustees of John Bullock's will, may be taxed.

On the hearing of the petition, I expressed my opinion that the only bill on which any question arises was to be considered as paid on the 2d day of May 1884, and the application for a reference to tax the bill having been made more than twelve calendar months after payment, the question is, whether the bill is taxable under the Act.

The Act provides, that where a trustee has become chargeable with a bill of costs, the Court, upon the application of a party interested in the property on which the trustee may have paid, or be entitled to pay, the bill, may refer the bill to be taxed, with such directions as may be thought proper; and I think that, as to such special directions as may be thought proper in the peculiar case, the directions under which the taxation is to be directed are such as are pointed out in the thirty-seventh section, if there has been no payment, and by the forty-first section if there has been payment.

By the thirty-seventh section, the case of the bill having been paid is not at all contemplated. It relates to unpaid bills only, and provides that, within one month after delivery, taxation may be ordered without special direction; that, after the expiration of one month from the time of the bill being delivered, taxation may be ordered with such directions as the Court may think proper, and that after verdict or writ of inquiry, taxation is only to be ordered on special circumstances, to be proved to the satisfaction of the Court.

The forty-first section contemplates the case of payment before any application for tax the bill is made; and it provides that payment shall not preclude taxation, if special circumstances of the case shall, in the opinion of the Court, appear to require the same, upon such terms and conditions, and subject to such directions as the Court shall seem right, "provided the application for such reference be made within twelve calendar months after payment."

It was argued that the forty-first section, if construed to extend to all paid bills, would be inconsistent with the thirty-seventh section, which extends to all unpaid bills; secondly, that, upon the true construction of the Act, the words, "any such bills as aforesaid," contained in the forty-first section, mean only any such bill as is mentioned in the section immediately preceding to have been "taxed and settled."

and, thirdly, that, at all events, the words "any such bill as aforesaid" contained in the forty-first section cannot be construed to mean any bill which is sought to be taxed by parties other than those directly chargeable therewith.

I cannot concur in any of these arguments. The thirty-seventh section relates exclusively to unpaid bills; and, if it were not for the forty-first section, paid bills would not be taxable at all under this Act. But the forty-first section enacts, that payment shall not preclude taxation, if the circumstances be such as to make taxation proper, and if the application be made within twelve calendar months after payment. Mr. Justice Patteson, in the case of Bians v. Hey (Q. Bench Bail Court, 22d Nov. 1843), stated that he considered the true construction of the clause to be, that wherever the Act applies, the Court cannot send a bill for taxation if it has been paid more than twelve months in any case whatever. I entirely concur in that opinion, as affording the general rule, subject, however, to a qualification in this Court. I think that in this Court the bill cannot be ordered to be taxed as against the solicitor himself, if twelve calendar months have elapsed after the payment. But if a trustee or executor has paid a solicitor's bill improperly, and has neglected to procure the bill to be taxed in due time, there appears to be nothing in this Act to prevent this Court (when called upon to disallow the whole or part of a payment alleged to have been made by a trustee or executor) from ascertaining, by taxation, if necessary, what is a proper sum to be allowed to the trustee or executor for his payment. (Hazard v. Lane, 3 Mer. 291; Grove v. Sansom, 1 Beav. 297.)

[430] I cannot so construe the Act as to make the words "any such bill as aforesaid" in the forty-first section to mean only "any such bill as is hereinbefore mentioned to have been taxed and settled," or "any such bill as under the provisions of this Act is sought to be taxed by a party directly chargeable with such bill." The words themselves import no such restriction, and I can find nothing to warrant the proposed construction.

It is supposed that there may be some hardship on third parties who are enabled to tax the bills within a limited time only, and may have had no notice of the payment till too late. Such cases may arise, and in them the statute does not give so much benefit as might perhaps be desired; but the case stands thus:—Before the Act came into operation, the cestui que trust, out of whose estate a solicitor's bill was to be paid, could not procure the bill to be taxed as against the solicitor directly, but he might impeach any improper or extravagant payment made by his trustee in discharge of the solicitor's bill, and might, as against the trustee, cause the solicitor's bill to be taxed. Under the Act, every remedy which the cestui que trust had against the trustee remains to him, and, besides that, he is entitled to ask for taxation against the solicitor directly, at any time before payment of the bill, or within twelve calendar months after payment.

I am of opinion that there ought to be no taxation of the bill which was paid on the 2d of May 1842.

[431] HINDE v. BLAKE. Nov. 25, 1842.

Attachment discharged, with costs, on the ground of the order upon which it was founded having inaccurately stated the consequences of a non-performance.

An order had been made on the 7th of May 1842 upon the Defendant for the transfer into Court of the sum of £11,000 consols. (4 Beavan, 597.)

The order was served on the Defendant; but at this time the 11th and 12th General Orders of the 26th of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 166, note (a.), and 167, note (a.)) had been amended by the 6th Order of the 11th of April 1842. (Ord. Can. 166, 167, and 198.)

The order, instead of stating that if the Defendant neglected to obey it, "he would be liable to be arrested under a writ of attachment," as it ought to have done according to the amended orders, stated, in the old form, "that he would be liable to be arrested by the serjeant-at-arms." &c.

The Defendant neglected to make the transfer, and an attachment issued.

Mr. Lovat now moved to discharge it for irregularity, on the ground that the copy of the order served incorrectly stated the consequences of a default in obeying it.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] discharged it with costs.

[432] SMITH v. HARTLEY. Dec. 3, 1842.

Upon an application to file a supplemental answer, the Defendant should state on notice of motion the facts intended to be introduced therein.

Mr. Simpson moved on behalf of the Defendants for liberty to put in a supplemental answer.

The notice of motion did not, however, specify the facts intended to be introduced into the supplemental answer.

Mr. Shebbeare, for the Plaintiffs, did not oppose the motion; but two of the being infants, he said he could not consent thereto.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The rule adopted in this Court to require a Defendant coming for liberty to file a supplemental answer to state his notice of motion the facts intended to be introduced therein. It is necessary that the party coming here as a Respondent should know beforehand what it is the intention of the Defendants to ask of the Court.

His Lordship said, that if the Plaintiffs did not object, he should be disposed to give liberty to the Defendants to introduce into the supplemental answer the facts stated in the affidavit filed on his behalf in support of the motion.

The Plaintiffs' counsel thinking this insufficient, the motion stood over. (Haslar v. Hollis, 2 Beav. 236, and Whitcombe v. Minchin, 1 Wils. C. C. 1.)

[433] MARCH v. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL. June 10, July 22, 1842.

[S. C. 12 L. J. Ch. 31; 6 Jur. 829. See Walker v. Milne, 1849, 11 Beav. 518.]

Policies of assurance by which the directors engage "to pay out of the funds, "that the funds shall be liable," or "that a share of the funds shall be paid," not so connected with land, as, under the Mortmain Act, to render invalid a gift of them to charity, although the assets of the assurance companies consist partly of real estate.

The rule is the same, although, by the policy sealed with the corporate seal of the company, the assured becomes a member.

The testatrix, Mary Barfield, bequeathed the residue of her monies, securities, money, and her other personal estate to certain charities; and it being alleged that part of such personal estate was so connected with land as to render the gift of it to charity invalid, under the Statute of Mortmain (9 G. 2, c. 36), this suit was instituted for the purpose of having the rights of the next of kin and of the charities ascertained.

A decree was made in the cause, dated the 24th of July 1838, which, directing the usual accounts to [434] be taken of the personal estate of Mary Barfield, ordered the Master to ascertain and state the clear residue of such personal estate, and of what the same consisted, and the nature and particulars thereof, how much consisted of pure personalty, and how much of personalty connected with land.

The Master, by his report, dated the 20th of December 1841, certified that the residuary personal estate of the testatrix, at the time of her death, consisted, in part, of the following particulars:—

1st. A sum of £2000 due from John Wall, with an arrear of interest from 14th of August 1838, and which was secured by mortgage of a policy of insurance from the Society of Equitable Assurances.

2dly. A sum of £210 received from the Economic Life Assurance Society upon a policy of insurance on the life of Margaret Maria Adam.

3dly. A sum of £150 assured on the life of Joseph Hudson (who was still living) in the Law Life Assurance Office.

And, 4thly. A sum of £1200, which was received on a policy of insurance effected by the testatrix on the life of George Hornsby in the Amicable Assurance Society.

The Master stated his opinion, that the same several sums of £2000, £210, £150, and £1200 received upon or secured by such policies of insurance were personal estate connected with land, according to and in the proportion, which the funds properly subject to the payment thereof, which consisted of estates or securities on real estates, bear to the funds and property subject to the payment thereof, which consisted of pure personal estate.

[435] To this finding three sets of exceptions were taken; and the exceptants alleged, that the Master ought to have found all the several sums of £2000, £210, £150, and £1200 to be pure and personal estate.

It appeared that all of the several insurance companies by whose policies these several sums were secured, and upon which policies all the sums except the £150, had been received, were entitled to some real estate, or chattels real, or some funds which were secured on mortgages of real estate or chattels real; and that such being the stocks or funds of the several insurance companies, they adopted several distinct modes of providing for the payment of the sums payable on the policies they granted.

The policies granted by the Equitable Assurance Society consisted of covenants by two trustees, that they, upon the payments becoming due, would pay or cause to be paid, out of the stock or fund of the society, unto the executors of the assured the full sum assured.

The policies of the Economic Life Assurance Society were instruments signed by three directors, providing, that if the premiums were duly paid, the funds and property of the society, according to the articles of settlement, after payment of all prior charges, should be liable to pay the sums assured; and it was declared, that the funds or property of the society, after payment of prior charges, should alone be answerable for the payment of the sums assured.

The policies of the Law Life Assurance Society were signed by three directors, and provided, that if the premiums were duly paid, the stocks, funds, securities, and property of the society should be liable, according [436] to the provisions of the deed of settlement, to pay the sum assured; and that the subscribed capital and other stocks, funds, and securities and property of the society should alone be liable to answer the claims on the society.

The policies of the Amicable Society were sealed with the common seal of the society, and thereby the assured were admitted members of the society, and the society obliged themselves to pay to the person effecting the policy, such a proportion or share of the joint stock and fund of the society, as would become due on the death of the assured according to the charter or bye-laws of the society.

The exceptions now came on for argument.

Mr. Pemberton, and Mr. Metcalfe, and Mr. Teed, and Mr. Rolt, in support of the charitable gifts. This case is governed by the authority of The Attorney-General v. Piles, which was before Sir C. C. Pepys, M. R., in 1835. There, India stock had been given to a charity, and it was contended, that because the company held real estate, the gift to the charity was void under the Mortmain Act, but the Master of the Rolls decided otherwise; he considered the real estate held merely for trading purposes. The principle established by this decision was, that stock in a public company is not subject to the operation of the Mortmain Act, although a part of the property used for the purposes of trade consists of realty. And so it was held in Bligh v. Brent (2 You. & C. 268), where a question arose as to shares in the Chelsea Water Works Company, it was held [437] that real estate belonging to a trading company was personal property, and would pass by a will not executed with the formalities then required for devising real estate. The policies are merely personal obligations to pay certain sums in a given event; Andrews v. Ellison (6 Moore, 199); and it is quite immaterial out of what fund they may ultimately be paid. They create no specific lien on any property, and give the assured no right to interfere with the property of the assurer.

In Gurney v. Rawlins (2 Mea. & W. 87) it was held that monies due on a policy were bona notabilia where the insured died and the policy was, and not where the stock and fund out of which it was payable was situate. Lord Abinger there observed: "The Defendants are liable in their own persona. The policy does not give any right against the fund itself."

The covenant to the extent of assets of a company is similar to the limited covenant of an individual; it resembles the liability of an executor to pay to the extent of assets, and it gives no lien on the property. All debts are now payable out of the real estate of a testator, and no part of the assets of a testator which consist of debts, can (according to the doctrine of the other side) be given to charity.

It is true that in Howse v. Chapman (4 Ves. 542) bonds given by Commissioners for improving the City of Bath were held to be within the statute; but as the Master of the Rolls, in The Attorney-General v. Giles observed, it does not appear from the report on what grounds that decision was made, nor on what estates the bonds were secured.

[438] The inconvenience of apportioning the real and personal estates of an insurance company, for the purpose of awarding to a charity the proportion of the legacy which the personal estate of the company bears to its real estate, is to appear.

Mr. Tinney, for the executors.

Mr. Wray, for the Attorney-General.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. Stinton, contra, for the next of kin. The Court cannot be governed by the consideration of convenience; if it could, the inconvenience of repealing a statute, and the very numerous decisions upon it, would be a very forcible reason for adopting the construction contended for by the next of kin. The statute (9 G. 2, c. 36), which was passed for the purpose of preventing "the disherison of the lawful heirs," enacts that no lands, &c., shall be given, &c., "or any ways charged or incumbered" for any charitable uses whatsoever. This statute, therefore, in its terms strictly prohibits the charging of real estate for charitable uses.

The decisions shew the inclination of the Courts to carry out the intention of the Act to its very letter, in order to prevent the disherison of the heirs. Thus, it has been held, that the benefit of a grant from the Crown to lay down chains in the Thames for mooring ships is an interest in land and within the statute; Negus v. Coulter (Amb. 367). So also a mortgage of turnpike tolls, Knapp v. Williams (4 Ves. 430, n.); the bonds of Commissioners for the improvement of the City of Bath, Howse v. Chapman (4 Ves. 542); and money secured on the poor rates, Finch v. Squire (10 Ves. 41). Again, where a testator who has given his personal estate to charitable uses, contracts to sell real estate, but the sale is not completed in his lifetime, his lien upon the estate for the amount of the purchase-money is an interest in land within the Statute of Mortmain, and the purchase-money will not pass by his will to a charity, Harrison v. Harrison (1 Russ. & M. 71, and Tamlyn, 273). So judgment debt due to a testator, and which was paid out of the real estate of the debtor, was held to be incapable of passing to a charitable use under the statute, Collinson v. Pater (2 Russ. & Myl. 344).

The question is not, as stated by the other side, whether there is a lien on land or a right to take possession of it in satisfaction, this objection would be answered by the cases of Negus v. Coulter, where the right was to lay chains, and Knapp v. Williams, where the security was on the tolls and not on the gates, and Howse v. Chapman and Finch v. Squire, in which no such lien or right existed. If it were a question of lien the policies, in some of these cases, create a lien on the property of the companies. Again, it does not depend on there being a personal liability by covenant or otherwise. The instance of a mortgage debt is an answer to that argument.

In The King v. Bates (3 Price, 341) parish bonds, secured "upon the credit of the rates or assessments" under Paving Acts of the parish of Marylebone, were held to be not mere chattel interests, but charges on the owners of the houses in respect of the houses.

[440] The Attorney-General v. Giles was decided on this:—the Court considered that under the East India Company Acts, there was a mere right to receive and an obligation to pay interest in respect of trading profits not exceeding 10½ per cent., and that the real estate, so far as it was situate in England, was held merely for trading purposes.

The charge cannot be apportioned in favour of the charity; Hobson v. Blackburn (10 Ves. 273) and Finch v. Squire (10 Ves. 44); in which Sir William Grant, referring to the fact of the poor and county rates being payable out of both real and personal property, says, "As to that part of the poor rates that is raised out of the personal property, it cannot be distinguished. I cannot divide and apportion the security; so much is to be imputed to the produce of land, and so much is from personal property. I must take the whole. They are so blended that it is impossible to distinguish them. If the consequence of their [the Christian Knowledge Society] adding this security would be that something real would go to the charity, it must all altogether."

The case differs from Waite v. Webb (6 Mad. 71).

Mr. Teed, in reply.

July 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In the various forms used, the mixed funds or stock of the societies or companies are referred to as the funds out of which the grantors of the policies are to make the payments. "The grantors will pay out of the funds," [441] "the funds shall be liable," or "a share of the funds shall be paid," are the different forms of expression used; the seeming intent being, to relieve, if practicable, those who execute the policies from personal liabilities, and to hold out to the grantees the notion of security for the payment of the sums of money payable on the policies. The question is, whether, under such circumstances, the sums secured are pure personal estate or personal estate connected with land.

The grantees of the policies contract for a sum of money to be paid on a future event. Whatever may be the property possessed by the grantors, the grantees are not, by their contract, any immediate control over it or lien upon it. The grantors or their trustees continue to have the entire control or management over the whole fund; the real estate or chattels real may be sold and converted into pure personalty, and the pure personalty may be converted into chattels real. This state of things may continue, not only during the contingency upon which payment depends, but after the contingency has determined; for the grantee acquires no specific lien after the payment has become due. Even in default of payment when the grantee cannot, by reason of such default only, resort immediately and at once to land or chattels real, but must resort to legal process which will not affect the land possessed by the office at the time of the contract, although it may, in its result, affect such land as the office may have at the time when the process is executed. Ordinarily, the grantee has nothing but a right of action from the date of the contract until actual payment; and although I conceive it to be possible in some circumstances to arise, in which from the state of the funds, the claims upon it, or the misconduct of trustees and directors, the Court would take possession of the property, and apply it for [442] the benefit of all persons having claims upon it, I conceive that the bare possibility of such interference, within the meaning of the Mortmain Act, does not connect a sum of money payable on a policy of insurance with the quality of the property which may be held by the grantors.

The cases which have been decided, have gone a great length in bringing money upon securities which affect real estate within the meaning of the Mortmain Act; none of them go so far as is attempted in this case. Where there is a right to toll turnpike tolls, or poor rates, or county rates specifically applied in payment of mortgage, the money so secured has been held within the Mortmain Act. There are other cases which have scarcely met with approbation; but this case does not appear to come within the Act, or within any of the decided authorities; and it seems, that if the money secured by a policy of assurance is to be deemed to be connected with land so as to be brought within the Statute of Mortmain, there would be no reason why the same consequence should not attach upon any debt, owing by any person who has real estate or chattels real; for though the right of action imports only pure personalty, yet the result of an action may be to obtain payment out of the land or chattels real.

On the whole I am of opinion that the sums secured by the policies are not within the Act, and that the exceptions must be allowed.

[A note in the Addenda to 7 Beav. states that this judgment was affirmed by Lord Chancellor, April 10, 1844.]

A husband cannot be examined as a witness against his wife, in a suit affecting her separate estate, although there are other Defendants in respect of whom he would be competent.

The proper mode of taking the objection is by demurring to the interrogatories. The costs of a demurrer of a witness follow the rule of ordinary demurrers.

The object of this bill was to recover an estate, one-seventh part of the produce of which, after paying certain charges, had been bequeathed in trust for the separate use of Frances the wife of Neast Greville Prideaux. The remainder belonged to other Defendants to the cause.

Mrs. Prideaux answered separately from her husband, who put in an answer and disclaimer.

The bill contained allegations of fraud and collusion as against Mr. Prideaux.

The cause being at issue, the Plaintiff sought to examine the Defendant Mr. Prideaux as a witness in support of his case; but being produced as a witness before the examiner, he demurred, and for cause of demurrer said "that he was the husband of Frances Prideaux, one of the Defendants in this cause, and he therefore submitted to the Court, whether, having regard to the issue joined in this suit and to what these interrogatories related, he ought to make any answer thereto."

The demurrer now came on for argument.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Phillips, in support of the demurrer.

It is a general rule, founded on public policy and to preserve the peace of families to exclude the evidence of husband and wife against each other; Davis v. Davis (4 T. R. 678); Vowles v. Young (13 Ves. 144); Barron v. Grillard (3 V. & B. 165). And see Cartwright v. Green, 8 Ves. 405). The rule applies notwithstanding there are other parties besides the husband or wife interested in the proceedings, the interest of the latter is to be affected by the evidence. On the trial of an indictment against two prisoners for burglary, in which each of them set up the defence of a distinct alibi, it was proposed, on the part of one of the prisoners, in proof of his alibi, to call the wife of the other prisoner; but her evidence was rejected, on the ground of tending to shew that the witness for the prosecution was mistaken as to one of the prisoners, which would weaken the effect of that witness's testimony as to the other prisoner her husband. It was then decided by a majority of the Judges that the witness had been properly rejected; Rees v. Smith (Moody, 289).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Romilly, contra. The form in which this objection is taken is wrong. The objection is one which goes only to the reception of the evidence and ought to be raised at the hearing. A witness has no right to judge of the admissibility or effect of his evidence; and there is no instance in which the objection has been taken by demurrer, except where the party by giving evidence would commit a breach of duty, as in the case of a solicitor, as in Parkhurst v. Lowten (2 Swan 19). Again the rule does not apply where third parties are interested; for the evidence may be received as to the other Defendants to the suit, and rejected as against the wife of the witness. The Plaintiff might, at the hearing, waive relief against Mr. Prideaux, and then he would be entitled to use her husband's evidence.

[445] The rules of equity are different from those at law: parties to a suit who could not be examined at law are constantly examined in equity, and also in suits directed by this Court. This, being a case of fraud, would form an exception to the rule, and such exceptions are numerous. (1 Phill. Ev. 169.)

If this objection were to prevail, then in a case in which the husband is an importer ness, it is only necessary to assign to his wife an interest in the subject of the suit in order effectually to exclude his testimony.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply, referred to Pedley v. Wellesley (3 Car. & P. 558) and Fulgrave v. Lord Dunbar (2 Swanst. 198, n.), which was a case of a demurrer of a witness to defamatory matters.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The bill in this case charges several things, but prays no relief against Mr. Prideaux, and he has put in an answer whereby he disclaims all interest. It being proposed to examine him as a witness, he has put in a demurrer to the interrogatories, "and for cause of demurrer says that he is the husband of Frances Prideaux, one of the Defendants in the cause, and he therefore submits to the Court whether, having regard to the issue joined in the suit, and to the facts these interrogatories relate, he ought to make any answer thereto."

Now the issue in the cause is one which clearly affects the interest of the wife; the object of the bill is to have it declared that a certain fine levied of the estate, which now enures to the benefit of the wife and [446] other Defendants may be used to enure to the use of the Plaintiff. The effect and object of the bill is therefore to deprive the wife of the interest which she now claims in the property in question. The question in the cause therefore being, whether she is to maintain her interest or not, Mr. Prideaux submits, that as the husband of the person whose interest is sought to be taken away by this suit, he ought not to be examined as a witness.

I apprehend that the general rule is subject to no doubt, and that a husband and wife cannot be examined for or against each other. It is not founded on interest, but on public policy. The same public policy sanctions many exceptions, but I do not find this present case contained amongst the cases of exception to the general rule.

It is said this is not the form in which the objection can be taken; but how does it stand? The question in the suit being, whether the wife shall maintain her interest against the claim of the Plaintiff, there is a direct point in issue between her and the Plaintiff. The witness says, I am her husband, and ought not to be examined. In the same way, in the case of an attorney, he says, I stand in a privileged relation, and ought not to be examined. The cases seem analogous; and though no direct authority has been produced, my impression is, that the husband cannot be examined. I mention the case again.

Nov. 24. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have looked over the authorities, and, though I have not found any in which the present point has been raised, yet I confess I do not see why I am not to apply the principle of the cases to the present.

It appears to me, that the general rule, with some exceptions (among which this is not to be found included), is that a husband and wife cannot be examined for or against each other; the consequence of which is, that if this examination had taken place the evidence could not have been received. If so, it seems the most regular and proper course to take the objection in the first instance.

Generally speaking, a witness has no business to concern himself with the merits of a case in which he is called on to give evidence, or whether, when given, it will be material to the cause; but here the witness is a party to the cause, and he knows the evidence which he is called on to give affects the interest of his wife.

I think he is right in his objection, and right in the form in which the matter has been brought forward. I must allow the demurrer. (See Gregg v. Taylor, 5 Russ. 19.) He costs follow the rule of ordinary demurrers. (See Ordines Can. 17, and Sawyer v. Moore, 3 Myl. & K. 572.)

[448] NOKES v. WARTON. Nov. 5, 8, 9, Dec. 17, 1842.

Costs of costs, settled and paid after examination, discussion, and an abatement made by the solicitor, referred for taxation under the circumstances, but on the terms of the client admitting the cash payments contained in the settled account.

The solicitor delivered his bill of costs. His client had time to examine it, and obtained professional advice and assistance respecting it. Objections were made to the items, and after discussion the client obtained a considerable deduction. He settled the account, admitted the balance, obtained the vouchers, and afterwards paid the amount admitted to be due. The relation of solicitor and client continued after the payment. The Court directed a taxation of the bill, notwithstanding this settlement, thinking that the client was, "to an alarming extent," in the power of the solicitor:—that the bill, which contained general items to a very considerable amount under the terms, "numerous attendances" and "innumerable attendances," was not sufficiently explanatory:—that the solicitor did not do all, which under the circumstances he ought to have done, to facilitate to the client the exercise of his right to a full statement of the particulars of the charge and to the proper investigation of each particular item: and "that the parties were on terms as unequal as to make it difficult to make any bargain which could be binding upon the client in the absence of other assistance."

Where accounts and bills of costs of a solicitor are delivered a sufficient time before the settlement to allow the client to examine them, and obtain advice and assistance respecting them, and the opportunity is taken advantage of, and the bills, being examined, objections are taken, upon discussion of which an allowance is made, a settlement come to, and the balance paid, prima facie, a taxation is precluded; but if, under the above circumstances, the client is in the power or at the mercy of the solicitor, if the bills delivered be not sufficiently explanatory, if the client though having time to examine the bills has not been able to obtain, or has not been allowed to employ the most effective means of examination, if it appears that the solicitor in whose power the client is, is driving a bargain with him on unequal terms, and that the relation of solicitor and client and the power of the solicitor continues, then all the circumstances above referred to as tending to establish that the settlement may be unavailing.

This was a petition presented by the Plaintiff, James Wright Nokes, for the taxation of his late solicitors' bill of costs. The application was resisted on the ground that it had after investigation, been settled and paid.

The circumstances are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved his judgment.

Dec. 17. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Petitioner in this case, having for some time employed the Respondents as his solicitors and agents, in his petition prays, that it may be referred to the Master to tax their bills of costs in all the matters in which they have been employed, and to take an account of the monies received by them on account of the Petitioner, and of the application thereon by the Petitioner offering to pay what, if anything, shall appear to be due on the taxation and account. The Respondents allege, that their bills of costs have, with a trifling exception, been settled and paid, and they insist that the Petitioner is now entitled to have them taxed.

The Petitioner appears to have been a person engaged in the purchase and sale of land on speculation, borrowing money to complete his purchases, and expecting to re-sell to repay the sums borrowed, and realize a profit for himself. In the year 1838 he had agreed to buy the White Knight's estate, and wanting money to enable him to complete his purchase, he became acquainted with the Respondents, the solicitors of Mr. Beardmore, who agreed to advance the money, and on the decease of Mr. Raphael, the former solicitor of [450] the Petitioner, the Respondents became and acted as his solicitors.

In the year 1839 the Petitioner contracted to buy Pope's Villa at Twickenham, and the Respondents were, as his solicitors in that matter, employed to do what was required in completing the purchase, and employed to borrow money for that purpose, and to prepare for the re-sales which were intended. In various other matters, Respondents appear to have been employed by the Petitioner as his solicitors and agents, and to have received and paid several sums of money on his account, till early in the year 1842, when they ceased to act for him.

During the whole time of the employment of the Respondents, the Petitioner appears to have been in great want of money for his speculations, and to have been thereby reduced to very considerable difficulty. The Respondents not only induced their client, Mr. Beardmore, to advance the Petitioner £21,000 in December 1838, but also a further sum of £2000 in May 1839, and a further sum of £3140 to pay off Mr. Cholmeley, who had threatened execution on a judgment which he held for that sum. These several sums were charged on the White Knight's estate, and amounted to the whole purchase-money which the Petitioner had agreed to pay for it; the Petitioner was not only without means of raising the money which was required for the purpose of completing the purchase of that estate, but was involved in considerable difficulty in the other speculation as to Pope's Villa, and in other matters; and in the course of the transactions, considerable sums of money became due from the Petitioner to the Respondents personally, for business done and for monies advanced. On the 14th of April 1840 the Respondents, as the so-[451]-solicitors of Mr. Beardmore, gave notice to the Petitioner, that Mr. Beardmore required the Petitioner to pay off the sum of £26,140, then due to him on mortgage of the White Knight's estate, on or before the 13th of July then next.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Beardmore must have been anxious about his money, and the adoption of any lawful means in his power to obtain payment was reasonably to be expected; but, having regard to the facts stated in the affidavits filed in behalf of the Respondents, I think that they must have known that the Petitioner would not comply with the notice which they sent to him. The notice appears to me to have been well calculated to suggest to the Petitioner (if any suggestion was necessary) that he was dependent upon and in the power of Mr. Beardmore and the Respondents as his solicitors, and that he must be indebted for any remaining hope of making a profit by his White Knight's speculation to their favour or forbearance. It does not clearly appear from the affidavits, at whose instance or on what particular day, the Respondents sent their account current and bills of costs to the Petitioner. They appear to have been delivered about July 1840. During some part of the transactions to which the bills relate, the Petitioner's father had acted in the name and on the behalf of the Petitioner as his agent, in a manner of which the Respondents might have just reason to complain, if they had not continued to act for the Petitioner under the facts were known. But the Petitioner's father, being his agent and so identified with him, that for a time he seems to have personated him with his authority, was, when the bills and account were delivered, a prisoner in the Fleet Prison, the place where the discussions leading to the settlement in question took place.

[452] The Petitioner was not induced to acquiesce in the account and bills by any confidence which he placed in the Respondents. He might be under the influence of some fear, but confidence in the statements of the Respondents he had not, and instead of acquiescing in the account and bills, he appears to have examined them with all the attention in his power. He had an interleaved copy made and placed in the hands of Mr. Pirie and Mr. Browning. Mr. Pirie is described as having been a solicitor, and afterwards a barrister, who had not practised for a considerable time. Mr. Browning, who says that he was brought up to the law, was a prisoner in the Fleet with the Petitioner's father, and these persons appear to have made many observations on the bills of costs, and the several items therein, and to have represented to the Petitioner that the bills contained many gross overcharges. Mr. Browning represented the bills of costs to be founded in fraud.

The Petitioner was therefore put upon his guard; and this circumstance must be taken into consideration, in connection with the other circumstances, tending to shew the power which the Respondents might have exercised over him. The Petitioner says, that being surprised at the amount of the charges, he expressed his desire to refer them to some solicitor or other person capable of advising him as to the propriety thereof, who should meet and confer with the Respondents relative thereto, but that the Respondents absolutely declined and refused to meet any such person at the settlement of the accounts. This allegation is not met in the way that might have been expected, if the Respondents had really been willing to submit to the exercise of the Petitioner's right to have their bills and accounts fully examined by a competent person. Pirie and Browning [453] are referred to as having advised the Petitioner, and the refusal to meet a solicitor is not noticed.

The meetings respecting the accounts and bills were held in the Fleet prison, in the room of Mr. William Nokes. On the 4th of August, the items of the account current, with the exception of those which consisted of the amounts of bills of costs, appear to have been carefully considered and compared with the vouchers then produced, and the bills of costs underwent some discussion in the presence of Pirie. An adjourned meeting was appointed for the 10th of August; on that day no discussion appears to have taken place, but soon afterwards, the Petitioner gave to one of the Respondents his interleaved copy of the bills of costs, with the objections and observations, and the 25th of August was appointed for another meeting. A meeting was accordingly held in the Fleet prison on that 25th of August. It is admitted that the Petitioner and his father were present on the one side, and the Respondents and Mr. Stevenson their clerk on the other side; but it is disputed whether Pirie was present. The Respondents and Mr. Stevenson say that he was, whilst Pirie swears that he wished to be present, and was excluded; and Browning says that Pirie was in his room whilst the bills were under examination in the room of William Nokes, and, consequently could not be present at the time alleged. The Respondents and Stevenson admit, that on one occasion when the accounts were under discussion, Pirie had been excluded from the room, but state, that the occasion occurred before the 25th of August, and that on such previous occasion Pirie was put out, in consequence of his intemperance. This circumstance tends to shew that Pirie, even if he had been present, could not have been an effectual protection to the Petitioner: and whether he was in fact present on the [454] 25th of August does not appear to me to be of so much importance as at first sight it might appear to be. No great assistance could be derived from a person who came to a meeting for business in a state of intoxication, or who being at such a meeting for the purpose of assisting one party, could be turned out of the room at the will of the other party. At the meeting on the occasion of which Pirie was turned out, the bills, if at all discussed, were discussed in the absence of the only person whose assistance the Petitioner could at that time have.

The Petitioner, with the assistance of such observations as had previously been made by Pirie and Browning, desired that deductions should be made from the amount of the Respondents' charges. Taking the charges as they were, and as they were brought into the account current, they left a balance of £631, 15s. 1d. due to the Respondents; and the Respondents, who had had an opportunity of reading and examining the objections, and who now admit that there were several objectionable items in the bills, say, that after some discussion, and a private consultation with Mr. Stevenson their clerk, the Respondent Mr. G. K. P. offered to take £300 for the balance. The Petitioner contended for a further reduction, and finally, as Mr. Stevenson says, the Respondents agreed to accept £250 in full discharge of the balance, thereby making a deduction of £381, 15s. 1d.; and this agreement being made, the two memoranda which are set forth in the petition were drawn up by Mr. Stevenson, and were signed by the Petitioner. By one memorandum, it was acknowledged that the accounts and bills were settled, that the balance was £250, and that certain vouchers were delivered up; and by the other memorandum, the Petitioner acknowledged that he was indebted to the Respondents in £250, and agreed to charge the same on the White Knight's estate. Certain vouchers were delivered up, and the Respondent Mr. G. K. P. thereupon destroyed the interleaved copy of the bills of costs, upon which the observations on and objection to the bills had been stated.

During the preparation for the settlement, at the time of the settlement, and afterwards, the relation of solicitor and client continued to subsist between the Petitioner and the Respondents. Soon after the settlement, attempts were made to sell the White Knight's estate for the purpose of raising money to pay Mr. Brownmore, and those attempts failing, the Petitioner released his equity of redemption

Mr. Beardmore for £250, the amount of the balance, which, on the accounts, was admitted to be due to the Respondents, and which was actually applied in satisfying that balance.

It is alleged on this petition, that accounts and bills settled as these were, ought not to stand or to be held to be in any way binding on the Petitioner; and further, that even if the accounts should be considered as prima facie binding, they ought to be opened, in consequence of the many and important errors which they contained. It is admitted that there are several errors; but it is at the same time alleged (I think in respect of every error admitted), that they were all considered on the settlement, and allowed for in the £381, 15s. 1d. deducted from the balance. Whether this was so, in fact, cannot now be ascertained, in consequence of the Respondent Mr. G. K. P. having destroyed the written objections and observations which were made.

In this case, therefore, we have the account and bills delivered a sufficient time before the settlement to allow the client to examine them and to obtain advice and [456] assistance respecting them. The opportunity was taken advantage of, and the bills being examined, many objections were taken, and upon the discussion of those objections, the client obtained an allowance of no less than £381, 15s. 1d., in respect of the objections taken. A memorandum of settlement was signed, and also another memorandum admitting the balance to be due, and agreeing to charge it on the White Knight's estate, and some months afterwards, on releasing the equity of redemption on that estate, the Petitioner directed the consideration money to be applied in satisfaction of the balance.

These circumstances, taken of themselves, constitute a strong argument for the Respondents. In the absence of other circumstances, they would be conclusive, as in other cases circumstances of the like kind, and even less cogent, have often been considered to be; but they are not conclusive, if attended by other circumstances which shew that a fair consideration of the accounts was not, and could not be, had. If the client be in the power or at the mercy of the solicitor, if the bills delivered be not sufficiently explanatory, if the client, though having time to examine the bills, has not been able to obtain, or has not been allowed to employ, the most effective means of examination, if it appears that the solicitor, in whose power he is, is giving a bargain with him on equal terms, and that the relation of solicitor and client, and the power of the solicitor, continues, then all the circumstances to which have referred, as tending to establish the settlement, may be unavailing.

In this case, I think that the Petitioner was in the power of the Respondents to a great and even an alarming extent. They themselves personally claimed to be creditors of the Petitioner to a considerable amount, and [457] held acceptances for the sum of £1200, which the Petitioner was liable to pay. They were the solicitors of Mr. Beardmore, a creditor for not less than £26,140, the whole amount of the purchase-money for White Knight's. Mr. Beardmore held a judgment for £3140, part of the £26,140. Upon that judgment he might have issued an execution, and he had a power of sale, the exercise of which might effectually disappoint the Petitioner's hope of profit from that transaction; and the Petitioner, having repeatedly failed in the payment of interest, and in his endeavours to obtain money, by means of which he might at the same time improve the security of Mr. Beardmore, and obtain profit for himself, had received from Mr. Beardmore, through the hands of the Respondents, a formal notice that payment of the whole debt was required. The Petitioner was besides engaged in other transactions of a complicated nature, in which the Respondents were his solicitors and agents, whose active and skilful assistance was the only foundation on which he could rest a hope for extrication; and when we attend to these circumstances, the fact which appears on the accounts, that the Petitioner was, from time to time, receiving small advances of money from the Respondents, I think that the extent to which he was in their power must be sufficiently apparent.

Observations were made upon the conduct of the Petitioner in engaging in such transactions without capital; and I do not dissent from them. A man who without capital engages in transactions, and enters into contracts, the conduct and performance of which requires a large capital, pursues a course which is always imprudent and hazardous, and generally dishonest, because generally accompanied by misrepresentation, express or implied, to those with whom he is dealing, and [458] by consequent fraud upon them. Such conduct is not to be justified or excused; but the last persons who have a right to complain of it are those who, knowing the facts, consent, for their own profit, to be the solicitors and agents of the party engaged in such business; and it cannot fail to be observed, that the very nature of the transactions, the shifts and devices which must be resorted to, and the equivocal position of the principal, must place him, more than ordinary clients, in the power of the solicitors and agents; nor can I think it improbable, that solicitors in such a situation may be under some temptations to obtain more than usual compensation in money, for the very troublesome and disagreeable business in which they are employed; but on this head I confine myself to the opinion, that the Petitioner was greatly in the power of the Respondents, from the time when the bills of costs were delivered, up to a time long subsequent to the settlement of the bills of costs.

It is alleged by the Petitioner and denied by the Respondents, that threats were used to induce the Petitioner to settle the accounts as he did. I am disposed to give credit to the denial; but the circumstances were such as to render any threat unnecessary. The Petitioner must have known his position, must have felt the power under which he was, though he was not wholly subdued by it; and I cannot suppose that solicitors, with such means in their hands as these Respondents had, were not perfectly conscious of their power, or incapable of conveying a sense of it to the Petitioner without actual threats.

I am further of opinion, that the bills delivered were not sufficiently explanatory. A bill commencing with an item of £157, 10s. "for numerous attendances," and which contains several items of charge for particular [459] attendances, and another item of £31, 10s. for attendances called "innumerable," cannot, I think, be considered as a proper bill. It is not, I think, such a bill as would have been delivered by a solicitor to a client desiring to have the bill investigated, and in a situation to call for such explanation and details as he was entitled to have. These and some other items which have occurred to me in reading the bills, lead to a conclusion, that the Respondents rather expected the Petitioner to submit to the charges as they were made.

With respect to the assistance which the Petitioner had, the facts sufficiently show that Pirie and Browning were of considerable use to him. It was probably in consequence of their observations, that the Respondents were induced to make a considerable deduction from the balance they claimed; but the Petitioner states positively that he required further assistance—a solicitor, or some other person who might discuss the matter with the Respondents, and that the Respondents refused their consent to that proposition. Without saying that the Petitioner was entitled to an acquiescence in his proposition as made, it is very clear that he was entitled to a full statement of the particulars of charge, and to a proper investigation of each particular item; and I think that the Respondents did not do all, which, under the circumstances, they ought to have done, to facilitate to the Petitioner the exercise of that right.

It is to be regretted that the observations and objections of Pirie and Browning were destroyed. The Respondents had them in their possession for some time; and after they were thereby apprised that the bills were to a considerable extent erroneous, it was peculiarly [460] incumbent upon them to take care that their client (particularly a man involved in difficulties and greatly in their power) was duly protected; and it was important for themselves to take care that the settlement which they were about to make, was subject to no future question. What they did, was to talk over the items in the Fleet prison, where the Petitioner's father and agent was a prisoner; propose to reduce the balance—obtain a memorandum of settlement prepared by the clerk, and then destroy the evidence of the objections. The declaration which one of the Respondents is stated to have made, that, after the settlement then made, the bill of costs could not be questioned as to their correctness and propriety, was ill-timed, and, I think, ill-founded.

The first proposal as to the balance was to reduce it to £300 in money. It being, as I conceive, clear, that the Petitioner had no means of paying £300 in money, it is difficult to regard the proposal as anything but a means of hinting to the Petitioner the power under which he was held. The discussion ended in a reduction to £250 to be left on credit and charge. The Petitioner was not so far subdued as to be unable to make any effort for relief; and he did obtain a reduction of £381, 15s. 1d., which is a very large sum to deduct on such an occasion. And it being admitted, as clearly as it was, that a deduction was to be made from the balance, and the question then being to what extent, I think that the Petitioner and Respondents were on terms so unequal, as to make it very difficult to make any bargain which could be binding upon the Petitioner in the absence of other assistance. Browning seems to have given the Petitioner reason to think that he was entitled to a reduction of £1500. If the objections had not been destroyed, we might have had some means of [461] judging, whether the allowance made was fit to be considered as a fair compromise; but as the case stands, I am of opinion that the allowance was made, and the account settled, under circumstances which do not preclude the Petitioner from having the bills of costs taxed.

I have come to this conclusion with the less regret, in consequence of having minutely examined the several items of the bills which are objected to by this petition. There are several which require much more explanation than has been given in the affidavits; there are others which are probably unjustly complained of. A man engaged in such speculations, and involved in such difficulties as the Petitioner was, is too apt to require things to be done promptly at any cost, rather than suffer the delay which is necessary for a due observance of the ordinary rules of prudence and economy. I am not prepared to say that he is in all cases to be relieved from expenses not strictly necessary, which his own urgency has occasioned. But independently of cases of that kind, I think that there are in these bills some charges, which, from their nature and amount and under the circumstances stated in the affidavits the Petitioner would have been entitled to have investigated, even if he had been held bound by the settlement.

I think that it must be referred to the Taxing Master to tax all the bills of costs, and to take an account of what, if anything, is due to or from the Respondents in respect thereof. I think, however, that in taking the account, the Petitioner ought to admit that the Respondents have paid him, or on his account, the several sums in cash which are stated to have been so paid in the account; and that the Respondents ought to be [462] at liberty to explain, or state in detail, any of the items in the bills of costs. [462] SAYER v. WAGSTAFF. Nov. 12, 14, 1842.

A new commission granted, and publication enlarged, on the ground of misconduct of one of the commissioners nominated by the party applying.

A solicitor may communicate with a witness before his examination, and take down in writing what he can depose to, but to prepare the depositions of a witness beforehand would be improper, and form a ground for suppressing the depositions.

A commissioner should not act as solicitor on behalf of a party.

A motion was made on behalf of the Defendant Wagstaff, that the depositions taken on behalf of the Plaintiffs under a commission in this cause might be suppressed, and that a new commission might issue for the examination of witnesses; or if the depositions already taken were not to be suppressed, that a new commission might issue.

The grounds for making this application were, that the Defendant had not examined the witness under the commission in consequence of the misconduct of A. B., the gentleman whom the Defendant had named as his commissioner. It appeared that the Plaintiffs and Defendant had joined in a commission for the examination of witnesses, which was appointed to be executed on the 27th of September. One of the commissioners nominated by the Defendant Wagstaff, was A. B., a solicitor of Worcester.

(1) NOTE.—The rule as to taxation after payment has been altered by the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73; and see In re Lees, ante, p. 410., and In re Downes, ante, p. 425.

After A. B. had been appointed commissioner, he had acted as solicitor for the Defendant Wagstaff in this [463] matter; he had seen several of the parties proposed to be examined for Wagstaff, and had ascertained from them the nature of the evidence which they would be able to give. He had also seen some depositions which had been prepared by one of the other Defendants, and others which had been prepared by the Plaintiffs' solicitor for their witnesses to swear to, and he was desirous of having the intended depositions of Wagstaff's witnesses drawn out to shew them to the solicitor on the other side. After obtaining this information and seeing the depositions prepared by the other side, he recommended Wagstaff to refer the cause, being afraid that he had a bad case. This impression was stated in a letter to Wagstaff's London solicitor, who, in reply, expressed a fear that some of the opposite parties had intimidated and tampered with him.

An angry correspondence then took place, and in the result, Wagstaff, who seemed no longer to have regarded A. B. as his partizan, gave him notice not to act as commissioner.

The Plaintiffs proceeded to examine their witnesses before the two remaining commissioners, but neglected, as it was alleged, to give the names of their witnesses to A. B. or Wagstaff. Wagstaff, insisting on the irregularity of the proceeding, and relying on the alleged misconduct of his commissioner, refrained from examining his witnesses, and now moved, in the terms stated, to suppress the depositions, and for a new commission.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Moore, in support of the motion; Mr. G. Turner, for A. B.; and Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Parry, for the Plaintiffs.

[464] Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I regret the circumstances which have given rise to this application. After being appointed a commissioner, A. B. was totally unjustified in acting as solicitor for a party who had to examine witnesses under the commission. (Wy. Pr. Reg. 121; Selwyn's case, 2 Dick. 563; Cooke v. Wilson, 4 Mad. 380.) It seems, however, that he not only assumed to act as a commissioner, by signing summonses for witnesses to attend, but also took upon himself to act as solicitor for the Defendant Wagstaff, advising him, proceeding to make inquiries, communicating with his solicitor in London, giving advice as to the framing of the interrogatories and taking steps to know the evidence to be given for the Plaintiffs; these are facts admitted by himself, and are proved by his bill of costs. In all this his conduct was erroneous; having regard to his character of commissioner, he ought not to have so proceeded.

But it is said, that however indiscreet it might have been to act thus, the Defendant has no right to complain, because he acquiesced in its being done; and it is said that even the Defendant's town solicitor was willing to take advantage of the advice given and of this conduct of A. B. I am of opinion that both Wagstaff and his London solicitor were aware that A. B. was acting as solicitor, and that they were willing to have the benefit of his services as such; but it does not follow that because the Defendant has acquiesced in an error, he cannot be allowed to complain of that which not only affects him personally, but also seriously affects the due administration of justice.

[465] What subsequently happened seems to explain the differences which took place. The impression made on the mind of A. B. in the course of his enquiries, was not so favourable to the interests of Wagstaff as Wagstaff had hoped, and probably as had been expected by his solicitor. His solicitor however expressed no indignation at A. B.'s interfering as solicitor, but merely complaints and apprehensions that he had suffered himself to be intimidated. Wagstaff and his solicitor appear at that time to have lost their confidence in A. B.'s zeal in their favour; they had expected from him something more than his duty as commissioner, namely, his services as solicitor, and they thought his zeal had been damped.

The result was, that Wagstaff gave notice to A. B. not to act as commissioner. The commission had been sealed, and authority had been given by this Court to the commissioners, yet this Defendant thought he was at liberty to countermand that authority, as if the commissioners were his agents. I am surprised that such a notion should be entertained. A. B. had a duty committed to him by the Court.

and I have no doubt that if he had not been engaged as solicitor in this transaction he would utterly have disregarded the notice and have performed his duties as commissioner. But he could not do this with propriety, for the Plaintiffs had a right to complain of his having deviated from his duty as commissioner, by acting as he solicitor of the Defendant. Had he not acted wrong previous to the notice, he could not have been justified in declining to act as a commissioner; but considering the circumstances and the position in which he had placed himself, I think he was right in abstaining from acting.

There remained two commissioners who were perfectly competent to proceed on the commission; but that [466] did not suit the purpose of Wagstaff. He had at his time lost his confidence in the zeal of A. B., who ought not to have entertained any avour towards either party. He seems to have said, "I will not interfere with this matter at all. I am dissatisfied with the conduct of A. B.;" and A. B. instead of attending there as a person who desired the commission to proceed, seems to have been wandering about the Bar, the House, and in the streets, and to have done anything rather than attend to the commission.

The Plaintiffs, on the other hand, seem to have been perfectly regular, and to have done all that could be required. But it is said that they did not give the names of the witnesses to A. B. or to Wagstaff's solicitor. Why should they have given them to a person, who said he would not interfere? It does not appear to me that the Plaintiffs were in any way in fault, and whatever comes of this case, they must be indemnified as to costs. Mr. Kindersley said he could not ask to suppress the depositions, but that there might be grounds for depriving the Plaintiffs of the costs, because they had not done what they ought, namely, given the names of witnesses: my opinion is that both A. B. and Wagstaff so conducted themselves as to release the Plaintiffs from the performance of that duty.

As to a new commission, the question is of some importance. One of the witnesses for the Plaintiffs was F., and it was stated to me (though I have not sufficient evidence to prove the fact), that his depositions had been prepared by C. D., a Defendant; and it has been assumed in the course of this discussion, that this was a proper thing to do. I cannot consider it to be a right thing, for any solicitor to prepare depositions for a witness before examination. He ought to be examined upon the interrogatories by the Examiner; and if he [467] goes before him with the depositions ready prepared, it is a reason for suppressing them. (Shaw v. Lindsey, 15 Ves. 380; Attorney-General v. Nethercote, 10 Sim. 311.) It is right for a solicitor to communicate with a witness to know what he can depose. (Kelly v. French, 2 Ll. & Co. 166.) That is a thing necessary to be done before the interrogatories can be prepared; and I do not mean to say that it is at all improper for a solicitor to take down from a witness what he can depose to; or that it is improper for both parties to see a witness, to inquire what he can depose to. But what was done here? A witness had been examined and communicated with on behalf of the Plaintiffs, not as to what he could say on the whole question, but as to what had been prepared for him to say on behalf of the Plaintiffs. A. B. goes to the solicitor of the Plaintiffs, who shews him drafts of depositions ready for the witnesses to depose to. I think that was not a right thing to do. It was very proper for the solicitor of Wagstaff, knowing that the witnesses were acquainted with the facts which were in controversy between the parties, to ascertain what they could say, in order that they might be properly examined; but it was not proper to go and ascertain what had been prepared for them to say on behalf of another party.

The consequence of all this is, that I cannot hold the Defendant or A. B. free from acting with impropriety in a matter seriously affecting the administration of justice. I am of opinion that the Plaintiffs are exempt from misconduct in this matter; but the Defendant Wagstaff, who has really evidence to produce, has not examined his witnesses. I understand that the time when publication ought to pass, has arrived to-day. If that had not been so, the forms and practice of the Court [468] would have enabled Wagstaff to examine his witnesses before the Examiner in London. He now desires a commission. I doubt whether he is entitled to that, on account of his own neglect and conduct; yet, if his witnesses are not examined, the probability is, that there will be a decree against him, and that, although the facts which his witnesses might depose to might produce a different result. This is an event which I cannot contemplate without uneasiness; but, at all events, if a new commission issues, the Plaintiffs must be exonerated from any costs.

A. B. and Wagstaff are both in fault as regards the Plaintiffs, and the fault may be imputed to the Defendant in the first instance, because he selected A. B. as Commissioner. I think, therefore, that the Defendant Wagstaff is the person who must be answerable to the Plaintiffs; and A. B. having acted improperly, may have no costs of the refusal of the application against him.

His Lordship ultimately ordered that publication should be enlarged for four weeks, and that the Defendant John Wagstaff should be at liberty to take out a new commission, paying to the Plaintiffs their costs of this application, and such costs they should be put to by the new commission.

[469] ALLEN v. M'PHERSON. Nov. 2, 5, 12, 1841.

[S. C. 11 L. J. Ch. 59; 12 L. J. Ch. 97; 1 Ph. 133; 41 E. R. 582; 1 H. L. C. 199; 9 E. R. 727 (with note); 11 Jur. 785. On question as to jurisdiction, Melhuish v. Milton, 1876, 3 Ch. D. 30.]

Whether, where A., a residuary legatee by artful and fraudulent misrepresentation to the testator of the character of B., induces the testator to revoke a legacy given to B., the benefit of which revocation results to A., this Court has jurisdiction to affix a trust on A. in favour of B., to the extent of the fruit of the fraud possessed by A., or whether the matter belongs exclusively to the Ecclesiastical Court; and secondly, whether such trust can be declared after a sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court, in which the question of undue influence was in issue, quære. Held, in the affirmative by the Master of the Rolls, and in the negative by the Lord Chancellor. The parties thereupon appealed to the House of Lords.

This case came before the Court upon demurrer to the whole bill.

According to the statements of the bill, the testator had amassed a large property amounting to £80,000. His family consisted of his wife Hannah Allen, William Allen, an illegitimate son, Susannah Evans, a legitimate daughter, the Plaintiff Benjamin Allen and his brother and sister, who were the children of a deceased nephew of the testator resident in Somersetshire, and other more distant relatives.

The testator, who, it was alleged, was interested in, and had a great regard for the Plaintiff and his family, by his will, dated in 1834, and subsequent codicils bequeathed considerable legacies to the Plaintiff and his brother and sister.

In the beginning of March 1837 the Plaintiff visited and ingratiated himself with the testator, by whom he was treated with great kindness and preference: and on that occasion informed the Plaintiff and his brother "that he had handed over to them the property provided for them by his will."

Shortly afterwards the testator made a sixth codicil, dated the 23d of May 1837, whereby he bequeathed one-fourth of the residue to the Plaintiff.

[470] The children of the testator being informed of this codicil by the solicitor, became exceedingly jealous of, and conceived a great dislike for the Plaintiff, and formed a determination, if possible, to procure a revocation of the sixth codicil, or at least a great diminution of the bequest to the Plaintiff therein contained.

The bill stated, that the testator in June following became much enfeebled, his health began to decline; "and although it could not be said that in strictness his mind was of unsound mind, from that time to the day of his death, yet, during that period his intellects became so impaired, that he was totally unfit to transact any business requiring any extraordinary mental exertion."

The bill then stated that "Susannah Evans (who at the time was living with the testator, and was a very shrewd person, and of quick perception, but of a cunning and designing disposition)" acquired great influence over the testator, "and used to promote the object which she and William Allen had in view, of obtaining the whole, or as much as possible, of the property of the testator to be left to her;

ing a secret understanding that whatever the testator should give to her should be shared with William Allen.

In May 1837 the Plaintiff's brother was about to marry a woman of bad character; and the testator received information of the circumstance through an anonymous letter. On the supposition that the Plaintiff was the author of the anonymous letter, the Plaintiff's brother wrote to the testator several letters containing statements to the Plaintiff's prejudice; but the state of [471] his mind prevented his investigating the truth of these matters.

That Susannah Evans, seeing the effect of these letters, and with a view to get the revocation of the bequest to the Plaintiff, suggested that the Defendant William Allen should be sent to the country to inquire as to the disputes between the Plaintiff and his brother, and their characters.

The bill further alleged that the Defendant William Allen went into Somersetshire, merely to deceive the testator, and that he did not make any inquiries concerning the character of the Plaintiff, or at least he did not make any such inquiries with the bona fide object and intention of ascertaining the truth on that point.

That on the 30th of September 1837 the Defendant William Allen made his report, which, after stating the want of success of the Plaintiff in his business of a butcher, which was attributed to a want of judgment and gross neglect, proceeded as follows:—"In addition Mr. Bartlett states (and he did so with regret), that his (the Plaintiff's) habits are of the lowest and worst kind, that he drives a horse eaten up with the mange and fistula, which is enough to deter people buying meat from his stall, if it were of the best kind; he also states him to be the greatest blackguard in the village, and a nuisance to the place, is constantly quarrelling with his wife, who, she alleges, has another husband in London. His sister states that there is no believing a word he utters, &c.; he has received £50 from his brother, who has not yet turned the proceeds (which are to be divided) into cash; but, from his bullying and threatening to put the lawyers upon his back, he procured £50 and paid him, and gave a note of and, payable on demand for [472] the other £50; this money he is now living upon. If it is intended to do anything for him, I would recommend that it be a weekly allowance of about 10s. to be paid him during good conduct: he may thus be rendered tolerably respectable member of society."

The bill alleged that the report was read to the testator, who did not appear to thoroughly understand the contents, and requested it to be read again, which was not done; but William Allen, without any express direction from the testator, took the report to a solicitor, who, from the suggestions contained therein and from verbal instructions given him by William Allen, prepared a ninth codicil to the will of the testator, which was executed the same evening without any draft having been previously submitted to him for perusal.

By this ninth codicil, dated the 3d of October 1837, all the bequests to the Plaintiff and his brother and sister were revoked, and the testator directed his executors to invest £800 3 per cent. Bank annuities in the names of William Allen, Nathaniel Bartlett, and Susannah Evans in trust to pay the dividends to the Plaintiff by weekly instalments during his life, or until he should attempt to sell or incumber the same. The testator gave other legacies by his ninth codicil.

The bill alleged that the affection and regard entertained by the testator for the Plaintiff, and which induced him to execute in his favour the said sixth codicil, remained unabated till he heard the report; and that that alone was the means, by which the unwilling assent of the testator was obtained to the preparation and execution of the ninth codicil; and that had it not been for the report, the testator would have left the said bequests in favour of the Plaintiff unrevoked.

[473] "That the said pretended report was wholly without foundation or truth, and everything contained in it respecting the Plaintiff was false, and a complete fabrication by William Allen, by whom the same was concocted, with the assistance, or at least with the knowledge, of Susannah Evans, for the express purpose of procuring the revocation by the testator of the benefits provided for the Plaintiff by his said will and codicils, and particularly the sixth codicil, and in furtherance of a scheme formed and projected by William Allen and Susannah Evans, or by William Allen, with the knowledge of Susannah Evans, for that purpose, before William Allen even set out for Somersetshire, and which scheme succeeded so far as to the execution of the codicil of the 3d of October, which was so executed by the testator with great reluctance, and solely on account of his having placed implicit confidence in the truth of the statements contained in the pretended report." The testator, a few days afterwards, took to his bed, became totally imbecile, and remained so to his death on the 28th of November 1837.

The bill alleged that the will and all the codicils had been proved in the Prerogative Court, after an attempt by the Plaintiff "to prevent such probate being granted as to the ninth codicil, on the grounds that the testator was of unsound mind at the time of its execution, and that undue influence was exercised over the mind of the testator by William Allen in procuring such execution; but that in the interim which arose in the Prerogative Court, touching the validity of the said ninth codicil, the Plaintiff was confined, by the Court, to grounds of objection which affected only said codicil as an entire instrument, and was not permitted to go into the case before stated, or into any other case solely relating to the parts of such codicil which affected only the Plaintiff.

[474] M'Pherson, Tomkin, and W. Allen, the executors, proved the will.

The bill, which was filed against William Allen and the two other executors, Susannah Evans and her husband, prayed a declaration that the Plaintiff was entitled to the legacies given to the Plaintiff by the will and the first eight codicils, notwithstanding the revocation in the ninth; and that the Defendants were trustees for the Plaintiff, and for the necessary accounts.

To this bill the three executors filed a demurrer for want of equity, and for want of parties, which now came on for argument.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. J. Russell, and Mr. Giffard, in support of the demurrer. The object of this bill is, in fact, to have the ninth codicil set aside for fraud and imposition. This Court has no jurisdiction in such a case. However doubtful the law may be upon the earlier authorities, it is now clearly settled by the more recent decisions, that this Court has no jurisdiction to set aside a will of personal estate. Kerrich v. Bransby (4 Bro. P. C. 437), it was held by the House of Lords upon appeal reversing the decree of Lord Macclesfield in the Court below, that a will cannot be set aside in equity for fraud or imposition; because if it is of personal estate, it may be set aside in the Ecclesiastical Court, and if of real estate it may be set aside at law by the issue devisavit vel non. The principle was followed in the recent case of Gardiner v. Horne (9 Sim. 539; and see the cases in 8 Bac. Abr. 529). The jurisdiction exclusively belongs to the Ecclesiastical Court, which has power to interfere in cases where [475] fraud or imposition has been practised upon the testator. (3 Swin. 885, 7th ed.; Stephenson v. Gardiner, 2 P. Wms. 286.) The bill states that the Plaintiff attempted to prevent probate of the ninth codicil being granted on the ground of the testator's unsoundness of mind, "and that undue influence was exercised over the mind of the testator by William Allen in procuring its execution." The Ecclesiastical Court by its sentence has decided the point. The proper course is to question that decision is to appeal to the Privy Council, for this Court has no jurisdiction to overrule it, and nothing more inconvenient could exist than a collision between the two Courts, and between the two Appellate Courts of the House of Lords and Privy Council.

It is admitted, that at the date of the codicil, the testator had no intention to benefit the Plaintiff. There is nothing on which the Court can proceed in declaring any trust in favour of the Plaintiff. Any interference of this Court must be founded upon mere speculations as to the wishes and views of the testator at the time of his death.

In the cases of Segrave v. Kirwan (1 Beat. 157) and Kennell v. Abbott (4 Ves. 101) the question was merely one of construction, depending on the intention of the testator. Bulkeley v. Wilford (8 Bli. 111, 2 Cl. & Fin. 102) was a case of a trust in real estate, arising out of a species of fraud, over which the Courts of law have jurisdiction.

Lastly, Bartlett, who is one of the trustees for the Plaintiff of the £800 and other persons interested in the ninth codicil, are necessary parties to this bill, in which the accounts must be taken.

[476] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Jolliffe, in support of the bill. The bill in this not contest the authority or decision of the Ecclesiastical Court; it admits that the Ecclesiastical Court Susannah Evans is entitled to the benefit of the testamentary papers; and, proceeding upon the foundation of the validity of the judgment of the Spiritual Court, it insists that there are circumstances, which, in the contemplation of a Court of Equity, would make the legal owners trustees for the Plaintiff. The prayer of the bill is framed in that view of the case.

The testator, according to the allegations of this bill, intended to benefit the Plaintiff, and that intention continued to his death; but the Defendants, by fraudulent representations, induced the testator to revoke the previous gifts by means of the Ecclesiastical Court. The question is, are the Defendants to hold the fruits of this fraud, or, to the extent of the interest which they gained by the fraud, to be declared trustees for the Plaintiff. If this were a case of forgery or of the competency of the Court, the Ecclesiastical Court would undoubtedly have jurisdiction; but the contention of a case of trust or fraud peculiarly belongs to this Court. The case here is similar to that of real estate, where a Court of law, which has exclusive jurisdiction, determines and rightly determines, the devolution of the legal estate; but this Court alone can attach on that legal estate equities arising out of a breach of trust, and either declare the legal owners to be trustees, or direct a legal recon-

There are authorities distinctly supporting the equities raised in this case. In Ex parte Porel (1 Ves. sen. 119, 283), Lord Hardwicke held that a probate obtained might [477] be relieved against in this Court, and he decreed the Defendant's petition to a revocation of the probate.

Kennell v. Abbott (4 Ves. 802), a legacy was given by a woman to a man whom she erroneously supposed to be her husband, and bequeathed it to him by that name, and it appeared that the motive of the testatrix's bounty was the assumed name. The Court, notwithstanding the will had been proved in the Ecclesiastical Court, declared that the pretended husband was not entitled. The principle of this case is much discussed in a recent case of Giles v. Giles (1 Keen, 689).

Marriot v. Marriot (1 Strange, 666), the Court held, that after probate, it had jurisdiction in a case in which a bequest of a residue had been obtained by fraudulent means and surprise. It is there said, "Courts of Equity may, in notorious cases, declare a legatee that has obtained a legacy by fraud to be a trustee for another, as the drawer of a will should insert his own name instead of the name of a legatee, but he would be a trustee for the real legatee."

Modern cases of Segrave v. Kirwan (1 Beat. 157), and Bulkley v. Wilford (8 Cl. & Fin. 102), are strong authorities in favour of the Plaintiff. In the first case a counsellor, who was employed to make a will of a testator, allowed himself to be named executor, without informing the testator of the legal consequence of doing so to the law as it then stood, which was to give the whole residue to the executor beneficially. The will was duly proved in the Ecclesiastical Court; but the Chancellor of Ireland [478], on the ground of fraud and of the suppression, set aside the executor to stand as a trustee for the next of kin. Sir Anthony Hart has been argued, that the relief prayed in this bill, if granted, would, in effect, set aside the will; that a Court of Equity is not the proper forum for such a relief; and that the Plaintiffs ought to be left to the Ecclesiastical Court, which has the jurisdiction. That the Ecclesiastical Court has exclusively the power to decide what is or is not a will of personalty cannot be controverted. Its seal to a will is conclusive in every Court of Justice; but it is equally clear, that to this Court belongs the authority to give construction and effect to the will, and that there are circumstances attaching personally on those who take by force of it, which authorise this Court to engraft an equity on the gift, and convert them into trustees for other persons. The rule of equity, by which an executor having a legacy is declared a trustee for the next of kin, is founded on this principle. Other implications arising from particular expressions in the will which convert an executor into a trustee of an undisposed residue, are the same." In that case, as in the present, the will had been proved in the Ecclesiastical Court; yet the Court of Chancery attached its authority upon the property, and the decision was afterwards approved of by the House of Lords.

In Bulkley v. Wilford, a testator having devised his estate to his wife, was advised by his attorney, who was his presumptive heir, to levy a fine. He did so without having been informed that the effect would be to revoke his will, and he died without republishing his will. There was no doubt that the will was wholly revoked at law, yet the House of Lords and the Court below held, that the attorney, having failed his duty of informing the testator of the legal consequence of the act, could not take the estate beneficially, but as a trustee only for the widow.

Lord Redesdale, in his Treatise (p. 257), recognises this jurisdiction. He says: "Where the fraud practised has not gone to the whole will, but only to some particular clause, or if fraud has been practised to obtain the consent of the next of kin to the probate, the Courts of Equity have laid hold of these circumstances, and declare the executor a trustee for the next of kin."

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I will read the papers before giving judgment.

The question on the demurrer is very short, but one of very great importance. The testator had intentions of bounty towards the Plaintiff, which continued till the date of the eighth codicil. If nothing further had passed, the law would presume that the intention of bounty continued till his death. But a ninth codicil was executed, and it expressly revoked the bequests previously given; and this codicil has received the sanction of the Ecclesiastical Court, which has undoubted jurisdiction to decide on the factum of testamentary papers.

There was, at the time of executing the ninth codicil, an intention to revoke; the Plaintiff alleges, that it was obtained by fraud practised by the Defendants, without which the ninth codicil would never have been executed; and if it had been, the presumption of law would have been, that the testator's intention of bounty, evidenced by the previous testamentary papers, continued to his death. I will consult the authorities and give my decision on Friday next.

Nov. 12. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The bill prays for a declaration, that the Plaintiff is entitled to several bequests given to him, or intended for him, by the testator John Allen, by his will and the first eight codicils thereof, notwithstanding the revocation of these bequests by the ninth codicil; and that the Defendants, the executors, or the Defendant Susannah Evans, are or is trustees for the Plaintiff, to the extent of such benefit; and for the usual accounts.

The testator, John Allen, by his will, gave to the Plaintiff, and to his brother and sister, a legacy of £4000, to be divided equally amongst them; and by the same will he gave the residue of his estate to his executors, to be held on the same trust, a sum of £20,000 3½ per cent. stock, which was, in effect, given to trustees for the separate use of his daughter Susannah Evans for life, with power for her to dispose thereof by her will, with a limitation to her next of kin in default of appointment.

By a fourth codicil, the testator gave to the Plaintiff a contingent benefit in the sum of £2000; and by the sixth codicil he gave to the Plaintiff one-fourth part of the clear residue of his estate; but by a ninth codicil he revoked the benefit given to the Plaintiff and some other persons, and directed that they should take no further or other benefit under his will and codicils, except as followed; and, after giving various directions with respect to other persons, he directed his executors to purchase in the names of William Allen, Nathaniel Bartlett, and Susannah Evans, the sum of £800 3 per cent. Bank annuities, and pay the dividends thereof, by weekly instalments, to the Plaintiff for his life, or until he should attempt to sell the same, in either of which events the £800 3 per cent. stock was to be sold into the residue.

Upon a contest in the Ecclesiastical Court, in which the Plaintiff seems to have alleged that the ninth codicil was obtained by fraud and undue influence, probate of the will and codicils, including the ninth, has been granted to the Defendant M'Pherson, Tomkin, and William Allen.

The Plaintiff, still alleging that the ninth codicil was obtained by the fraud and misrepresentation of William Allen acting in concurrence with and with the knowledge of Susannah Evans the residuary legatee, now applies himself to the jurisdiction of this Court, and prays to be relieved here, by declaration of trust, in which he has failed to obtain relief in the Ecclesiastical Court by disputing the validity of the codicil.

To this bill demurrers have been put in by the executors, and by Susannah, and in support of the demurrers, it is argued, that to give the relief sought, would be to interfere with the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, which alone have authority to determine upon the validity of testamentary instruments relating to personal estate. The counsel for the bill admit the jurisdiction and authority of the Ecclesiastical Courts in their fullest extent, and that the Plaintiff has no right to dispute the legal validity of the probate or of the ninth codicil. The gifts bequeathed to the Plaintiff by the will and preceding codicils are admitted to be fully revoked, but it is said that the effect of that revocation is, to confer a great [483] increase of benefit to the residuary legatee, and that as that revocation was, the bill alleges, procured by her fraud, this Court has jurisdiction to deprive her the benefit of it, and to declare her to be a trustee of that to which the law titles her, for the benefit of the person to whose prejudice the fraud was practised.

The case appears to me to be attended with considerable difficulty; but the Court has already exercised jurisdiction in cases so analogous, that the Plaintiff cannot be deprived of the benefit of it without great consideration.

"There may be," as was said by Sir Anthony Hart in Segrave v. Kirwan (1 Beat. 7), "circumstances attaching personally on those who take by force of a will, which will authorise the Court to engraft an equity on the gift, and convert the case into a trustee for other persons."

Thus in Marriot v. Marriot (1 Strange, 666), it was held, that, notwithstanding estate, a Court of Equity had authority to inquire whether a gift of the residue was obtained by fraud, and issues were directed to try the matter of fraud and surprise insisted on by the Plaintiffs, and certain cases were mentioned, in which the Court would declare a trust in the will, though it were not contained in the will itself.

In Kennell v. Abbot (4 Ves. 807), Lord Alvanley stated that wherever a legacy is given to a person under a particular character which he has falsely assumed, and which alone can be supposed the motive of the bounty, the [483] law will not permit him to avail himself of it, and therefore he cannot demand his legacy.

Segrave v. Kirwan (1 Beat. 157) was a case, in which the executor, who, under the estate, would have been entitled to the residue, was held not to be so entitled, because he did not inform the testator that the effect of appointing him executor was to give him a title to the residue, it being clearly his duty to give such information.

Bulkeley v. Wilford (2 Cl. & Fin. 102) was a case in which an heir at law was not permitted to take an estate by descent, to the disappointment of a will revoked by a will, because he did not inform the testator, as it was his duty to do, that the effect of the fine was to revoke the will.

The cases of Marriot v. Marriot, Kennell v. Abbot, and the cases in which the legatee made promises, which he has afterwards refused to perform (Podmore v. Gunning, 8 M. 644; Denys v. Locock, 3 Myl. & Cr. 205), shew, that in the consideration of this Court, the simple fact of the testator appearing by the probate to have given a particular legacy or a residue to a person in his will named, is not, of itself, a reason why this Court should permit the legatee to take the benefit of the gift, if he appears to have obtained it by fraud. If fraud be established, this Court has authority to deprive the fraudulent party of the benefit, and, by declaration, to give that benefit to those to whom it would have belonged if the fraud had not been committed.

The present case is not precisely like any former one. The Defendant Susannah takes her interest [484] subject to the payment of pecuniary legacies. The completion of any legacy was productive of benefit to her. By the sixth codicil, a fourth part of the residue is given to the Plaintiff, and all prior gifts to the Plaintiff being revoked by the ninth codicil, they fell into the residue for her benefit; and if the revocation were, as alleged, procured by her fraud, it seems difficult to distinguish this case, in principle, from those which have before occurred, or to understand why jurisdiction, which is exercised in case of direct gifts, should not be applied in a case where the effect of the fraud is to increase the gift made by a prior instrument, why, if the case alleged be true, Mrs. Evans should, in this Court, be permitted to enjoy the fruit of the imposition practised upon the testator and upon the Plaintiff.

The allegations in this bill are diffuse, and in some instances ambiguous; but, on the whole, it appears to me, after reading it through, that there is sufficient allegation against Mrs. Evans, as a party to the fraud, alleged to have been practised; and however doubtful it may be, whether the Plaintiff will ever be able to establish the claim he sets up, I cannot say that upon this record he may not be entitled to relief.

I do not think that the demurrer for want of parties can be sustained. Bartlett, if here, being a mere trustee for the Plaintiff, has no interest and no duty except that which the Plaintiff is fully competent to sustain, and the other persons interested in the ninth codicil are not interested in the relief which the Plaintiff prays, which does not relate to the whole codicil, but only to so much of it as, by the revocation, gives a benefit to the residuary legatee to the prejudice of the Plaintiff.

[485] The demurrers must be overruled. (This decision was reversed by Lord Lyndhurst C. on appeal, see 1 Phillips, 133, but an appeal from that decision is now pending in the House of Lords; 1 H. L. C. 191; 9 E. R. 727.)

A motion was also made in this cause, on the 2d of November, to discharge the order which the Plaintiff had obtained to sue in forma pauperis, on the ground, that in any view of the case the Plaintiff was entitled for life to the dividends on the £800 consols bequeathed thereby, which had been invested, and on which £60 was due to the Plaintiff; and that, consequently, this Plaintiff was not in the situation to sue in forma pauperis.

Mr. James Russell, in support of the motion. The Plaintiff is either entitled to the interest on £800 consols, or to one-fourth of the residue and other legacies of greater value. He cannot, therefore, be permitted to sue as a pauper. He cites Spencer v. Bryant (11 Ves. 49).

Mr. Pemberton, contra. The Plaintiff has made the usual affidavit, that he is worth more than £5, excepting his wearing apparel and the subject-matter of the suit. He claims in opposition to the ninth codicil, and therefore cannot be entitled to the benefits under it, and he is in possession of neither bequest. His right is the subject of dispute in the present suit.

The motion stood over until the demurrers had been disposed of.

Nov. 12. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS now refused the motion without costs.

[486] ACLAND v. BRADDICK. Dec. 5, 1842; Feb. 25, 1843.

A decree was made in 1830 against executors, charging them personally; in 1831 they obtained leave to rehear the cause. The Plaintiff in 1842 presented a petition for leave to file a supplemental bill, putting in issue new facts to support the personal decree against the executors. The Court refused the application without costs, on the ground that the facts appeared to be either without proof or to be immaterial, or else to have been so long known to the Plaintiff as to preclude him from making them the foundation of the extraordinary relief prayed.

This was a petition presented by the Plaintiff, after decree, for liberty to file a supplemental bill.

The original bill was filed in the Exchequer, in May 1824, against William Braddick, a surviving trustee, and against Edward Lutley and George Braddick, who were made parties in their representative character of executors of Robert Blackmore.

The decree made in 1830 charged the executors personally, as if they had been personally interested, and had personally acted in the several matters complained of. In 1838 the executors, alleging that they ought simply to have been charged de bonis testatoris, obtained leave to rehear the cause.

The Plaintiff now presented a petition to be allowed to file a supplemental bill (see Hodson v. Ball, 1 Phillips, 177), to put in issue certain facts which he alleged had recently discovered, and which, if proved, would entitle him to a personal decree against the executors.

The facts are stated in detail in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Freeling, in support of the petition.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Follett, contra.

[487] Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

Feb. 25. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case comes on a petition of the Plaintiff for leave to file a supplemental bill, under special circumstances.

The Plaintiff, Robert Acland, was a purchaser from John Blackmore of an estate by the will of James Troake, and by the bill, which was filed in the Court of Chancery in May 1824, it was prayed, that he might be declared entitled to the estate, subject only to the payment of a legacy to Joan Blackmore; and it was further prayed, that an account might be taken of the rents of the estate received by trustees under the will since Acland's purchase, that the unpaid legacy might be paid out satisfied, and that the residue of the rents might be paid to Mr. Acland; and that he might have a conveyance, and be paid the costs, charges, and expenses which he had incurred in certain actions, and also the costs of the suit.

It appears that James Troake, by his will dated the 11th of May 1811, devised the estate to Robert Blackmore and William Braddick, on trust to receive the rents, and thereout pay a sum of £124, 10s. 6d. to Mary Dyer, and legacies of £10 each to the children of Richard Blackmore, deceased, named in the will, and after the discharge of the legacies and debt, he devised the estate to John Blackmore in fee.

Soon after the death of the testator, John Blackmore was permitted to take possession of the estate, and ought to have paid the legacies and debt; and it was agreed, that the trustee Robert Blackmore became his surety [488] by bond, for the payment of a sum of £150, which he borrowed from Simon Smith for the purpose of paying the legacy and debt, but that the money was not applied for that purpose, the debt was not paid, till John Blackmore was compelled to pay it by a bill in Chancery; and Robert Blackmore being afterwards compelled to pay the bond to Simon Smith, became a creditor of John Blackmore to that amount, and he claimed a lien on the estate for repayment.

In the year 1817 the Plaintiff purchased the estate from John Blackmore for £1000, and in the month of July in that year a conveyance to the use of the Plaintiff was executed by John Blackmore.

At that time some of the legacies were unpaid, and Robert Blackmore claimed the money he had paid to Simon Smith; and under these circumstances, the Plaintiff, Robert Blackmore and William Braddick, appear to have insisted that the estate was not entitled to his purchase, and many disputes took place between them.

Thomas Pring occupied the estate under a lease which had several years to run. The trustees gave him notice not to pay his rents to Acland, and indemnified him for not doing so. Acland proceeded to cause a distress to be levied. Pring brought an action of replevin, and obtained a verdict with damages and costs. Acland upon not only filed a bill in this Court (which was afterwards dismissed for want of prosecution), but proceeded to cause other distresses to be levied; and being resisted by force, he preferred an indictment, upon which three persons were found guilty of an assault; he afterwards himself committed an [489] assault, for which he was indicted, and on which he was found guilty.

It now appears, that all the legacies were paid in and before the year 1821; and in the year 1823 there was no charge upon the estate, unless the lien claimed by Robert Blackmore was to be considered as a charge.

In 1823 Acland again caused a distress to be levied, and Pring, at the instance of the trustees, again brought an action of replevin, and he recovered a verdict on the 24th of the Summer Assizes of 1823.

The Plaintiff alleges, that it appeared at the trial that all of the legacies were not paid, and that therefore the Judge was of opinion that the legal estate was vested in the trustees. The Defendant, Braddick, denies that it appeared in the action that the legacies were unpaid.

At the trial the trustee, Robert Blackmore, died, having made a will, whereof Edward Lutley and George Braddick were executors.

The Plaintiff's bill (filed in May 1824, after the death of Robert Blackmore, the trustee), notwithstanding some ambiguous statements, assumes that Joan Blackmore was the only unpaid legatee. The Defendant, William Braddick, the surviving trustee, though not very distinctly, does nevertheless appear to admit that all the legacies were paid; and Joan Blackmore being made a party, as the only un-legatee, and having stated by her answer that the Plaintiff himself had paid her leg about seven or eight years before, disclaimed all interest in the estate.

[490] The right of the Plaintiff to his purchase was not disputed by the assignee John Blackmore, who had become insolvent; and the real contest seems to have been, whether Robert Blackmore had acquired a lien on the estate for what he paid in satisfaction of Smith's bond; but it is singular how little the claim is insisted upon in the pleadings. Braddick, who said that he had no interest in the question, states, that Robert Blackmore always contended that he was entitled to the leg of £150 paid to Smith, and he, Braddick, therefore submitted, whether the same was a charge; the executors of Robert Blackmore merely state their ignorance whether it was a charge, or ought to be raised under the trusts of the will.

Evidence in support of the alleged lien or charge was adduced, and the matter being heard in June 1830, it was ordered that the Defendant, William Braddick, should deliver up possession of the estate to the Plaintiff, Richard Acland, and the Master should take an account of the rents received by William Braddick and Robert Blackmore, deceased, or either of them, as trustees of the will of John Troake, and also by Edward Lutley and George Braddick; and in taking the accounts, the Master was to allow to William Braddick and Robert Blackmore sums of money paid by them on account of the legacies, together with interest at five per cent. per annum, and the amount thereof to be deducted from the amount of the rents received by William Braddick and Robert Blackmore, or either of them, the Defendants, Edward Lutley and George Braddick, or either of them; and the residue was to be handed over by William Braddick, Edward Lutley, and George Braddick, or some or one of them, to the Plaintiff, Acland. And, amongst other things, it was ordered, that William Braddick should convey or release the estate to [491] Acland. And it was referred to the Master to tax the Plaintiff and the Defendants, the Prings, their respective costs of the suit, and that such costs, taxed, should be paid by the Defendants, William Braddick, Edward Lutley, George Braddick, or some or one of them, to the Plaintiff and the Prings, or their respective solicitors or clerks in Court.

The decree charges Lutley and George Braddick personally, as if they had personally interested, and had personally acted in the several matters complained of; and on this account Lutley and George Braddick have presented their petition for the cause reheard.

In July 1831 William Braddick, the surviving trustee, took the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act. In January 1835 a supplemental bill was filed against Sturges, the assignee, and to his answer, which was filed on the 8th of May 1835, Sturges annexed an extract from the schedule filed by William Braddick in the Insolvent Debtors Court, from which it appeared, that William Braddick had received for rent three sums of £60, £115, 10s. 6d., and £127, being together £302, 10s. 6d., and various costs, amounting together to £168, 2s. 8d., in the actions against Acland. Three legacies of £10 each were paid out of the rents, but all the costs and the remainder of the rents are stated to have been paid to Mr. Clarke, the solicitor of William Braddick, in part discharge of his bills, leaving a balance due to him.

A decree was made in the supplemental cause in January 1836, and the Plaintiff made his report on the 22d of February 1836, and thereby found, that the amount of £302, 10s. 6d., the amount of rents (agreeing with the amount stated in the answer of Sturges), [492] had been received, as to £60, by William Braddick and Robert Blackmore, and as to the residue by William Braddick, and the legacies which they had paid, together with interest thereon, amounted to £8s. 2½d., which being deducted from the amount of rent received, left £361, 10s. 6d., which he found due to the Plaintiff, and to be paid in the manner by the Plaintiff directed. And he found that nothing had been received for rent by Lutley and George Braddick, or either of them.

On the 9th of July 1836 the cause and supplemental cause came on for judgment. An order was made for taking the account against Sturges, but the further directions in the original cause were reserved.

The Master reported the state of the account of Sturges on the 18th of July 1836.

37, and the cause being again brought on for further directions, the Defendants, Lutley and George Braddick, obtained leave to present a petition for liberty to present petition to rehear the cause, and such liberty being afterwards given, a petition of hearing has been presented.

And the Plaintiff Acland being apprehensive that the decree, in its present form, not be sustained, has presented this petition to be allowed to file a supplemental bill, to put in issue certain facts which he says he has lately discovered, and which, proved, would entitle him to a personal decree against Lutley and George Braddick.

And it is now alleged, first, that it appears by the answer of Sturges, and never appeared to the Plaintiff before, that the rents were in fact received by Clarke, the solicitor of William Braddick, and also the solicitor of Lutley and George Braddick, and paid by him [493] towards payment of his bill of costs; and the Petitioner now alleges, that such bill of costs was due not only from William Braddick, but also from Lutley and George Braddick. Secondly, that William Braddick and Robert Blackmore, and also Lutley and George Braddick fraudulently concealed the fact that the rents had been paid before the actions of replevin and trespass were brought. Thirdly, that the Defendants Lutley and George Braddick have fraudulently colluded with William Braddick to prevent the Plaintiff Acland from obtaining possession, by creating a lien on the estate for the money alleged to be due to Robert Blackmore. Fourthly, that Lutley and George Braddick personally interfered in the receipt of the rents of the property, and in the management and letting thereof, by indemnifying him, in July 1829, or refusing to pay the rent to the Plaintiff, and that Pring paid the rent to William Braddick at the desire of Lutley and George Braddick. Fifthly, that it was fraudulently arranged, between William Braddick and Lutley and George Braddick, after the decree, that William Braddick should charge himself with the debt, and then take the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, so as to prevent the Plaintiff from recovering the amount. Sixthly, that Lutley and George Braddick conspired to prevent the Plaintiff from obtaining possession in March 1830. Seventhly, that Lutley admitted that he had offered to give up possession to the Plaintiff, on being paid his alleged lien, but having got possession himself would refuse to settle on the same terms.

The various facts which are involved in these allegations, appear to me to either without reproof, or to be immaterial, or else to have been so long known to the Plaintiff as to preclude him from making them the [494] foundation of the extraordinary relief which he now prays.

It appears to me, that throughout the cause, the only real difficulty with which the Plaintiff had to contend, arose from the claim, set up by Robert Blackmore and not abandoned by his executors, to a lien or charge on the land for the money paid on Robert's bond, and the Plaintiff appears to me to have known, from the beginning, that this was the cause of the opposition made to his taking possession of the estate.

The schedule to the answer of Sturges, which was filed in May 1835, does not appear to warrant the inference which is deduced from it by the Petitioner and Mr. Oxenham his solicitor, that the rents were, in part, applied in payment of bills due from Lutley and George Braddick. I find no evidence of any fraudulent concealment of the charges upon the estate being paid before the trial of the replevin. The lien was claimed by Robert Blackmore, and he and his co-trustees endeavoured to avail themselves of the legal estate, which was or was supposed to remain vested in them, to support that claim; but I find nothing, from which a fraudulent concealment of the payment of the legacies is to be inferred, and it is remarkable, that the Plaintiff who makes this allegation of fraudulent concealment, by the bill alleged that by one legacy was unpaid, and the fact appeared that one had been paid by the Plaintiff Acland himself some years before.

There can be no doubt but that Lutley and George Braddick assisted William Braddick to keep the Plaintiff out of possession, with a view to enforce the lien claimed, and this was perfectly well known to the Plaintiff Acland in the year 1829, and on the 25th of [495] March 1830, before the date of the decree, and at a time when it was not too late to bring the matter forward in a proper manner, if it had been thought material to do so: and it moreover appears, that an action of trespass was brought by the Plaintiff against Lutley, for the improper and illegal interference concerning the possession of the estate, and that some proceedings in that action, or the reference which was made thereon, were pending in February 1836, when Mr. Oxenham made his affidavit. This proceeding shews, that Acland did not rely on the decree alone, but actively endeavoured to obtain at law, such redress as he conceived himself entitled to; and although Mr. Acland has stated his belief that the rents were received by William Braddick in fraudulent collusion with the other parties, for the purpose of defeating the Plaintiff's right, the allegation rests on the belief alone, without the proof of any fact to support it.

Considering, therefore, the nature of the suit, and the facts which were in issue between the parties, the facts now brought forward, and their materiality, as well as the time when they were known to the Plaintiff, and the way in which they are supported, and considering the action brought in relation to some of the matters complained of, I am of opinion that the Plaintiff is not entitled to file such supplemental bill as he desires, and that this petition must be dismissed with costs.

[496] MARSHALL v. MELLERSH. March 2, 1843.

An application to advance the hearing of exceptions should be made on notice, and not ex parte.

Exceptions were taken for impertinence and were referred to the Master, who found in the affirmative; and exceptions were thereupon taken to the Master's report.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh moved to advance these exceptions for immediate hearing on the ground, that they were in the nature of a dilatory. Holmes v. The Corporation of Arundel (3 Beav. 407).

No notice of this motion had been given to the other side.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held that the application ought to be made ex parte, but that notice of motion must be given.

[497] HOULDITCH v. COLLINS. Nov. 8, 1842.

A creditor recovered a judgment in this country, and obtained a charge on the debtor's lands, &c., under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13. He afterwards arrested the debtor in Jersey upon mesme process for the same debt. Held, that the charge on the lands here was not thereby forfeited under the sixteenth section.

The bill stated that the Plaintiffs had, in 1840, obtained a judgment against the Defendant Collins in the Court of Exchequer at Westminster for £4931, and entered the minute, &c., under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. That the Defendant Collins was entitled to certain hereditaments which were held by two of the Defendants in trust for him; and it insisted, that the judgment operated as a charge on the hereditaments to which the Defendant Collins was seised at the time the judgment was entered, and that the Plaintiffs were, under the thirteenth section of the above Act, entitled to the same remedies, in this Court, against the hereditaments, as if the Defendant Collins had agreed to charge the same. It prayed a declaration that the Plaintiffs were entitled by virtue of the judgment and Act of Parliament to be considered mortgagees of the property, and that the amount due might be raised and paid, for foreclosure.

To this bill two of the Defendants pleaded that, in May 1840, the Plaintiff arrested Collins, who was then in Jersey for another debt. That the Defendant believed, that while Collins was confined as a prisoner in the prison at St. Helier, under the writ, the Plaintiffs, on the 9th of September 1840, by Thomas Le Breton Esq., whom they appointed to be administrator of their goods in the said island, caused another writ, called an "ordre provisoire," to be issued in the island of Jersey by E. L. Bisson the bailiff (being a person duly authorized to issue such writs in the island), against the Defendant Collins, for the sum of £4931, 14s. 6d. sterling, being the amount, in respect of which the [498] Plaintiffs, on the 3rd of ally 1840, recovered and entered up a final judgment in the Court of Exchequer of the year 1840, in an action against the Defendant Collins, as in the bill mentioned, and that such writ when duly translated into the English language, was to the tenor, purport, and effect following, that is to say:—"Thomas Le Breton, Esq., administrator of the goods of Messrs. John Houlditch and James Houlditch, is committed by justice to cause to be seised, arrested, put in execution, and also to sequester, if it is required, the most apparent property of their debtors in all places where such may be found, particularly upon that issuing from the premises, to be applied to the payment of what shall be found truly and justly due to him. As to strangers or persons expatriable, they may cause their goods, vessels, merchandizes, and effects, or themselves personally to be arrested, if they do not make good their engagements, written engagements, debts, or promises, or if they do not give sufficient bail to fulfil them, which shall be executed by the viscount or one of the denunciators, officers of justice, or the constable, or by one of the centeniers of the parish. Reasons reserved. Given at St. Heliers, on the 9th day of September 1840. Signed J. L. Bisson, Lieutenant Bailli."

That the Defendants believed, that the said writ was lodged on the 9th of September 1840 with Phillip Le Gallais the deputy viscount, being the proper officer of the said prison of St. Heliers aforesaid, and that Phillip Le Gallais, being the proper officer duly authorized to make a return to the said last-mentioned writ, made a return to the same writ, which return when duly translated into the English language was to the tenor, purport, or effect following, that is to say:—

[499] "This 9th of September 1840. In virtue of the order on the other side, I have seized and put in prison Christopher Gerard Rigbye Collins, Esq., at the instance of Thomas Le Breton, Esq., administrator of the goods of Messrs. John Houlditch and James Houlditch, to compel him to pay the sum of £4931, 14s. 10d. sterling, according to the course of exchange upon London, being the amount of a final judgment given by the Court of Exchequer of Pleas at Westminster in England, in favour of Messrs. Houlditch, against the said Mr. Collins, on the 27th day of July in the year 1840; also to compel him to pay the interest upon the same sum, from the 27th day of July 1840 till the day of payment, of which I have given due record."

The plea also alleged, that Collins was still confined in prison in Jersey, in respect of the judgment debt for £4931.

The plea therefore raised this point, that the Plaintiffs, by taking Collins in execution, had forfeited the charge under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 16, whereby it is enacted, "that if any judgment creditor, who, under the powers of this Act, shall have obtained any charge, or be entitled to the benefit of any security whatsoever, after the date of the said Act, and before the property so charged or secured shall have been converted into money or realised, and the produce thereof applied towards payment of the judgment debt, cause the person of the judgment debtor to be taken or charged in execution upon such judgment, then, and in such case, such judgment creditor shall be deemed and taken to have relinquished all right and title to the benefit of such charge or security, and shall forfeit the same accordingly."

[500] Mr. George Turner and Mr. Piggott, in support of the plea. The question was, whether it is competent for parties who have obtained a judgment in this country, to make it a charge upon the Defendant's lands, to go to Jersey and take their debtor in execution before they have realised their securities here.

The object of the Act was this, that the party should not be imprisoned for non-payment of a debt, while his creditor had a charge and lien upon his property which, of itself, would prevent a sale for the purpose of realising the money necessary for discharging the debt. By the sixteenth section, if the creditor "causes" the person of the debtor to be taken or charged in execution on the judgment, the charge upon the real estate is forfeited. If, therefore, the creditor adopts any course of proceeding upon the judgment which operates to imprison the debtor's person, the charge on the real estate is forfeited. If this construction be not put on the statute, a Defendant might be imprisoned for life, where he is unable to put in bail; for all his property is put out of his power of disposition by the charge.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rolt, contra. The sixteenth section does not apply to a case in which the taking in execution is upon a judgment obtained in a foreign Court after judgment here. Where a party (as in the present instance) withdraws himself from the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country, his creditor is entitled to avail himself of the assistance of a foreign tribunal to compel payment of his debt, and thereby obtain payment out of the property of his debtor in that country. In order to charge the debtor's lands in Jersey, it would be necessary to obtain judgment there.

[501] But here there has been no taking in execution upon the judgment; the proceedings shew that there has been no judgment in the Courts of Jersey, and the Collins has been merely arrested on mesne process upon the original debt. The judgment here cannot be used further than as evidence of the amount due, and even if he were taken in execution upon a judgment recovered in Jersey, the case would not come within the statute.

Mr. G. Turner, in reply. It is not alleged that Collins has any lands in Jersey; if he had, the Act created an equitable charge upon them; for by the 13th section, the judgment here operates as a charge on all lands, &c., of the debtor. Proceedings to charge the lands in Jersey were therefore unnecessary.

The object of the Act was to prevent cotemporaneous proceedings against the person and property of a debtor, and to impose a forfeiture of the charge upon a creditor imprisoning his debtor.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The words of the Act of Parliament appear to me to be perfectly plain, and I have no authority to extend their operation.

The Plaintiffs in this cause are judgment creditors of the Defendant, and, under the authority of the Act, they are entitled to a charge upon the whole of his property. There is a clause in the Act (sect. 16), that if the judgment creditor having obtained a charge under the Act, "shall cause the person of the judgment debtor [502] to be taken and charged in execution upon such judgment, then and in such case, the judgment creditor shall be deemed and taken to have relinquished his right of title to the benefit of such charge and shall forfeit the same accordingly." The single question, therefore, in this case must be, whether the judgment creditors have caused the person of the judgment debtor to be taken and charged in execution upon the judgment; because if they have done so, then the charge is relinquished; if they have not done that, then the Act of Parliament does not apply.

What has been done in this case is to adopt proceedings in the Court at Jersey for the recovery of the same sum which was recovered by the judgment here. The documents, as they are set out in the plea, plainly, as it appears to me, indicate an execution upon the judgment (which of course could not be had in a foreign Court) but a proceeding to recover, by a new action, the amount of that which had been ascertained to be due by the judgment here. It is mesne process, and not a taking in execution upon the judgment; there is no taking upon the judgment.

Now, without considering whether such a proceeding would have been allowed by the Legislature, if the point had been particularly considered, it is sufficient for me to say, that this does not appear to me to be a case comprised within the terms of the sixteenth clause. If the point had been the subject of consideration, there would seem to be great reason for hesitating in enacting a clause prohibiting such a proceeding. For here the Defendant has withdrawn himself from this jurisdiction and placed himself in another, where he may or may not have property, but which property, if he has [503] it, can be followed by means of the authority of the Court there. This act of the Defendant may render it absolutely necessary for the Plaintiffs, for the purpose of maintaining their rights, to adopt another proceeding in that Court, and one of the first steps in that proceeding may be arrest in mesne process.

The plea must be disallowed, on the ground that the case as stated in the plea does not come within the meaning of the sixteenth clause of the Act of Parliament.

[503] MADEN v. VEEVERS. Nov. 10, 11, 14, 1842.

husband seized in right of his wife concurred with the other tenants in common in a partition of estate and mines, but no fine was levied. He died in 1828; after which his widow acquiesced in the arrangement, and took the benefit of it. She and her leasee afterwards proceeded to get coal under the land awarded to other parties, and defended that proceeding, on the ground that the husband's acts were invalid, and that the parties were still tenants in common of the whole. The Court restrained her by injunction.

Her answer, the original bill was amended, and the Defendant obtained time to answer it; the Plaintiff then gave notice of motion for a special injunction, and filed affidavits in support of it. The motion coming on, the Defendant obtained time to answer the affidavits, and then filed both her answer and affidavits in opposition. Held, that the second answer must be treated as an affidavit, and that the affidavits in support of the motion might be used to qualify the second, but not the first answer.

This was a motion to restrain the Defendants, Mary Veevers and John Townend, from working coal mines under the lands of the Plaintiff in Reaps Moss.

The Plaintiff claimed to be entitled, in severalty, to certain lands which were merely part of Reaps Moss and Tooter Hill, and to the coal mines situate under the lands.

The Defendant, Mary Veevers, appeared to claim to be entitled, as one of several tenants in common, to an [504] undivided share of all the lands in Reaps Moss and coal which was under them. John Townend claimed, in her right, to be entitled to that coal under a demise from her.

It seemed that the common or waste lands called Tooter Hill and Reaps Moss were, in some way, appurtenant to four ancient freehold tenements, called Tonge, Lee, and Rochliffe. Those several tenements belonged, in different shares, to several persons. In the year 1812 the Plaintiff was entitled to a share of Tonge, and also to a share of Greaves. The Defendant, Mrs. Veevers, was entitled to a share of Tonge, the legal estate in which had descended to her from her grandfather, John Holden, subject to an obligation which had been entered into by Holden in her marriage, and the effect of which, in equity, was to limit her interest to an estate for life, with remainder to her children.

In this state of things, an intention was formed by the several owners and proprietors of the ancient tenements, to make partitions among them of Tooter Hill and Reaps Moss; and for the purpose of carrying such intention into effect, certain indentures, dated the 18th and 19th days of August 1812, were executed by several persons, recited to be entitled to the said common and waste lands in the shares therein mentioned. Sagar Veevers (the husband of the Defendant, Mrs. Veevers), and some others who were parties to the deed were recited to be entitled, in right of their respective wives. By the deed it was decreed, declared, and covenanted by and between those who were entitled in right of their wives covenanting for himself and wife, that the common lands should be divided by Gilbert Welch and Richard Roberts, who were appointed commissioners for the purpose of the intended inclosure and division, and for [505] setting out roads, and for bounding, hedging, and fencing the allotments; and that the award to be made by the commissioners should be final and conclusive upon all parties, immediately after the sealing and delivery of the deed. And for the purpose of ascertaining the interests of the several parties, the commissioners were empowered to examine and determine the right and interest which each party had; and for the purpose of completing the intended division, the deed purported to convey the property in the common and waste lands to Welch and Roberts. Sagar Veevers, and the other persons who were entitled in right of their wives, covenanted for themselves and their wives, to levy fines, to enure to the use of Welch and Roberts, for the intents and purposes of the deed.

It did not appear that any fine was levied in pursuance of these covenants, and, consequently, the conveyance was imperfect as to the interests of the married women; but Welch and Roberts, the commissioners appointed by the deed, proceeded to divide and allot the land, and on the 18th of February 1814 they made their award, and thereby set out a private or occupation road for the use of the several persons to whom allotments were made, to the Plaintiff, to the Defendant, Mrs. Veevers, to James Stanfield, John Chadwick, and the other owners, parties to the deed; and the several allotments were described and distinguished by reference to a map annexed to the award.

It did not appear that any conveyance was executed by Welch and Roberts for the purpose of carrying the award into effect; but it seemed, that in the month of April 1814, being very soon after the date of the award, John Chadwick, one of the persons entitled to an allotment, did (as Mrs. Veevers said) with his mortgagee [506] convey and release to Sagar Veevers, and his heirs, as well the share of the surface of the lands which had been divided, as also his undivided fourth part of the mines and minerals lying under the estate mentioned in her answer; and that in June 1814 George Stanfield and James Stanfield (James being one of the persons entitled to an allotment), conveyed their shares of the mines and minerals to Sagar Veevers in fee.

The answer of Mrs. Veevers was so expressed, as not clearly to shew what was the description of the lands or mines so conveyed to Sagar Veevers in fee in 1814; but the Court held on this application, that considering the part taken by Sagar Veevers in the transaction, and the covenant into which he had entered, it could not, upon the evidence now before it, consider that the interests conveyed to him by John Chadwick and James Stanfield were any other than the interests allotted by the award a few months before the date of the conveyances.

The roads were set out and made pursuant to the award. It was in controversy whether the different allotments were fenced off from each other: Mrs. Veevers said they were not.

Sagar Veevers lived till March 1828. During his life no question arose; he was owner, in right of his wife, of her share, and as purchaser from Stanfield and Chadwick, he was as the Court considered, owner of the shares which had been allotted to them. He made his will dated the 12th of June 1827, and thereby devised his estates, subject to certain charges, to the Defendant, Mrs. Veevers, for her life, with remainders over; and upon the death of her husband, the Defendant became [507] interested in the shares which had been purchased by him.

The Defendants were proceeding to get coal beyond the allotment of Mrs. Veevers and under the allotments in which the Plaintiff was interested, and the object of this motion was to restrain them.

Mrs. Veevers now said, that the deed of August 1812 having been executed, and the allotment and award having been made, during her coverture, she was bound at the death of her husband and was not now, in any way bound thereby; and further, that even if she were bound by the award, it would not affect the present question, because as she said, the agreement, the deed, the allotment and the award had reference only to the surface of the waste land and not to the mines.

On the other hand, the Plaintiff did not contend that Mrs. Veevers, as a married woman, was bound by the acts of her husband in reference to her land, or acquiescence in his lifetime; but he alleged, that the division and allotment were actually made and acted upon in her husband's lifetime with her knowledge, and that if she had intended to dispute them, she ought immediately, or in a reasonable time after his death, to have taken steps to assert her rights independent of the award, and that she was so far from doing this, that after her husband's death, and with knowledge of the circumstances, she claimed and acted upon the rights which might be entitled to under the award; and that having adopted and long acquiesced in the award, and having exercised an exclusive right to her own allotment under the award, she was not now entitled to dispute it, but ought to be compelled to give effect to it.

[508] Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Rogers, in support of the motion.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Bacon, contra.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

Jefferys v. Smith (1 Jac. & W. 298) and Morphett v. Jones (19 Ves. 349) were cited. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved judgment.

Nov. 14. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears, that in the year 1828 when Sagar Veevers died, Abraham White was occupying tenant of a small farm called Hoyle Hey being part of the ancient Tonge tenement which belonged to Mrs. Veevers; and that James Maden, of Huttock Top, and his partners were occupying tenants of the coal mines under Hoyle Hey, and which also belonged to Mrs. Veevers.

James Maden by his affidavit states, that on the 10th of July 1828 he and his partners went to Mrs. Veevers to pay her a half-year's rent, and then told her, that the mines they were working were so nearly exhausted, that they would not last more than twelve months, whereupon Mrs. Veevers informed them, that she had no coal under Reaps Moss, which they might have at the same rent as they were then paying for the coals they were then working; that she produced a plan of the waste, with the allotments marked upon it, and particularly marked out her allotment with her name upon it; [509] she shewed the way in which she said the coals might be got without interfering with the other allotments, which she said were not to be meddled with. Maden and his partners then agreed to take the coal from Mrs. Veevers' allotment, and the plan was delivered to them as their guide for ascertaining the boundary in the working. This agreement, however, does not appear to have been acted upon, and after working the mines under the old tenement about two years longer, Maden and his partners quitted the mine.

This was about Midsummer 1830, and in October of that year Mrs. Veevers proposed to let her mines by ticket. Conditions of sale were drawn by Mr. Lovat, from the affidavits it appears, that she so expressed herself and so acted as to make it clear, that she claimed to be exclusively entitled to the coal under her own tenement, and not to be entitled to the coal under the adjoining allotments. Nothing took place at that time, and an offer made by the Defendant Townend was rejected; but soon afterwards Mrs. Veevers demised the mines to Townend, on a surety for nine years under the description (as I understand Townend's version), of the coals, mines, or seams of coal, called Hoyle Hey under the farm called Hoyle Hey and the adjoining ground, under which land the coals were supposed to belong to Mary Veevers. Some time after this letting, it is sworn by Abraham White the tenant of the farm, that on the occasion of paying his rent, in April 1832, he told Mrs. Veevers that he thought Townend could not get the coal, by reason of the water in the mine; that she then produced a plan of the allotments, pointing out her own and the occupation road, which had been made pursuant to the award, and explaining how she thought the coals could be gotten withstanding the water, and stated that a loose or drawing road could be made [510] under the occupation road, and that in that direction, the coals under her tenement might be gotten. White says, that, in the same conversation, he told Mrs. Veevers that he had heard that Townend could not get the coal under her tenement, without driving works through the allotments of the other landowners, which she answered, that she had let the coal to Townend, on the conditions which had been prepared for the letting by Lovat; and that if Townend got other people's coal he must answer for it.

Before the letting to Townend, the lord of the manor of Rochdale had commenced proceedings at law to recover possession of Tooter Hill and Reaps Moss, as parcel of the manor. There were several ejectments, one of which was against the Plaintiff in this cause (see Doe dem. Dearden v. Maden, 4 B. & Ad. 880), and the common title of the owners being involved, they made common cause, and the Plaintiff defended the ejectment brought against him, on behalf of himself and all the others. Mrs. Veevers authorized a Mr. Hoyle to act in that business as her agent; deposits of sums of money, which seem to have been proportioned to each owner's allotment, were made to defray the extra costs of the common defence, and Mrs. Veevers' contribution was £11, 5s. 5d. In the result, that sum was ascertained to be more than enough, and the sum of £3, 3s. was returned to Mrs. Veevers, and the accounts of the transaction, which were signed by the agent of Mrs. Veevers, were headed, "Account of the expenses attending the trial relating to Tooter Hill and Reaps Moss. Dearden and Maden account of cash paid to the proprietors of Tooter Hill and Reaps Moss, to balance their respective deposits made in this suit, pro-[511] portioned according to their respective shares and allotments."

Under these circumstances, and in the present state of the evidence, without anticipating what may be the result of further investigation and more satisfactory proofs, it does now appear to me, that Mrs. Veevers was, upon the death of her husband, acquainted with the award and allotment:—that she considered the mine as well as the surface to be included:—that she acquiesced in it, not only by admitting that she was not entitled to encroach upon the allotments of others, but by exercising an exclusive right to let the coal under her own allotment for her separate benefit, and that she is not entitled, first to avail herself of the award, to exercise an exclusive right to get coal under her own allotment, and afterwards to reject the award, for the purpose of establishing a right to an undivided share of the coal under the whole district.

The circumstances of this case may possibly give rise to questions of law and equity, which may be attended with considerable difficulty, and which must nevertheless be decided, before the rights of these parties can be strictly determined. Upon those questions, I do not now give any opinion, but the weight of evidence now before me, though by no means so satisfactory as could be wished, appearing to me to be such as I have stated, I think, that until the matter can be fully considered, Mrs. Veevers and her tenant Townend ought not to be allowed to get coal under the Plaintiff's allotment.

Upon the fact that the Defendants are proceeding to get coal beyond the allotment of Mrs. Veevers, and under the allotments in which the Plaintiff is interested, [512] there seems to be no controversy, and therefore, it is unnecessary for me to refer particularly to the affidavits.

Let the Defendants Mrs. Veevers and John Townend be restrained from getting coal under any of the allotments in which the Plaintiff is interested.

In the course of the argument, a question was raised, whether the affidavits which had been filed for the purposes of this motion, ought any of them to be read, and so, to what extent. The circumstances affecting the question of affidavits were these:—No motion was made upon the original bill, which had been answered on the 3d of December 1841. The bill was amended in March 1842, and Townend's answer to the amended bill was filed in June 1842; but Mrs. Veevers having applied for an enlarged time to put in her answer, a notice of motion was given, and affidavits in support were filed in July 1842. Time being asked to answer the affidavits, the affidavits were, in fact, met not only by affidavits, but also by the answer of Mrs. Veevers to the amended bill on this point.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS in giving judgment said:—Under these circumstances it has appeared to me, that I ought to read the affidavits in support of the statement and charges made in the amended bill. I think that Mrs. Veevers could not, by obtaining indulgence for herself, deprive the Plaintiff of his right to move on the affidavits, and could not, by putting in her answer after obtaining time to answer the affidavits, place herself in a better position than she would have been, if the answer had been her affidavit. Her first answer was put in at a time which entitled her to the credit which is generally given to an answer, and I have intended so to treat qualifying [513] the credit given to her statement, and to her allegations of fact, only by the other statements contained in the same answer.

[513] THE EARL OF LICHFIELD v. BOND. Dec. 17, 1842.

Exceptions to an answer ought to specify, not only the cause, but the pleading to which the answer has been put in.

Exceptions to an answer to a bill for insufficiency, were headed "Exceptions taken by the said Complainant to the insufficient answer of the said Defendant." Held, that this was insufficient, and that they ought to specify that the answer complained of was the answer to the bill.

 Exceptions are now matters of record.

This was an injunction case, and the Plaintiff had obtained the common injunction. The Defendant having put in his answer, exceptions were taken thereto, which were properly entitled in the cause, but were headed "Exceptions taken by the said complainant to the insufficient answer of the said Defendant," but they omitted to specify that the answer complained of was an answer "to the bill of complaint." (See hinde, 270, and 2 Van. Heyth. 133, 135.)

The Master declined proceeding with the exceptions, on the ground that they were not correctly headed.

A motion was now made, on behalf of the Plaintiff, that the Master might be directed to proceed with the exceptions, and that, if necessary, the same might be amended.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Willcock, in support of the motion, contended, that the heading was accurate. That the Master had no jurisdiction to entertain the objection, but ought to have proceeded to determine the matter in obedience to the order of reference; and that, if there was any error, the proper course was for the Defendant to move to take the exceptions off the file; Williams v. Davies (1 S. St. 426). They argued also that the objection was frivolous and useless.

[514] Mr. Turner and Mr. Toller, contra. The exceptions are used for the purpose of delay, and are in the nature of a mere dilatory to retain the injunction; they ought therefore to be dealt with strictly. The heading of the exceptions is incorrect, there is nothing to identify the exceptions with the bill. The exceptions should specify to what the pleading complained of is an answer; it might be an answer to another matter, as an answer to an examination under a decree.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I do not think that the heading of these exceptions is strictly regular, but there cannot be any doubt that they were really exceptions to the answer "to the bill."

How far exceptions were formerly matters of record, seems to have been a question of doubt, but now the exceptions are regularly filed (5th Order, October 26, 1842, Ord. Can. 207), and have become of record. Being so, what does the record consist of? First we have a bill, and then an answer to the bill, and exceptions to the answer; these constitute the whole record, then comes the order of reference, which expressly refers to the answer. There cannot, therefore, be any reasonable doubt of what was meant in this case, but at the same time cases may occur in which an ambiguity might arise, and in which the objection might be material. I think that the strict rules of practice ought to be preserved. I will therefore give the Plaintiff liberty to amend his exceptions, and thereupon direct the Master to proceed upon them.

I can give no costs in such a case as this.

[515] TURNER v. CORNEY. Dec. 7, 1841.

Special decree in a bill for an account, where the accounts and vouchers were alleged, under special circumstances, to be beyond the control and power of the accounting party.

The Plaintiff conveyed his property to trustees for the benefit of his creditors. The trustees who were authorised to employ an agent, committed the management of the property to an agent. The agent rendered his accounts to the Defendants, and left England, taking with him the vouchers. The trustees being unable, from the absence of the documents, to furnish a satisfactory account, the Plaintiff asked that they might be charged for what, without their wilful default, they might have received. The Court, however, in the first instance, made a special decree ordering a general account; and if, in taking the account, it should appear that the Defendants could not render a satisfactory account by reason of the non-production of the documents and vouchers, it was referred to the Master to inquire, whether it was by the neglect or default of the trustees that they were unable to render a better account, with liberty to state special circumstances.

In 1828 the Plaintiff Turner and his partner Dodgin executed a creditor's deed, by which they assigned to Corney and Barrett their stock-in-trade and debts, upon trust to collect, and after payment of the costs, to divide the produce proportionably between the scheduled creditors, and pay the surplus to the assignors. Corney and Barrett covenanted to perform those trusts, and keep and produce proper accounts. They were authorised to employ one or more person or persons to inspect and make out the accounts of the said partnership business, and to collect and get in the debts and effects.

The Plaintiff went abroad, where he remained ten years, and after his return he filed this bill, seeking to have an account of the receipts and payments of the trustees, and to charge them with an alleged surplus.

The Defendants stated that they did not take possession of the property, books, and accounts, but committed the entire active management and disposition of the trust premises to Mr. Willat, a perfectly competent person for that purpose, who was approved of by the Plaintiff as such agent. That Willat realised the property, and distributed the produce amongst the creditors, as set forth in his account (which was set out in a schedule to the answer), leaving, after payment in full of the debts, a balance of £58 due to the Defendants or their agent.

They stated that Mr. Willat relinquished business, and went to reside abroad some years ago, and was permanently resident abroad, and had left with the Defendants no papers, accounts, or books whatever relating to the said trust premises.

They set forth the account, and stated that they were unable to set forth a further account, and that they had not in their possession any papers, &c., relating to the accounts.

By amendment, the Plaintiff insisted that the accounts were defective and imperfect, and that credit was not given for the fair value of the stock and effects, and that such accounts did not include many of the credits of the partnership, and that many good debts were omitted.

The cause coming on for hearing,

Mr. Wilbraham, for the Plaintiff, asked for a decree of what without the willful default of the Defendants, the trustees, they might have received, and of the application thereof.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Parry, contra, did not resist a general account, but insisted that the Plaintiff was not entitled to the particular decree asked.

[517] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is, whether the case now brought forward entitles the Plaintiff to the decree which he asks. It is very possible he may be entitled ultimately.

Where the books and documents relating to the account are, and whether the same can be produced does not appear, and the Defendants have not rendered a satisfactory account by their answer.

If I directed a common account, the Plaintiff would not have what he is entitled to. I think I am not at present in a situation either to charge the Defendants in the way asked, or to exonerate them. There must be some inquiry, if by the neglect or default of the trustees they cannot render a better account. Some caution must be used in drawing up the decree.

I must observe, that trustees who take on themselves the management of property for the benefit of others have no right to shift their duty on other persons; and if they employ an agent, they remain subject to responsibility towards their cestui que trust, for whom they have undertaken the duty.

ABSTRACT OF DECREE.—Refer it to the Master to take an account of the property assigned, and of the proceeds received by the Defendants, or by any person by their order, or for their use, and of the application thereof, and of all monies properly expended in and about the execution of the trusts; and if, in taking the account, it shall appear that the Defendants cannot render a satisfactory account, by reason of the non-production of the documents and [518] vouchers, refer it to the Master to quire whether it is by the neglect or default of the trustees that they are unable to under a better account, with liberty to state special circumstances. (N.B.—The use was afterwards compromised, while in the Master's office.)

[518] ALEXANDER v. ALEXANDER. Dec. 6, 1842.

The testator, by his will, gave two-thirds of his residue to his eldest son, with a gift over in case he died under twenty-five and unmarried; and he gave the remaining one-third to his second son, in similar terms. By a codicil he revoked so much of his will as related to the distribution of his residue, and gave to his second son £20,000 sterling in lieu of his one-third of the residue, and he appointed his eldest son residuary legatee. Held, that the gift of the £20,000 was absolute, and not subject to the same limitations as the one-third of the residue.

The testator, by his will dated in 1836, gave his residuary estate to trustees, as to two-thirds in trust, until his son Caledon D. Alexander should attain twenty-five or marry, to apply such part of the interest as they should think fit in his maintenance, and to pay over the capital to him "when and immediately after he should have attained the age of twenty-five, or be married;" and in case of his death under twenty-five and unmarried, the testator gave the two-thirds upon the same trusts as were afterwards declared of the remaining one-third.

The testator then gave the remaining one-third upon trust, until the Plaintiff, his son, Josiah B. C. Alexander, should attain twenty-five or marry, to apply such part of the interest as they should think proper towards his maintenance, &c.; and the testator authorised the trustees to advance him any sum not exceeding £10,000, towards his advancement in the world, whether he [519] should or not have attained twenty-five or be married; and he directed them to pay over the capital, "when and immediately after he should attain his age of twenty-five years or marry." The one-third was given over in case of the death of the Plaintiff under the age of twenty-five and unmarried, upon the trusts declared concerning the other two-thirds of the residue.

In 1838 the testator made a codicil to his will, which was as follows:—"By this codicil to my last will and testament, made at Paris this 24th day of November 1838, I do hereby revoke so much of my said will as relates to the distribution of the residue of my estate. And I do hereby bequeath to my second son Josias a legacy of £20,000 sterling in lieu of his one-third share of the said residue, and do appoint my eldest son Caledon to be my sole residuary legatee."

The Plaintiff was still under the age of twenty-one, and by this bill he claimed to be entitled to the £20,000 absolutely, without any restriction.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Beales, for the Plaintiff.

The testator has, by his codicil, given to the Plaintiff a legacy of £20,000 absolutely, in lieu of the one-third which was subject to certain restrictions. The Plaintiff is therefore absolutely entitled to this sum.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Gardner, for the executors.

Mr. Kindersley and the Honourable F. Bruce, for Caledon D. Alexander. The gift by the codicil is a substitution for that given by the will, and is therefore subject to the same incidents and limitations, so that in the event of the death of the Plaintiff under twenty-five unmarried the legacy will go over.

[520] It has been held that a legacy substituted for another shall be raised out of the same fund and be subject to the same conditions; Crowder v. Clowes (2 Ves. jun. 49). Thus, where annuities were given by will free of legacy duty and an annuity was given by a codicil in lieu of one given by the will, it was held that the substituted annuity, though not so expressed, was to be paid free of duty; The Earl of Shaftesbury v. The Duke of Marlborough (7 Sim. 237).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There is no doubt that this is an absolute legacy. The testator has revoked so much of his will as relates to the distribution of the residue of his estate. The whole of this disposition is therefore gone. He says, I have given the residue, subject to a contingency, I revoke the gift entirely, and in lieu I give an absolute interest in £20,000.(1)

[521] CROW v. CARLETON. March 20, 1843.

An allegation in the bill was admitted by one Defendant, A., and denied by another, B., and the Plaintiff who had not proved it proposed to waive his claim in respect of it, but this being opposed by A., an inquiry was directed as to the fact.

Mr. Whitehead, before his bankruptcy, carried on business in partnership with Carleton and Ackerman. He became a bankrupt in the month of May.

The Plaintiffs, who were Whitehead's assignees, contended, in this suit, that the business had been carried on from May to November for their joint benefit, jointly with Carleton and Ackerman.

Carleton denied that the business was so carried on from May to November, and insisted it was carried on for the benefit of Carleton and Ackerman alone.

Ackerman, on the other hand, admitted that it was carried on as alleged by the Plaintiffs.

When the cause came on for hearing, the Plaintiffs, who had not made out the allegation as to the business having been carried on as alleged by them, waived the account from May to November.

Mr. O. Anderdon and Mr. Beales, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. J. Adams, for Ackerman, insisted that the Plaintiffs were not at liberty to waive the account, the result of which would be to permit the assignees to release themselves from their admitted liability in respect of the partnership-transactions subsequent to May.

Mr. Shebbeare, for Carleton.

[522] Mr. O. Anderdon, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiffs are the assignees of Whitehead, who, before his bankruptcy, carried on business with Carleton and Ackerman. It is alleged by the Plaintiffs, that after the bankruptcy and until November the business was carried on for the joint benefit of the three. Carleton denies this, and says it was carried on for the benefit of himself and Ackerman alone. Ackerman, on the other hand, says it was carried on for the benefit of the three until November. At a future stage of this cause, it will be necessary for me to direct the distribution of the partnership funds, and yet it is thought that I have no duty to see what the rights of the parties are. It is obviously necessary for me to ascertain the facts before I can determine the rights of the parties. Therefore, let the account be taken down to the time of the bankruptcy, with respect to which there is no dispute, and let there be an inquiry whether, after the bankruptcy, the business was carried on for the benefit of the three parties, or any and which of them.

[523] CLARKE v. YONGE. YOUNG v. YONGE. May 26, 28, July 22, 1842.

A confirmed award under the Tithe Commutation Act is final as between the tithe owners and tithe-payers, but does not exclude from further investigation a claim between the tithe-owners themselves, in which there was, before the award, a joint title to tithes, which by accident and mistake was not brought forward till after the award was made.

Thus, by an award, made with the concurrence of A., the patron, the whole rectorial charge was made payable to B. the rector, A. being at the time entitled to one-half.

(1) And see Cooper v. Day, 3 Mer. 154; Martin v. Drinkwater, 2 Beav. 215; Overend v. Gurney, 7 Sim. 128; Burrows v. Cottrell, 3 Sim. 375; Chatteris v. Young, 1 Mad. 30; 2 Russ. 183; Day v. Croft, 4 Beav. 561; and Cookson v. Hancock, 1 Keen, 817, and 2 Myl. & Cr. 606.

of the corn tithes, but ignorant of his rights. Held, that A. might have relief in this Court as against B.

A. and B. were entitled to tithes in equal moieties. B. under mistake received the whole, a bill by A. against B. for his moiety was dismissed with costs.

The principal question in this case arose out of the provisions of the Tithe Commutation Act. (1) The facts and evidence in the cause being very fully stated in judgment of the Court, it is merely necessary here to advert to them shortly.

The Plaintiffs in the first suit were entitled to the advowson of the Rectory of Aston, and were also entitled, as impropiators, to a portion of the corn tithes, but they were ignorant of their rights in respect of the latter.

The Defendant was, in 1838, appointed the rector of the parish, and, as such, was entitled to a portion of the corn tithes; but from the time of his collation he had received the whole.

In 1840 an agreement was entered into, under the authority of the Act, between the "landowners" and the Defendant, the rector of the parish, for the commutation of the tithes; and the Plaintiffs, as owners of the advowson, had consented thereto. The tithes were thereby commuted for a rent charge of £905, payable to the rector and successors. The agreement was afterwards confirmed by the Tithe Commissioners.

[24] The Plaintiffs, afterwards discovering their title to a portion of the corn tithes, filed this bill against the rector and other parties to have their right to a portion of the rent charge declared, &c. The first question was, as to the right of the Plaintiffs to any portion of the tithes before the commutation; and the second was, whether, by the terms of the Act, they were precluded from having any remedy in Court.

The Act in question had for its object to abolish the inconvenient practice of paying tithes in kind, and to substitute a determinate money payment by way of rent charge, varying, from time to time, in amount with the current price of corn. This was to be effected either by a voluntary agreement between the "landowners" and "tithe-owners" (sect. 17), or compulsorily by the Commissioners (sect. 36), and the Commissioners were empowered by the forty-fifth section, to hear and determine any question of right between the parties. The sections of the Act principally relied on in the argument were the twelfth, twenty-first, forty-fifth, fifty-second, sixty-first, and seventy-first.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Boteler, and Mr. Eagle, for the Plaintiffs, after discussing the question upon the evidence, proceeded to contend, as to the second point, that the Tithe Commutation Act was not intended, and did not in fact, bind the rights of the Plaintiffs, other than as between the tithe-owners and the landowners, except only in instances where questions had arisen which hindered the Commissioners making an award, and which had been "heard and determined" by them under the forty-fifth section of the Act. That here there had been a mistake as to the Plaintiffs' rights, and no question had ever arisen or been determined between the Plaintiffs and the Defendant.

[25] That the seventy-first section preserved to all persons having any interest in land subject to any tithes, or any charge or incumbrance on the tithes, their rights as to the substituted rent charge, and the Plaintiffs, in no way repudiating the commutation as between the "tithe-owner" and the "landowner," had a right to the jurisdiction of this Court to fix upon the rent charge an equity, which, through a mistake, the agreement had deprived them of.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. E. Montague, for the Defendant the rector, after dealing with the first question, contended, as to the second question, that this Court had no jurisdiction to alter or modify the agreement confirmed under the seal of the Tithe Commissioners; that the Act made the award final, and precluded any such interference.

The forty-fifth section enacts, "That if any suit shall be pending touching the right to any tithes, or if there shall be any question as to the existence of any modus or composition real, or prescriptive or customary payment, or any claim of exemption from, or non-liability, under any circumstances, to the payment of any tithes, in respect of any lands, or any kind of produce, or touching the situation or boundaries of any lands, or if any difference shall arise, whereby the making of any such award by the Commissioners or Assistant Commissioner shall be hindered, it shall be lawful for the Commissioners or Assistant Commissioner to appoint a time and place in or near the parish, for hearing and determining the same; and the decision of the Commissioners or Assistant Commissioner shall be final and conclusive on all persons subject to the provisions hereinafter contained."

(1) The 6 & 7 W. 4, c. 71, amended, &c., by the 7 W. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 69, the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 64, the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 62, and the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 54.

[526] The fifty-second section provides for the confirmation of the award, and proceeds, "and every such confirmed award shall be binding on all persons interested in the said lands or tithes."

The sixty-sixth section is positive, it provides, "That no confirmed agreement, award, or apportionment shall be impeached after the confirmation thereof, by reason of any mistake or informality therein, or in any proceeding relating thereunto."

They argued that the Act, therefore, made the award final, and that it could not be impeached "by reason of any mistake."

That the Plaintiffs claimed wholly by a title adverse to that of the Defendants, and that the case was not like one between a trustee and his cestui que trust.

Mr. Turner and Mr. P. L. Foster, for the Bishop of Norwich.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply. There is a marked difference between the rights of tithe-owners as amongst each other, and as against the tithe-payers. The Legislature never could have intended to defeat the rights of third parties where they were brought under the consideration of the Tithe Commissioners. By the seventh section two-thirds of the "landowners," and the tithe-owner may bind the party, and the term "tithe-owner" is explained by the interpretation clause (s. 12) to be "the party in actual possession," except, &c., "without regard to the real amount of interest," so that a party in possession with or without title is to be the assenting party to the commutation agreement. Could it have been intended that a mortgagor or trustee, or a tenant in common, or any other person having a limited interest, or party having no title at [527] all, being in possession, was to be enabled to obtain title as against the mortgagor, the cestui que trust, or the person rightfully and equitably entitled? Such could not have been the case, and the seventy-first section shews the contrary.

Hill v. Reardon (2 S. & St. 431, Jac. 84, and 2 Russ. 608) and Lloyd v. Trimbleston (4 Sim. 296) were cited.

July 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiffs in this cause, being devisees under the will of Thomas Young deceased, claim to have been entitled to a moiety of the corn tithes arising in the parish of Necton; and as the rectory charge having, under the Tithe Commutation Act, been commuted for the redemption of the tithes, they have filed this bill against the rector of the parish and the Bishop of Norwich, praying that they may be declared to be entitled, in respect of their share of a moiety of the corn tithes, to a reasonable proportion of the annual rent charge; that in order to ascertain such proportion, the same annual rent charge may be apportioned between the Plaintiffs' lay moiety of corn tithes and the tithes belonging to the rectory, according to their respective values, and that the Plaintiffs' right to such proportion may be established and various accounts taken.

The Rev. Thomas Young, under whom the Plaintiffs claim to be entitled, was about forty-three years immediately preceding the time of his death, the rector of the rectory and parish church of Necton, which is a spiritual and presentative benefice, and was, for about twenty-eight years before his death, entitled in fee-[528] to the advowson of the same rectory, and the Plaintiffs allege, that he was entitled in fee-simple, as impropiator or portionist, of or to a portion of lay tithes arising within the same parish, consisting of a moiety of all the tithes of corn arising within the parish and the titheable places thereof. Thomas Young died on the 23d of September 1837, having made a will, whereby he devised all his interest in the great tithes of Necton, and his advowson to his brother William Young for life, with remainder, in case his said brother should die without issue, to the Plaintiffs, on trust to sell.

William Young, being of unsound mind, could not exercise his right of presentation, and the right having lapsed to the bishop of the diocese, the Defendant William Yonge was, on the 27th of March 1838, collated to the rectory, and soon afterwards (on the 3d of April), inducted into the same, and those who acted for the patron as well as for the Defendant William Yonge being unaware, or not noticing, that Thomas Young, and under his will William Young his brother, had any claim to a portion of tithes, the Defendant William Yonge was permitted to receive the whole of the tithes arising within the parish.

In the year 1839 meetings were held in the parish of Necton, for the purpose of making an agreement under the Tithe Commutation Act, and an agreement having been made, on the 3d of April 1839, between the landowners and the Defendant, the incumbent, as tithe-owner, Mr. Kitson was appointed by the Commissioners to act as substitute for the patron who was a lunatic, but before the transaction was completed, and on the 9th of February 1840, the patron died. Thereupon, the devise to the Plaintiffs took effect, and [529] soon afterwards, that is in March 1840, the Plaintiffs, as owners of the advowson, were applied to for their consent to the agreement, whereby a rent charge was substituted in lieu of the tithes payable to the rector.

The agreement was made between the owners of the lands in the parish, and the defendant, who was described to be the rector and the owner of all the tithes of the parish as well great as small, and it was agreed, that the annual sum of £905, by way of rent charge, should be paid to the Defendant as rector and to his successors, instead of all the tithes of the parish. On the 26th of March 1840 the Plaintiffs, as patrons of the rectory, certified their consent to the agreement, and soon afterwards, the agreement was duly confirmed by the Tithe Commissioners. The rent charge was then apportioned among the lands of the parish, the apportionment was confirmed, and thus the tithes were commuted under the authority of the Act.

Throughout the whole of this proceeding, the Defendant, as rector, was considered and dealt with as owner of all the tithes of the parish; any right or claim of the estate of Thomas Young to a portion of the tithes was entirely overlooked. But some time afterwards, and in December 1840, the Plaintiffs, having occasion to investigate the title of Thomas Young to the advowson, discovered, as they say, that he was entitled to a moiety of the corn tithes, and the Defendant William Young having refused to make any allowance in respect thereof, this bill was filed in March 1841. The Defendant scarcely denies that there was a portion of tithes distinct from the rectory, but he alleges, that if there was any such portion, and, if Thomas Young was entitled to it, there is no evidence what the portion was, and that the Plaintiffs, being unable to make out by [530] evidence what the portion to which they claim title consisted of, ought not to be allowed to receive anything in respect of it. He further contends, that even if the Plaintiffs had made out a title to a moiety of the corn tithes as a matter of fact, they are nevertheless entitled to no relief, the statute precluding any claim of adverse title.

The first question in the cause is, whether Thomas Young was entitled to the moiety of corn tithes which is claimed by the bill. The Plaintiffs say, that the portion of tithes in question was, at the time of the dissolution of the late Priory or Monastery of Westacre, parcel of the possessions thereof, and upon such dissolution, came into the possession of the Crown, and was afterwards duly granted by the Crown as a lay rectory, and by divers means conveyances, became and was vested in Thomas Young, and they think, that upon the evidence, it is proved, that at a very early period, the Priory of Westacre was entitled to a portion of tithes issuing out of the Rectory of Necton. In the taxation of Pope Nicholas, under the head "Necton," the portion of the Prior of Westacre in the same is stated to be five marks. In the document which is called the Norwich Doomsday Book, the portion of the Prior of Westacre is again stated to be five marks. In the Valor Ecclesiasticus of the 26 Hen. 8, in stating the worth of the possessions of the monastery or priory of canons at Westacre, the farm of five sheaves in Necton is stated to be 53s. 4d. annually. In the minister's account of the 31 Hen. 8, there is the account of Robert Hogan, occupier in Necton, and under the head "portion" it is said, "But he accounts for 53s. 4d. for the farm of a certain portion of tithes of Necton aforesaid, issuing out of the rectory there, so occupied by the aforesaid Robert Hogan this year." In the 35th year of Hen. 8, the 1st of November, the king granted to Robert Hogan in fee, amongst other things "All that [531] portion of tithes issuing from and out of the Rectory of Necton, in the tenure or occupation of the said Robert Hogan, and lately belonging to the Monastery or Priory of Westacre;" and the same portion is, in the grant mentioned to be extended at the clear annual sum of 53s. 4d., and this grant is alluded to in the minister's account in the same year. I think, therefore, that there is sufficient evidence, that a portion of tithes issuing out of the Rectory of Necton was parcel of the possessions of the Monastery of Westacre when it was dissolved, and upon the dissolution of the monastery came to the hands of the Crown, and was by the Crown granted as a lay fee to Robert Hogan, and from the description in the Visitation of Ecclesiastics, I think that the portion consisted of tithes of titheable sheaves. The title to a portion of the tithes of sheaves being traced to Robert Hogan in the year of Hen. 8, the subsequent title seems to me, independently of the question as to what the portion consisted of, to be sufficiently deduced to the testator Thomas Young; and it is to be considered, whether it sufficiently appears what was the portion to which he was entitled.

In the document called the Norwich Domesday Book, to which I have before referred, it is stated, that the Rector of Necton had twenty-six acres of land with a manse, and that the vicar had a manse without any land. The estimation of the portion and vicarage tithe, twenty-six marks; the estimation of the vicarage of the same, five marks; the portion of the Prior of Westacre in the same, five marks. A comparison between the state of the rectory as shewn by this document and the state as subsisting in subsequent times, shews that very great changes have taken place; the history of those changes is not shewn, and no light is thrown on the subject till comparatively recent times.

[532] It appears from rate books of the parish, that in and for several years before the year 1717, the rectory, the portion, and the vicarage were rated equally, and that they continued to be so rated for many years afterwards. In December 1717 John Rolfe, the vicar, purchased the advowson and the portion. The portion was conveyed to him under the description of "all that portion of tithes issuing going out of the Rectory of Necton, to the late dissolved Monastery of Westacre, at that time belonging." William Delke was at that time rector of the parish. And under these circumstances Mr. Rolfe being patron, vicar, and owner of the portion, desirous, that when an opportunity offered, the vicarage should be reunited to the rectory, and on the 1st of January 1718 he granted the next presentation to the rectory and vicarage to Henry Wastell, who in that way became patron; and in the month of February 1718 a petition was presented to the Bishop of Norwich by Henry Wastell, stating himself to be patron of both Rectory and Vicarage of Necton, John Rolfe, stating himself to be vicar there, representing that the glebe, tithes, and profits belonging to the Church of Necton had been, from time immemorial, divided into three small parts or portions, and were claimed and enjoyed under three distinct titles, viz., first, a portion consisting of about half the corn tithes within the parish which formerly belonged to the Prior of Westacre, and since the dissolution of the monastery have been granted from the Crown into lay hands. Second, a representative, consisting of the remainder of the corn tithes arising within the parish which had been esteemed and taken for a benefice without cure, and the rector having no house or glebe have been generally non-resident, and have thrown their ministerial duties upon the possessor or incumbent of the [533] third part or portion of the church styled the vicarage, and praying that, by reason of the smallness of the provision for the incumbent, the vicarage might be dissolved and restored to the rectory. The truth of the statement made in the petition appears to have been attested by six clergymen, and several other persons living in the neighbourhood. In consequence of this petition, and on the 10th of July 1718, it was ordered by the bishop, as ordinary of the parish, that after the death or resignation of John Rolfe, the then present vicar, the clerk that should be instituted into the Rectory of Necton on the presentation of the lawful patron, or in case of lapse, upon the collation of the bishop or presentation of the Crown, should be both rector and vicar; and should have not only the tithes of corn and grain belonging to the presentative rectory, to the glebe tithes and profits belonging to the vicarage, which vicarage was thereby consolidated with the rectory. Very soon afterwards Mr. Delke the rector died, and on his death, and on the presentation of Henry Wastell, Mr. Rolfe was instituted to the rectory.

We see, therefore, that the rectory and the portion were equally rated in the parish books, that the vicar, having become the owner of the portion and of the advowson of the rectory and vicarage, in a proceeding before the Ordinary in which was necessary to state the condition of the rectory and the vicarage, represented a portion to consist of about a moiety of the corn tithes, and the rectory to consist the remainder of the corn tithes, and upon that and the other statements in the petition, procured from the Ordinary an order for the consolidation of the rectory and a vicarage, and subsequently procured himself to be instituted into the rectory.

[534] Mr. Rolfe, being now incumbent of the consolidated rectory and vicarage, and being owner of the advowson and of the portion, in the month of August 1720, sold the advowson and portion to Benjamin Young, and in the conveyance the property conveyed is described, as "the advowson and also all that impropriation, being one moiety or half part of all that portion of tithes issuing and going out of the rectory of Necton, to the then late dissolved Monastery of Westacre sometime long, and all the tithes to the rectory impropriation or portion of tithes long, to hold the advowson, portion of tithes and premises to Benjamin Young in fee." In a subsequent deed, executed by Benjamin Young on the 10th of September 1723, the portion is described, as "all that impropriation, being one moiety or half part of the great tithes issuing or going out of the Rectory of Necton;" and the advowson and portion were afterwards, on the 16th of March 1735, limited to the use of Benjamin Young and Mary his wife, with remainder to the use of their youngest son William Young in fee.

Mr. Rolfe, the rector, lived till 1749, and upon the vacancy occasioned by his death, and on the presentation of Mary Young, Thomas Patrick Young was instituted to the rectory. He, by some means not stated, became patron for the next turn, and having resigned the incumbency, William Young was, on his presentation, instituted to the rectory on the 7th of October 1752. It is not shewn when William Young succeeded to the advowson and portion, but William Young and Ann, his wife, appear to have executed deeds, dated the 15th and 16th of January 1788, whereby the advowson and portion of tithes were limited, after the deaths of William Young and Ann, his wife, to Thomas Young in fee. In those last deeds the portion is described "the im-[535]propriation of Necton aforesaid, or portion of the tithes issuing and going out of the rectory to the late dissolved Monastery of Westacre sometime appertaining." The portion is not described as a moiety of the great tithes or corn tithes.

William Young, who became owner of the advowson and portion, continued to be rector from the year 1752 to the year 1794; and Thomas Young, who became owner of the advowson and portion in 1809, continued to be rector from the year 1794 to the year 1837; and under such circumstances, it could scarcely be expected to find evidence of usage to shew the relative rights of the rector and of the portionist. There were, indeed, intervals, when the rector was not owner of the portion, namely, a short time during the incumbency of Thomas Patrick Young, some time during the incumbency of William Young, when his mother was, or may have been owner of the portion; but from the relation between the parties and the circumstances of the case, direct evidence of payments and receipts could not reasonably be expected, and it is very improbable that there should have been a separate collection of tithes by the rector and the portionist.

For twenty-eight years before his death, Thomas Young was both rector and portionist, and claimed all the tithes in those two characters. Some of the occupiers having set up modus, he filed a bill against them for the recovery of tithes, and stated his title as rector and as impropriator of a portion, alleging that the portion consisted of a moiety or thereabouts of the tithes of corn, and also, that before the dissolution, the vicar had become entitled to all the tithes, except the tithes of corn, and that the tithes of corn belonged to the rector and to the portionist in moieties; and on the 28th of [536] June 1824 he obtained a decree for the tithes as claimed by his bill. Some accounts and books were tendered in evidence by the Plaintiffs, and objected to by the Defendant. I allowed the entries to be read de bene esse, without determining whether they were strictly admissible; and on consideration of the other evidence, I do not think it necessary to decide the point.

It being, I think, established, that Thomas Young was entitled to a portion of the tithes of corn issuing out of the rectory, it appears to me evident, from the circumstances which I have stated, that the portion was a moiety. No other supposition consistent with the equal rating, the statement in the petition of 1718, and the conveyances of 1720 and 1723. In the petition, indeed, the portion is called a moiety, but the rating long before and long afterwards leads to the conclusion of equality of value; and notwithstanding the comments made on the deed of Aug. 1720, and which are very naturally suggested by the ambiguous expressions used, I am of opinion, that it can be rationally construed only as a description of a moiety of the rectoral or corn tithes; and there is nothing which affords the least reason for thinking that anything occurred to vary the rights of the rector and portionist, at any time after the deed of 1720; under these circumstances, I am of opinion, that Thomas Young in his lifetime was, and that the Plaintiffs under his will and upon the death of William Young, the lunatic, became entitled to a moiety of the corn tithes arising in this parish.

The Plaintiffs consented to the commutation, and the next question is, whether, by so doing, they lost all remedy. The Tithe Commutation Act (6 & 7 W. 4, c. 36), empowered the Commissioners to fix a rent charge upon the lands in lieu of tithes, and to apportion the rent charge among the lands subject to tithes, thereupon to discharge the lands from the future payment of tithes, and as to all questions which came before them, their decision was, by the terms of the Act, final. No confirmed agreement, award or apportionment is to be impeached or set aside, by reason of any mistake or informality therein, or in any proceeding relating thereto. (Sect. 66.) But the provisions of the Act relate especially to questions between tithe-owners and landowners; and the Plaintiffs in this case cannot raise any question as between either themselves or the Defendant Mr. Yonge and the landowners, or attempt, in any way, to impeach the confirmed agreement, award, or apportionment, as between the tithe-owners and landowners. What is to be considered is, whether the Act precludes all question between tithe-owners in the circumstances of these parties.

At the time of the agreement, and before any steps were taken towards commutation, Mr. Yonge was, under the circumstances which have been stated, in actual possession or receipt of the profits of all the tithes of the parish, and therefore, for the purposes of the Act, designated the tithe-owner, without regard to the real amount of his interest. From this it would seem to be clear, that the Commissioners were at liberty to proceed in the exercise of their authority without any investigation of the title as between the adverse claims of tithe-owners in cases where one person was actually in the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of the tithes; and it is afterwards provided by the seventy-first section, that any person having any interest or claim to any tithes before the passing of the Act, shall have the same right to or claim on the rent [538] charge for which the same have been commuted; and having regard to these provisions, I think that it cannot have been intended to exclude from further investigation a case, in which there was, before the award, a just title to tithes, which by accident and mistake was not brought forward till after the award was made. The rector has, in fact, obtained that which was the right of the Plaintiffs, and which they could have obtained if they had claimed it. There was no error of the Commissioners, for the Plaintiffs made no claim before them, and the award, as between the tithe-owners and the tithe-payers, with regard to the amount of the rent charge to be paid is final.

The case is attended with considerable difficulty, but on the best consideration which I have been able to give to the Act, I think that the Plaintiffs are precluded from seeking to establish, in this Court, a claim to a portion of the rent charge commensurate with the proportionate value of their portion of tithes, which was a part of the consideration for which the rent charge was given. I therefore think it right to declare, that the Plaintiffs were, previously to the award of the Commissioners, entitled in fee to one moiety of the corn tithes payable within parish, and that they are now entitled to a share of the rent charge for which the whole tithes arising within the parish have been commuted, bearing such proportion to the whole rent charge, as the value of one moiety of the corn tithes, at the time of the commutation, bore to the value of all the tithes arising within the parish at the same time. Having regard to that declaration, refer it to the Master to ascertain what share of the said rent charge the Plaintiffs are entitled to, and let the Master take an account of the rent charge which has been received by the Defendant since the filing of the bill, and ascertain and state what [539] is due to the Plaintiffs for their share thereof. It appears to me that the Plaintiffs are not entitled to any further account.

There does not appear to be any foundation for the charge, that the Defendant had notice of the Plaintiffs' right before it was discovered by the Plaintiffs themselves, and the claim was actually made; and considering the circumstances under which the Defendant was put into possession of all the tithes and of the whole rent charge, I think that the Defendant was justified in requiring the claim to be established by a legal proceeding; and although it might have been wished that some of his means of defence had not been resorted to, yet, considering that the error and mistake was the Plaintiffs', that the necessity of coming here was entirely owing to their omission to look into their own title before they consented to the award, I am of opinion that they must pay the costs of this suit.

The Defendant, William Yonge, the rector, received the whole of the tithes from the time of his induction in April 1838, but never accounted to William Young, the appropriator, for his moiety of the corn tithes.

William Young died in February 1840.

The bill in the second suit of Young v. Yonge, was filed by the administrator of William Young to recover from the Defendant the value of the portion received by him in the lifetime of William Young, the lunatic.

The other circumstances sufficiently appear in the statement of the former case.

[540] Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Boteler, and Mr. Eagle, for the Plaintiff. William Young, the lunatic, and the Defendant were joint-tenants, and the Defendant, having received the whole tithe, is liable to account to William Young's executors. The scupier was not bound to divide the tithe, but merely to see it out. Stileman v. Homer (Litch, 228). "Debt sur 2 E. 6 per cinque parsons de Suitsom. Sont deux missionary priests, à les parishioners ont use per 40 ans de set out les several portions, mes ore de set out le Tithe generalment: si diens l'estatute; quia il lay out son Tithe ext, nient en severalty Adjournatur, per auter Report fuit adjudg, que parishioner nest lya a devide ceo en moyetyes: mes les parsons devidera enter eux memes," and the Defendant having taken more than his share, is accountable to the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Montague, contra. The Plaintiff ought to go against the scupier, who if he has paid to a wrong hand, was not discharged by the payment, and still remains liable. A party cannot come into equity to recover back tithes paid to a stranger claiming under an adverse title, and who is not a trustee. The Bishop of Exeter v. Asaph v. Williams (Jacob, 349); Drummond v. The Duke of St. Albans (5 Ves. 432); Allen v. Warren (6 Ves. 73); Edwards v. Morgan (M'Clelland, 554). If the Plaintiff had any right against the Defendant, it is by action at law, not by suit in equity. The parties could not have taken as joint-tenants, because their interests did not vest at the same time. Woodgate v. Unwin (4 Sim. 129).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said he was of opinion that this bill ought to be dismissed with costs.

[541] BOUTCHER v. BRANSCOMBE. Nov. 3, 10, 1842.

The 17th Order of August 1841 does not require a number to be fixed to each separate interrogatory, but merely that they shall be divided as conveniently as may be.

Where a Defendant is called on to answer an interrogatory of a specified number, he must answer all the succeeding questions, until he comes to the next number.

Where the interrogatories are not properly numbered, the Court will stay proceedings until the General Order has been complied with.

This was an application to take an amended bill off the file for irregularity, in not complying with the 17th Order of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 169.) That order directed "that the interrogatories contained in the interrogating part of the bill shall be divided as conveniently as may be, from each other, and numbered consecutively 1, 2, 3, &c., and the interrogatories which each Defendant is required to answer shall be specified in a note at the foot of the bill, in the form or to the effect following," &c.

The bill, in this case, was filed against a single Defendant, and was of considerable length. The questions in the interrogating part were very numerous, but were divided into ten numbers only. Each number comprised very many distinct interrogatories, and in one instance included about forty folios, and about sixty questions.

Mr. Kindersley, in support of the motion. The Plaintiff has not complied with the directions of the 17th Order. The interrogatories "are to be divided as conveniently as may be from each other, and numbered consecutively 1, 2, 3." These interrogatories have not been divided as conveniently as might be, and have not been numbered consecutively 1, 2, 3, &c., for one number covers a long series of interrogatories. This is an attempt to evade the order; a [542] Defendant has a right to be distinctly informed what interrogatories he is required to answer; but if one number be prefixed to ten distinct questions, how can he know whether it is merely the first, or the whole series which he is required to answer?

The proper mode of objecting is to move to take the bill off the file.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Pryor, contra. The Plaintiff has complied with the order, and done more, for there being a sole Defendant, he need not have numbered the interrogatories at all.

The object of the General Order must not be lost sight of. It was made in order to limit a Defendant's answer to those portions only of the interrogatories which related to him, and in order that his office copy might not comprise interrogatories which the Plaintiff did not require him to answer. Where there is one Defendant only, the reason does not apply, as the Plaintiff interrogates only that part which he desires to have answered. He requires from a sole Defendant an answer to every interrogatory.

If there has not been a compliance with the order, it would not be the proper course to take the bill off the file.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply. There was another object in making this order, which was this, that the Plaintiff, in taking exceptions, might by referring to the number prefixed, conveniently specify the portion to which his objection related. He may say the Defendant has not fully answered the tenth interrogatory, but his object would be defeated if sixty questions were comprised in the tenth interrogatory, nine-tenths of which might have been fully answered by the Defendant.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I shall enquire whether this point has occurred in any other branch of the Court. I must own, however, I was considerably surprised to find the way in which the case was put. It has been argued as if there was an order directing that every question should be separately and distinctly numbered; that the Plaintiff is not to be at liberty to insert in his interrogatories the word "whether," without having a corresponding number immediately preceding it. That is not the order. The order is that the interrogatories are to be divided "as conveniently as may be," and then numbered. What purpose was this to be done? Previously to these General Orders, a practice had arisen in drawing bills, to call upon each and every Defendant to answer all matters and interrogatories in the bill, whether such Defendants had or had not any interest in or knowledge of the subject of the allegations or interrogatories. The object no doubt of the order was to prevent that abuse, and to enable a Defendant to know distinctly what part of the bill he was required to answer. The order that he might be exempted from all charge of insufficiency when he paid regard to the interrogatories with which he was not concerned. That was the object of the 17th Order.

This is the case of a single Defendant. In words it may be included in the order, but I shall inquire whether this matter has been discussed or decided elsewhere, in order that there may be an uniform rule upon [544] the subject. I must, however, now declare my opinion, that there is no rule of the Court requiring the Plaintiff, in drawing his bill, to add a number to every sentence of the interrogating part which is preceded by the word "whether." The division is to be made in as convenient manner may be, for the purpose of enabling each Defendant to see what it is necessary for him to answer.

I think also that when a Defendant is called upon by the bill to answer an interrogatory of a specified number, such number must, of necessity, comprise all the questions which follow, until you come to the next number.

I am called upon to assume, that the Plaintiff has inserted interrogatories in his bill for no purpose whatever; and because some of them are not immediately preceded by a number, therefore no answer at all is to be put in to them, notwithstanding the Plaintiff has put those particular questions to this one Defendant.

I must say, whatever may be the ultimate decision, the proposition to take the bill as the file seems perfectly extravagant; all I could do would be, to stay the proceedings until the Plaintiff amended his interrogatories by inserting the numbers that ought to be required.

Nov. 10. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Upon inquiry, I do find that the 17th Order of the 26th of August 1841 has been brought under the consideration of any of the Judges.

The complaint is, that each question comprised in all the interrogatories to an amended bill against a single [545] Defendant has not been separately numbered. Questions being very numerous, they are divided from each other by only ten numbers, each number being followed by many interrogatories, which are not separately numbered or divided from each other by numbers; and the Defendant complains, that he does not know whether he ought or ought not to answer more than the single and distinct interrogatory which follows each number.

The order directs, that the interrogatories shall be divided as conveniently as may be from each other and numbered consecutively.

The purpose was plainly to make it incumbent upon the Plaintiff to distinguish the particular interrogatories were to be answered by each one of several Defendants.

The mode of securing that object is, to direct the interrogatories to be consecutively numbered in every case. The numbers afford easy and certain means of making the required distinction, and the direction to make them without exception involves little, if any, additional trouble or expense, and may contribute to secure the diligent observance of the order.

In the case of a single Defendant the reason for making a distinction amongst the interrogatories does not apply. The objection appears to me to be frivolous. All interrogatories are to be answered by the same person, whether they are separately numbered or not; but as the order directs a form of which the numbers are a part, the question is, whether the direction to divide the interrogatories as conveniently as may be from each other has been observed. The principle of Order [546] which has been adopted in this particular case has been to distinguish separate numbers the new interrogatories from those which are amendments of old interrogatories, and the application of it must be convenient to the Defendant.

I am of opinion that the directions contained in the orders have been sufficiently observed, and that neither the orders nor the purpose for which the orders were made, require the Plaintiff to number the interrogatories any otherwise than he has done.

This motion appears to me to be unreasonable and vexatious, and I therefore refuse it with costs.

[546] BENSON v. HADFIELD. Nov. 9, 15, 26, 1842.

The Plaintiffs appointed A., B., and C. their foreign agents; A. retired, and the Plaintiffs then appointed B., C., and D. agents. The transactions being separate. Held, that a bill for an account of the two agencies was multifarious as regards A.; but semble, if the dealings had not been separate, but a mere continuation, the decision would have been otherwise.

W. D. assigned an exclusive trading privilege to a trustee for a company in consideration of receiving one-fifth of the clear profits. The directors were to have the exclusive management of the affairs of the company. Held, that W. D. was not a necessary party to a suit respecting the dealings between the directors and a third party.

A demurrer on two grounds failed as to one and succeeded as to the other. Notes were given.

This case came before the Court upon general demurrer to the whole bill.

The bill was filed by the four directors of the Bahia Steam Navigation Company, and the substance of it was as follows:—

In February 1838 William Duff was entitled to the exclusive privilege of navigation of certain parts of [547] Bahia, for ten years, under a grant obtained from the Government of Brazil, and also to the benefit of certain navigation costs entered into with that Government.

In June 1838 the four Plaintiffs and other persons established a company, the purpose of carrying on a system of steam navigation in the bay and waters of the province of Bahia, and elsewhere along the coast of Brazil, and which was called "The Bahia Steam Navigation Company."

By an indenture dated in September 1838, Duff assigned all his interest in the contracts and privileges to a trustee for the company. Duff, as a consideration, to receive £3000 from the company from the instalments on the shares, and a share of the net profits after payment of the dividends and other expenses.

The deed of settlement, which recited the assignment from Duff, contained usual clauses that the directors should have the exclusive management of the affairs of the company.

In 1838 four of the Defendants, William Hadfield, Charles G. Hadfield, Antonio J. Armando, and Robert W. Wood, carried on the business of merchants both at Liverpool and Bahia, under the firm, at Liverpool, of Hadfield, Wood & Co., and at Bahia, of Armando, Hadfield & Wood.

In September 1838 the directors of the company agreed with the Liverpool firm that the Bahia firm should be the agents of the company there, with a commission for their services.

[548] In April 1840 Wood retired, and the other two Defendants, Jose M. Braga and Manoel P. Rozas became partners with Messrs. Hadfields & Armando, and these five Defendants carried on the business together, under the same firm. In September 1841, when Braga and Rozas retired. From that period the business was carried on by the two Hadfields and Armando, under the firm of Hadfield, Armando at Liverpool, and Armando, Hadfield & Co. at Bahia.

By a letter, dated the 12th of August 1841, the company determined the agents to be Armando, Hadfield & Co., who, however, acted until October 1841, when the agents of the company commenced acting. The former agents, however, refused to deliver the property of the company in their possession.

The bill stated transactions of business, by means of which the parties in question became indebted to the Plaintiffs; but it was not very clearly stated in the bill whether the agencies and dealings between the Plaintiffs and the several firms had been separate and distinct, or mere continuations of the original arrangements. The Court, however (see 5 Beav. 554) (taking the statements most against the plaintiffs) held them separate, and it is therefore not necessary to detail the circumstances affecting that point.

The bill was filed against Wood and the other partners, and charged, that Defendants ought to account for what they or any of them had received since their agency was determined. It prayed an account of all the dealings and transactions between the said Defendants, or any of them, as constituting the said firms of [549] Armando, Hadfields & Wood, and Armando, Hadfields & Co., as agents of the Bahia Navigation Company, and all sums of money possessed and received by the said Defendants respectively, or by any of them, &c.

The Defendant Wood put in a demurrer to this bill upon two grounds: 1st, for multifariousness; and, 2dly, because Mr. Duff had not been made a party.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lewis, in support of the demurrer. This bill is multifarious. It seeks to have the accounts taken between the Plaintiffs and three distinct firms. Two agencies with different parties cannot be comprised in one bill, for the Defendants have no common interest; here, Wood has no interest whatever in the transactions which took place after his retirement in April 1840, between the Plaintiffs and the other Defendants.

Secondly, Duff is a necessary party: for though the directors may represent the company, they do not represent Duff, who has a material interest in the accounts to be taken in this suit.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. Piggott, contra. The rule of pleading as multifariousness does not require that every Defendant shall be interested in every part of the relief. In Campbell v. Mackay (1 Myl. & Cr. 603), A. and B. were trustees under one deed, C. and D. under a second, and A., B., and C. were trustees under a will. It was held that a bill, by the children entitled under the three instruments, against A., B., C., and D., for an account and administration of the property comprised in the two deeds and will was not multifarious.

It is always a question of convenience, and it would be most inconvenient to split up matters and make them the subject of three distinct suits. The agencies were distinct and separate appointments, but mere continuations of the first. It will be necessary, also, to ascertain what was due to the Plaintiffs at the dissolution of the firm, in order to see what is to be charged against the second, as from its commencement; so the balance handed over to the third can only be known by taking accounts of the second partnership. It is manifestly the most convenient, where other Defendants are interested in the whole accounts, to include the whole matter in one suit.

Duff was no party to the contract between the Plaintiffs and the Defendants; though entitled to a share in the clear profits, he is not a partner. To hold that he is a necessary party to this suit would be to lay down that he must be a party to litigation between the directors and every other person with whom they may have dealings.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

Nov. 26. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case came on for a demurrer to the bill, filed by the Defendant Wood. He objects to the bill on two grounds, first, because he says there are not proper parties to the bill, and next because the bill is multifarious.

[551] Upon the question of parties, it seems, that a person of the name of William Duff is entitled to a certain share of the profits arising from carrying on the concern: by the agreement between him and the persons by whom this company was carried on, the profits arising from the general transactions of the trade were to be divided in such a manner that Mr. William Duff had an interest in a portion of those profits.

Mr. Duff was not to interfere with the business of the concern, for, according to an arrangement between the parties, the business was to be carried on by the directors, and according to the terms of their agreement they were to deal in such manner as they thought fit; and in short they were at liberty to deal like any other persons with other persons for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company.

In carrying on the business of the concern, they entered into a particular contract with one of the firm or partnership in which the Defendant was a partner. The nature of that proceeding is set forth in this bill. The firm of Armando & Co. was to represent the company upon all occasions, to promote and protect its interest, to advise and assist the officers and clerks, and all persons in their employ, and to be under the control of them, under such limitations and instructions as should, from time to time, be transmitted by the directors; they were to distribute 2000 shares, reserved for the Brazils, amongst such persons as should be deemed most advantageous to the company; were to receive the deposits and instalments, and also to receive from the captains and superintendent the earnings of the vessels, and to remit all monies to the order of the directors. For these purposes they entered into particular contracts; and the question which arises here is simply this, whether the directors are to have an account of any of the dealings which they entered into with any persons in relation to the business [552], carried on, without Mr. Duff being a party to the account. It is said he has an interest in the profits. He has an interest in the ultimate general profits of the concern, but he has no interest in any particular transactions, otherwise than as they affect the general account on which the ultimate profits will be shewn. The proposition, however, is, that the directors of the company are to have no dealings with anybody, and no redress from this Court in respect of any dealings, unless they make party to the suit Mr. William Duff, who has contracted to give them the whole and sole management of the concern, the right to settle accounts and to carry on all the dealings of the concern. They are not, in short, to have any account from anybody in this Court without the participation of Mr. Duff. The argument must go further, and, on the other hand, the agents with whom the directors may have had any transactions are not to have a right to enforce their own contracts against the directors if such directors choose to object, that Mr. Duff is not a party. I am of opinion this Court has never gone such a length as to make it necessary for a person in the situation of Mr. Duff to be a party to a bill like the present. I think, therefore, that that part of the demurrer fails.

With respect to the other ground of demurrer, the case stands thus: a certain firm established at Bahia, became in the month of November 1838 the agents for the company. That firm consisted of four persons, William Hadfield, Robert Wood, Charles Hadfield, and Anthony Armando, and they continued to be the agents until the 25th of April 1840. Upon that day, Mr. Wood, who is here the demurring party, ceased to be a partner in that firm, and two other persons, named Braga and Rozas, then became partners. After the 25th of April 1840 the partners constituting the new [553] firm acted as agents, and they continued to do so until, I think, the month of October 1841, new agents having been appointed by the Plaintiffs by the letter of August 1841, who began to act in the month of October 1841. There was between August and October another change in the partnership firm of those agents, for on the 8th of September 1841 Braga and Rozas ceased to be partners.

Now considering the nature of this agency, as set forth in the bill, there is, as it appears to me, a very great probability that the agency transactions which had been commenced whilst the partnership was constituted in one particular mode, were, as to many of them, continued, from time to time, during the whole series of the dealings. And I can very well conceive a case properly stated, in which it would be quite necessary, and it may ultimately be quite necessary in this case, to continue any person who was a partner in one of these agency firms, a party to this cause by which these accounts are to be taken. The continuing partners, it is plain, have treated it as a matter of that sort, for from the statement of the bill, one account was rendered of the transactions that took place from November 1838 to the beginning of July 1839: that was agreed to be right by all parties, and must have been right, because during that time, no alteration took place in the firm; but after the alteration had taken place in the firm, and in the month of July 1841, there was an account rendered by Armando, who was a partner in both firms, though constituted of different sets of partners, which continued the transactions, as I understand the statement in this bill, from the beginning of July 1839 until the month of May 1841; that is, continuing it on through the time when the change had taken place in the month of April 1840. It seems to me therefore [554] probable, that there was such a continuation of transactions as would make it proper to have all these persons parties, and it was strongly argued to be so on the face of the bill.

At the time the demurrer was argued, I certainly had some considerable doubt with respect to the frame of the bill, how far it contained such allegations as appeared to render it necessary to continue as parties to the suit the different persons parties to the transactions. I have read the bill carefully for that purpose, and I think it does not maintain such allegations; on the contrary I think the allegations (which ought to be taken strongly against the pleader) such, that if they were sustained, would shew that there was a separate dealing with one firm up to the 25th of April 1840, and a distinct dealing with the other after that time. The bill certainly does seek to charge all the parties, and among them Mr. Wood, with the separate transactions which commenced subsequently to the time when he ceased to be a partner. That being the nature of the allegations, I think, as regards Mr. Wood, it is multifarious as it now stands, and must allow the demurrer for multifariousness, giving to the Plaintiffs leave to amend.

The question of costs (Ord. Can. 17) having been mentioned, THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that as one of the grounds of the demurrer had succeeded while the other had failed, he should give no costs. (Davis v. Reid, 5 Sim. 443.)

[555] BODDINGTON v. WOODLEY. (Ex relatione.) Nov. 11, 1842.

An officer having half-pay amounting to £150 a year (which is not alienable) will not be allowed to proceed in formâ pauperis, and that notwithstanding he has taken the benefit of the Insolvent Act.

This was a motion to dispauper the Defendant. It appeared that the Defendant was a commander in the Navy, and entitled to half-pay, amounting to £150 a year. He was now, and had been since February 1841, a prisoner in the Fleet, and there were several attachments issued against him for sums amounting altogether to about £100. Being desirous of taking the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, a vesting order of his estate and effects had been made on the 5th of June 1841. On the 2d of July his schedule was filed. It also appeared that since the Defendant had been in the Fleet, he had received from friends several hundred pounds as donations. He had a wife and seven children.

On the 5th of September 1842 the Defendant obtained an order to defend this in formâ pauperis, upon the usual affidavit that he was not worth £5 after payment of his just debts, his wearing apparel and the matters in question in the cause only excepted.

The Plaintiff now moved that the order of the 5th of September 1842 might be discharged.

Mr. Elderton, in support of the motion. The Defendant is still entitled to his half-pay, of which he cannot by charge or assignment deprive himself: being in possession and receipt of this income, he ought not to be permitted to defend in formâ pauperis.

[556] Mr. Torriano, contra. The 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 gives to the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors a power, with the consent of the Admiralty, to take an insolvent's half-pay, or part of it, to satisfy his creditors, and therefore the half-pay to which this Defendant is entitled is not at his own disposal, and his affidavit in which he stated that he was not worth £5 is strictly true. He cited from Whitelock v. Baker (13 Ves. 321) an expression of Lord Eldon as to dispaupering the Plaintiff: "The Court says so, and I hope always will be, tender upon that." Romilly v. Grint (2 Beav. 125) was also cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] (without hearing a reply) said, this was a very distressing case, and there are circumstances which the Plaintiff might properly take into consideration: but what I have to consider is, whether an officer receiving half-pay is justified in making an affidavit that he is not worth £5. I am of opinion that he is not, because half-pay is given without power to dispose of it, in order to enable him, whenever the Government may call upon him, to be prepared to go to his country. The Admiralty may, it is true, apply a portion of his half-pay to satisfy the creditors under his insolvency; but it would not be consistent with the policy of the Admiralty to deprive him of his half-pay to such an extent as to enable him to say that he is not worth £5. The case seems very distressing, but I must discharge the order with costs.

[557] STURCH v. YOUNG. Nov. 25, 1842.

A mortgagee having the legal estate is not entitled to a receiver appointed by the Court, although the tenants may be numerous, and the rents difficult to collect. Where a notice of motion embraces two objects, and the principal one fails, the part moving must pay the costs of the motion.

This was a motion on behalf of the Plaintiff for the production of documents, and for a receiver. It was stated that the Plaintiff was a mortgagee, having the legal estate vested in him, and the grounds on which the receiver was asked were, that the tenants were very numerous, and that there was a difficulty in collecting the rents.

Mr. Renshaw, for the Plaintiff, argued, that under these circumstances, a mortgagee, if he took possession, would be entitled to appoint a receiver, and charge the expenses against the mortgagor, and that, therefore, it would be more satisfactory to have the security of a receiver appointed under the Court.

Mr. Pemberton, for Mrs. Young, who was entitled to an annuity subject to the charge, did not oppose.

Mr. Younge, contra. I do not resist the production of the documents, but as to the other part of the motion, a legal mortgagee has no right to come here for a receiver. He is at liberty, if he pleases, to take possession.

(THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I think you are right on that point.)

Then the Plaintiff, having joined two objects in his notice of motion, and having failed in the principal one, ought to pay the costs of the application.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], on that ground, thought the Plaintiff ought to pay the costs. (1)

[558] BYNG v. LORD STRAFFORD. Nov. 19, 21, 22, 23, 1842; Jan. 12, 1843.

[S. C. 12 L. J. Ch. 169; affirmed on appeal, sub nom. Hoare v. Byng, 10 Cl. & F. 508; 8 E. R. 835; 8 Jur. 563. See In re Percy, 1883, 24 Ch. D. 616.]

A testator gave his personal and landed estates to A. for life, and afterwards to B. for life, and then to the eldest son of C., and afterwards to his second, third, or later sons he might have by D., and then to the eldest son and other sons successively of E.; but all these to be subject to the outpayments and legacies following. The testator declared, "that if the legacies and conditions of his will were not complied with exactly, then he left all the advantages of it to the next person in succession, subject to those legacies, and so on, unless they were discharged." He gave many legacies and annuities by thirteen codicils, which, if not paid, the persons who were to inherit his personal estate were to be subject to the penalties in his will, and his personal estate was to go to the next he had entailed it on. C. had several sons. Held, that subject to the prior life-estates, the eldest son of C. took the personal estate absolutely.

It is the duty of the Court to give effect to the intention of testators, as far as the rules of law will permit; but if a testator uses words, which by their plain import give an absolute estate, the circumstance of his giving the same absolute estate to a succession of legatees, in a manner incompatible and inconsistent with the enjoyment of the property plainly given to the first, will not authorise the Court to alter the effect of the words by which that property is given.

The first legatee of a quasi estate tail in personality takes the absolute interest notwithstanding a manifest and avowed intention to give a succession of limited interests.

(1) See Bonithon v. Hockmore, 1 Vern. 316; Godfrey v. Watson, 3 Atk. 518; Dunlop v. Duncanson, 3 Mad. 170; Berney v. Sewell, 1 Jac. & W. 647.

an absolute interest be given upon an express condition, which may be lawful in itself but is incompatible with the free enjoyment of the property, the Court does not modify the absolute interest, for the purpose of giving effect to the condition, but declares the condition void for the purpose of supporting the absolute interest. Where the condition intended to be annexed to a gift is inconsistent with and repugnant to the gift itself, the condition is held to be wholly void.

a testator were to give all his real estate to A. in fee, and then to B. in fee, and afterwards to C. in fee, or to give all his personal estate to A., and then to B., and afterwards to C., there is no rule of construction authorising the Court to restrict the estate given to A. to a life interest for the purpose of giving effect to the gifts to B. and C.

has been established, that the words of a will must be construed with reference to the subject-matter, and that the same words, even in the same sentence, may have one effect in their application to real estate, and another effect in their application to personal estate.

The question in this case was, whether upon the true construction of the will and codicils of the testator, the Plaintiff George Byng was entitled to the residuary personal estate of the testator for life, or absolutely.

The Right Honourable William Earl of Strafford made his will dated the 25th of October 1774, which, so [559] far as is material, was as follows:—"I William Earl of Strafford find it necessary to make a new will instead of the last will made in 1759, by the death of many friends and relations, and the ingratitude and misbehaviour of others of them. I leave to my dear wife, Anne Countess of Strafford, all my personal estate whatsoever, except the furniture of Wentworth Castle, for her life, subject to the following outpayments and legacies. I also leave to my wife, Anne Countess of Strafford, all my houses, gardens, parks and woods, and all my landed estates for her life, and afterwards all my personal and landed estates to my eldest sister, Lady Anne Mollis, for her life, and then to the eldest son of George Byng, Esq., of Wrotham Park, and afterwards to his second, third, or any later sons he may have by my niece Anne, Mrs. Byng, and then to the eldest son, and other sons successively, of the Earl of Buckingham, by my niece Caroline. But all these to be subject to the following outpayments and legacies. I leave to my dear wife, Anne Countess of Strafford, the sum of £15,000, to dispose of for ever as she pleases," &c. &c. The testator then gave certain legacies and annuities for life, and proceeded as follows:—"If the legacies and annuities of this my will is not complied with exactly, then I leave all the advantages of it to the next person in succession, subject to these legacies and so on, unless they are discharged."

The testator appointed four executors "to that his last will, as they were so honest and able to see it justly executed."

The testator afterwards made thirteen codicils to his will.

[560] By the first codicil, after giving pecuniary legacies and annuities, he provided:—"If these legacies are not paid punctually, those that inherit my personal estate are subject to the penalties in my will."

By the second codicil, he gave some legacies and annuities, "to be paid on the same conditions as the other annuities he had left."

By the third codicil he appointed Lord Thurlow a trustee and executor, "as his wisdom's great abilities and integrity will make it give him little trouble, and secure me the fulfilling what I think is just and right;" and he gave further legacies and annuities, and proceeded:—"If these legacies are not exactly paid, those that have my personal estate are to be subject to the penalty in my will."

By the fourth codicil he gave an annuity to his coachman, and proceeded:—"I mean this legacy to be secured to him the same as the others I have left, and that my trustees and executors will see it performed."

By the sixth codicil he gave legacies, "to be faithfully paid under the same restraints as the others in my will and codicils."

By the seventh codicil he gave annuities and legacies, and proceeded:—"On failure of my heirs to my personal estate doing this, they are to be subject to the same penalties in my will for not paying the other legacies and annuities. I leave to Frederick William Wentworth, Esq., of Dorsetshire, the sum of £5000, and to Mrs. Wentworth his wife the sum of £2000. My heirs, on failure of this payment, to be subject to the penal-[561]-ties in my will: provided the said Frederick William Wentworth, Esq., never turns out or raises the rent, and lets them have leases of twenty-one years to any person that ever was my domestic servant, and has any farm belonging to my estate about Wentworth Castle or Wakefield in Yorkshire. On failure of this condition, his and his wife's legacy to be void."

By the eighth, he expressed himself as follows:—"I William Earl of Strafford write this codicil to be added to the other codicil of my last will, that I would have all the conditions and legacies in my will and codicils exactly executed as I have directed, with the penalty of any failure as I have directed." He then proceeded to give two pecuniary legacies, and devised a real estate.

By the ninth, he gave annuities and proceeded:—"My heir to be subject to all former penalties relating to my legacies, if these are not regularly paid."

By the tenth, he gave further legacies and annuities, and proceeded:—"These legacies to be exactly paid by whoever has my personal estate, or else my personal estate to go on the same conditions to the next I have entailed it to."

The twelfth, he commenced as follows:—"I add this codicil to my will, which is to be fulfilled by my heir to my personal estate, or else he is to forfeit to the next person I make my heir all I have left him," and he then proceeded to give further legacies and annuities.

The testator's wife died in 1785.

The testator died in 1791.

[562] George Byng of Wrotham Park, in the said will named, had four sons, namely, the Plaintiff, George Byng his eldest son, and John Byng, William Byng and Robert Byng, who were all living at the death of the testator.

Immediately after the testator's death a suit was instituted for the administration of his estate, and many proceedings were had therein, which it is not necessary to state. (See Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth, 7 Ves. 137.) The fund was brought into Court, and the interest was paid to Lady Anne Conolly for life.

Lady Anne Conolly died in 1797, and the dividends were thereupon ordered to be paid to the Plaintiff George Byng during his life, without prejudice to his claim to the capital.

In 1841 the Plaintiff filed his bill of revivor and supplement, praying a declaration that he was absolutely entitled to the clear residuary personal estate of the testator and which now consisted of about £375,000 consols remaining in Court.

The next of kin of the testator resisted the claim, contending that the seven persons to whom, in succession, the testator's personal estate had been bequeathed after the death of Lady Anne Conolly, were entitled only to life interests therein; and that subject to such life interests, the testator's personal estate was undisposed of by his will, and had devolved upon the testator's next of kin.

The cause now came on for hearing, together with a petition for payment of the fund to the Plaintiff.

[564] Jas. 12. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this cause, the question is whether the Plaintiff Mr. Byng is entitled, absolutely or for life only, to the residuary personal estate of the Earl of Strafford, who died in March 1791.

The estate was administered under a decree of the Court, and the right of Mr. Byng, to a life interest at least, being clear, an order, dated 2d July 1807, was made for the payment to him of the interest during his life. That order was, however, expressly made without prejudice to such claim as he might have to the capital; and the question as to his right to the capital being thus left open, is now, for the first time, brought on for adjudication.

The question depends upon the construction of the Earl of Strafford's will, which was dated the 25th day of October 1774, and was followed by thirteen codicils, the first of them dated on the 26th of January 1778, and the last on the 9th of January 1791, about two months before the testator's death.

All the instruments are inartificially expressed, and were probably drawn without professional advice or assistance.

The words "all my personal and landed estates," which in this will are employed to describe the subject of the gift, are sufficiently large to include the whole interest which the testator was entitled. He has, by using those words, indicated an intention to dispose of all that he had; and it further appears, that intending to dispose of his whole estate, real and personal, he also intended his legatees, the objects of his bounty, to enjoy his estate in succession.

[565] The first person intended to take was the countess, who died in the testator's lifetime. Certain absolute gifts were made to her, but that which, in effect, was the residuary estate, was given to her expressly for her life. The next person intended to take was Lady Anne Conolly, and the estate is also given to her expressly for her life.

Thus far the will provides distinctly a succession of life-estates, and it is plain, that when the testator clearly contemplated the gift of life interests, he understood that words were proper to be used for the purpose of giving effect to his intention.

But the will, being to this extent clear, proceeds in the manner which gives rise to the question raised in this cause.

The words immediately following the gift to "Lady Anne Conolly for her life" are, "and then to the eldest son of George Byng, Esquire, of Wrotham Park, and afterwards to his second, third, or any later sons he may have by my niece, Anne, late Byng, and then to the eldest son and other sons successively of the Earl of Buckinghamshire by my niece, Caroline. But all these to be subject to the following payments and legacies."

The Plaintiff is the eldest son of the George Byng named in this clause, and is therefore the first legatee in the order of succession here indicated.

The subject of the gift is the whole interest of the testator. There are no words directly limiting the extent of interest which the legatee is to take; but the testator had in view a succession of legatees or interests after the first in the series.

[566] Under these circumstances the Plaintiff claims to be entitled to the absolute interest in the personal estate. First, because the testator was disposing of his whole interest. Secondly, because the gift to the Plaintiff is not limited by the words "for life," or any equivalent words, and therefore should, according to the ordinary rule, be deemed to be absolute. Thirdly, because the interests given are charged with the payment of various gross sums of money and annuities. And, fourthly, because although the testator might contemplate an enjoyment by a succession of persons, yet, as he has used words which give the absolute interest to the first in the series of successors, whose interests are not limited, that first has a right to the absolute interest, if it be not perfectly clear, from the words of the gift or from other parts of his will and codicils, that a restriction was intended.

That the testator contemplated a succession of enjoyment by devolution of property appears from the will and several of the codicils; and for the next of kin, it has been argued, that for the purpose of giving effect to the intended succession, his will ought to be so construed, as in some manner to restrict the interest of Mr.

Byng, and those who were to succeed him. Some restriction, they say, must be put upon the words importing an absolute gift, and as there is no indication of any intention to create estates tail, the restriction must be to successive estates for life.

It is undoubtedly the duty of the Court to give effect to the intention of testator, as far as the rules of law will permit; but if a testator uses words, which by their plain import give an absolute estate, the circumstance of his giving the same absolute estate to a succession of legatees in a manner incompatible and inconsistent with [567] the property plainly given to the first, will not authorise the Court to alter the effect of the words by which that property is given.

The first legatee of a quasi estate tail in personalty has the absolute interest, notwithstanding a manifest and avowed intention to give a succession of limited interests. If an absolute interest be given upon an express condition, which may be lawful in itself but is incompatible with the free enjoyment of the property, the Court does not modify the absolute interest, for the purpose of giving effect to the condition, but declares the condition void, for the purpose of supporting the absolute interest. Where the condition intended to be annexed to a gift is inconsistent with, and repugnant to the gift itself, the condition is held to be wholly void. Bradley v. Peizoto (3 Ves. 324); Ross v. Ross (1 Jac. & W. 154).

If a testator devise to one in fee, and if he dies without any heir to a stranger in fee, this is said to be an attempt to mount a fee upon a fee, and the devise over is void in law. Tilbury v. Barbut (3 Atk. 617).

And if a testator were to give all his real estate to A. in fee, and then to B. in fee, and afterwards to C. in fee, or to give all his personal estate to A., and then to B., and afterwards to C., there is no rule of construction authorising the Court to restrict the estate given to A. to a life interest, for the purpose of giving effect to the gifts to B. and C.

The construction, which, in cases of this kind, disregards the gifts over or the intended succession, is always [568] open to objection in argument, on the ground that the words of limitation over are rejected, and the answer to the objection is (Pickering v. Tower, 1 Eden. 142), that the words are not rejected against the rule that every word in a will shall, if possible, have a meaning, but because the testator has attempted to do what the law will not permit, or has made dispositions of property which are inconsistent with each other.

It has further been contended, for the next of kin, that the testator intended the real and personal estates to go together, that the words are not sufficient to give the inheritance of the real estate to Mr. Byng, and that consequently the personal estate intended to go with the real estate, was not intended to belong to Mr. Byng absolutely.

I conceive, indeed, that in the endeavour to discover the intention, it is necessary to look at all the dispositions he has made by his will, and to consider the effect of them, and that the circumstance of his giving the real and personal estates together and intending them to go together, is not to be disregarded. But it has been established, that the words of a will must be construed with reference to the subject matter, and that the same words, even in the same sentence, may have one effect in their application to real estate, and another effect in their application to personal estate; and upon this occasion, I cannot presume, either that the inheritance of the real estate did not pass to Mr. Byng, or that if it did not, he would be excluded from the absolute interest in the personal estate.

Another argument urged for the next of kin is, that the words "afterwards" and "then" must be con-[569]-strued to mean "after the life," or "upon the death" of the immediately preceding legatee. For this argument no authority was produced, and I think that the more natural meaning, and that which is most consonant to the context of the will is:—"after or upon the determination of the interest" given to the legatee just before named.

The testator had given all his personal estate and all his landed estates to his wife for life, and afterwards to Lady Anne Conolly for her life, and then to Mr. Byng, and so on. On these occasions the words "afterwards" and "then" follow immediately after the words "for life," and the testator, in using the words "afterwards" and "then," cannot have supposed that the words themselves implied that the immediately preceding gift was the gift of a life interest only, for if he had done so, he need not we added the words "for her life" to the gifts to the countess and Lady Anne only; and when he proceeds, in continuation of the same sentence, to make a gift to the eldest son of George Byng, and afterwards to his second, third, or any later son he may have, and then to another, it can hardly be held, that the words "afterwards" and "then" were considered by the testator to have a different effect, but to have, of themselves, sufficient force to limit the interest given to the eldest son to a mere life interest.

The gift of a series of successive interests is however principally relied upon by the next of kin, to shew that the testator cannot be understood to have given all to George Byng, because he has actually expressed an intention to give an estate to others in succession to Mr. Byng; but to this in addition to the argument before adverted to, that a limitation over [570] annexed to an absolute gift is void, it is answered, in this case, from the general scope and effect of the will and codicils, it appears, that the testator intended to subject the gift of his estate to a personal condition on the legatee to pay the charges to which the estate was made liable, and that he has created successive interests, for the purpose of enforcing that condition.

It appears from the provisions contained in the will and codicils, that the testator, notwithstanding his having appointed executors "whom he considered honest and to see his will justly executed," and notwithstanding his having by the third will of the 18th of March 1782, appointed Lord Thurlow executor, with a view to shew to the testator himself "the fulfilling what he thought just and right," nevertheless intended, in some way, to subject his residuary legatees, or some of them, to an obligation to pay the charges and legacies, which were, by his will and codicils, directed to be paid:—to impose such obligation as a condition upon the enjoyment of the gift, and to visit the non-performance of the condition with a penalty or forfeiture. In the will he says, "If the legacies and conditions of this my will is not complied with exactly, then I leave all the advantages of it to the next person in succession, and so on, unless they are discharged." In the first codicil, having given certain legacies, he adds, "If the legacies are not paid punctually, those that inherit my personal estate are subject to the penalties in my will." By the second codicil, he gives several annuities, each of them to be paid "on the same conditions as the other legacies he had left." In the third codicil, after giving legacies, he adds, "If these legacies are not exactly paid, those that have my personal estate are to be subject to the penalty in my will." By the fourth codicil, he gives one legacy, and adds, "I direct this [571] legacy to be secured the same as the others I have left, and that my executors and executors will see it performed." By the sixth codicil, he directs the legacies thereby given to be faithfully paid, under the same restraints as the others in his will and codicils. In the seventh codicil, he has not less than three times directed, that in failure of payment of legacies and annuities, his heirs or his heirs of the personal estate are to be subject to the penalties in his will, or to the penalties as they are to be subject to in not paying his other legacies and annuities. And in the eighth, ninth, tenth, twelfth and thirteenth codicils are like provisions referring to conditions, penalties, or forfeiture imposed by the will, or to the penalties as his heir was subjected by the will. In the tenth codicil the expression is, "the legacies to be exactly paid by whoever has my personal estate, or else my personal estate to go on the same conditions to the next." All these expressions tend to shew, that in the testator's view or intention, the general or residuary legatee of the personal estate, was to have the personal estate, and was to be subjected to loss of annuities and legacies were not duly paid, and they therefore tend to shew, that in the testator's view and intention, the general or residuary legatee was to have the means of paying, or, in other words, was to have for his own use, subject to the payment, the estate out of which the payment was to be made.

It was argued, that these provisions for penalty or forfeiture were not meant to have any substantial effect; that the testator must have well known that it was the duty of the executors to secure payment of the legacies and annuities; but conceiving that the general or residuary legatees might have it in their power to create some obstacle or difficulty in the payment, the testator [572] thought proper, merely in warning and as a warning, to deter them from adopting that course, by holding out the threat of penalty or forfeiture.

It may be admitted, that the language used by the testator is not to be reconciled with an accurate legal knowledge of the interests he was creating. He probably did not accurately understand the duties imposed by law upon the executors, the mode of administering his assets which might be enforced in this Court, or the mode which, without resorting to this Court, he might have enabled his executors to fulfil his intentions by their own authority, without being subject to any claim of the legatees, except for an account. But in these circumstances, and from the provisions made in his will and codicils, it appears to me, that the testator considered that particular legatees and annuitants would be dependent on the residuary given to the legatees, for the exact and punctual payment of the annuities and legacies, and considered that there might be a real infliction of the penalty, for the enforcement of which he relied on his executors.

The mode in which the testator regarded the subject of legacy and forfeiture may perhaps receive some illustration from the legacies given to Mr. and Mrs. Wentworth, in the seventh codicil. "I leave to Frederick W. Wentworth, Esq. of Dorsetshire, the sum of £5000, and to Mrs. Wentworth, his wife, the sum of £2000. My heirs, on failure of this payment, to be subject to the penalties in my will provided the said Frederick W. Wentworth, Esq., never turns out or raises the said sum, and lets them have leases of twenty-one years to any person that ever was a domestic servant, and has any farm belonging to my estate about Wentworth Castle, or Wakefield in Yorkshire. On failure of this condition, his and his wife's legacy to be void."

Without saying anything of the legal effect of these words, or of the manner in which this Court would have dealt with them, or have administered the estate in reference to them, they appear to me to shew that the testator contemplated the possibility of legacies being given absolutely and being paid, and yet becoming afterwards void or forfeited, by the non-performance, at a future time, of the condition which he imposed; and after the best consideration which I have been able to give to the will and the codicils, that notion appears to me to prevail throughout the whole of his testamentary dispositions, made at successive times during a period of many years.

I do not think that the testator intended the interest given to Mr. Byng to be indefeasible, he appears to me to have contemplated events, by which as he thought that interest might be forfeited; but I think that the will and codicils do not contain words indicating any intention to limit the interest of Mr. Byng to a life interest only; and I am therefore of opinion, that Mr. Byng is now absolutely entitled to the residuary personal estate, subject to any annuities or charges which may be subsisting. (NOTE.—The case was heard on appeal by the House of Lords, on the 26th and 27th of February 1844; and the decree was affirmed without calling on Respondents.)

[574] THE DEAN AND CHAPTER OF ELY v. BLISS. Feb. 22, May 10, 1842.

[S. C. 11 L. J. Ch. 351. Reversed on appeal, 2 De G. M. & G. 459; 43 E. R. 10. See Esdaile v. Payne, 1883, 32 W. R. 286; Irish Land Commission v. Great Western Railway Co., 10 App. Cas. 24.]

The right to tithes, as against an ecclesiastical corporation aggregate, is barred by the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27 by non-payment for twenty years.

To a bill by a dean and chapter for tithes accrued within twenty years, and to a decree in 1813, establishing the right, but not alleging that tithes had been accounted for under it, and stating that the Plaintiffs had, in 1831, granted a lease of the tithes of the rectory which existed till 1837, but not alleging that the lease was granted with a view to the tithes in question, or that the lessee paid any annuity on account of them, a plea of the statute of 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, averring that the right of suit did not first accrue within twenty years, and that the Plaintiffs had not been in possession within twenty years, was allowed.

A suit was instituted for the tithes of a particular district in a parish. The tithes of that parish had been demised by general words, but it was not suggested that the lease had been granted with a view to the tithes claimed by the bill, or that the lessee had paid or received anything on account of them. Held, that the outstanding lease did not prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations running, as regarded the particular tithes claimed.

This was a plea to a bill for tithes.

The Plaintiffs stated themselves to be grantees under letters patent, dated the 10th September, 33 Hen. 8, of the Rectory or Parsonage of Lakenheath, and of the tithes therein arising. That within the titheable places of the parish of Lakenheath, there was a district called Lakenheath Fen, which was formerly uninclosed and unproductive; but that the lands therein were afterwards drained, and, under an Act of the 8 Geo. 3, the drainage of Lakenheath Fen was improved, and by the means of it, the said Lakenheath Fen, which had previously been unproductive, or had produced titheable matters and things of very inconsiderable value, became fit for cultivation, and about fifty years ago, was brought into a state of cultivation, and had been used and cultivated as arable, meadow, and pasture land, and had produced titheable matters of considerable value, the tithes of which, since the 21st of December 1837, ought to have been rendered to the Plaintiffs. That the Defendant, amongst others, was an occupier of land within the district, and had, in every year since the 21st of December 1837, taken titheable matters without setting out any tithes to the Plaintiffs, and that he refused to do so.

[176] The bill charged that the lands were not exempted from payment; that in former times they were frequently under water, and were not, till about fifty years ago, brought into regular cultivation, and did not produce any corn or grain, or not produce a considerable quantity; but that the tithes of lamb and wool of sheep fed thereon were paid to the Plaintiffs or their lessees, and other tithes were paid to the vicar.

The bill, by way of evidence that the lands were not exempt or discharged from payment of tithes, charged that, in 1808, the lessees of the Plaintiffs filed a bill against certain occupiers of land, part of Lakenheath Fen, for the tithes of corn, wheat, lamb, and wool; that the answer, amongst other things, stated that the tithes of Lakenheath and the Rectory of Lakenheath were parcels of the Monastery of Peter and St. Ethelred at Ely, and that Lakenheath Fen was, for the reasons stated in the answer, exonerated from the payment of tithes, and that, notwithstanding such defence, an account of the tithes claimed by the bill, was, on the 16th of December 1813, decreed to be taken as against the Defendants to the bill.

The bill stated that the Defendant pretended, that no tithes, in respect of the titheable matters by the bill claimed, had at any time within sixty years last been rendered, and that by reason thereof, under the Act of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, the right of the Plaintiffs had become extinct; whereas the Plaintiffs charged the contrary, and that on the 4th of March 1831 the Plaintiffs demised the tithes belonging to the Rectory of Lakenheath (which they said included the tithes claimed by the bill), to Robert Evans; that the lease was subsisting at the time when the Act took effect, and was not surrendered till the 21st day of December 1837.

[176] The bill prayed an account of the tithes which had been so subtracted by the Defendant from the Plaintiffs, of such titheable matters as aforesaid, since the 21st of December 1837, and for payment.

To this bill the Defendant Cash pleaded, in Bar, the statute of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27. The plea set out the first section, enacting that the word "land" shall, in its legal meaning, extend to tithes "other than tithes belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole." It then set out the second, twenty-fourth, and thirty-fourth sections, and proceeded as follows:—"And this Defendant for further plea saith, that the said Complainants ever had any right to make an entry or distress, or bring an action or suit to recover the tithes of the tract of land called Lakenheath Fen, which the Defendant in no wise admits, such right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action or suit, did not first accrue to the said Complainants, or to any person through whom they claim, within twenty years next before the institution of the said suit; and that neither the said Complainants, nor any persons or person through whom they claim, have or hath, in respect of the estate or interest claimed by the said Complainants, been in possession or in receipt of the profits of the said tithes, or any of them, within twenty years next before the institution of this suit; and that no acknowledgment of the title (if any) of the said Complainants to the said tithes, any of them, hath been given to the said Complainants, or their agent, in writing signed by this Defendant, nor, to his knowledge or belief, by any other persons person in possession, or in receipt of the profits of the said tithes, within twenty years next before the institution of this suit."

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Eagle, in support of the plea. The Act of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, affords a valid defence against the claim now made by the Plaintiffs, and if [577] plea be true in fact, it is an answer to the demand made by this bill.

By the interpretation clause (sect 1) the word land extends "to tithes, other tithes belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole." The Plaintiffs, being a corporation sole, but a corporation aggregate, come within the operation of the statute.

By the second section no person is to bring an action for any rent (tithes), if the right shall not have accrued within twenty years. This is extended to equity by the twenty-fourth section, and by the thirty-fourth section the right becomes, at determination of that period, extinguished.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Lloyd, in support of the bill. The statute pleaded, the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, does not apply to the present case, in which the Defendant a bill for the arrears of tithes, claims an entire exemption from their payment. A claim must be grounded on the Act of the previous session, namely, the 2 & 3 W. 4, c. 100, which requires sixty years' exemption to be proved to sustain a prescription or claim to an exemption from tithes; otherwise it must be held that the Act of the 2 & 3 W. 4 (though recognised as unrepealed by the subsequent Act of the 4 & 5 W. 4, c. 83) has been repealed by the Act of the 3 & 4 W. 4, the provisions of which are utterly inapplicable to the provisions of the former Act. The consequence must be that the sixty years mentioned in the Act of 1832 will be cut down to twenty years by the Act of 1833.

Secondly, the plea is informal in not properly meeting the Plaintiffs' case. The bill is for tithes accrued within five years, and the plea to meet it is that the right did not accrue within twenty years, and that Plaintiffs have not been in possession of the tithes within twenty years: the plea should affirm that the right in question and the right of action or suit did not accrue within twenty years. The tithes demanded have accrued within the twenty years, and it is the very complaint of the Plaintiffs that the Defendant has not allowed them to take possession.

Thirdly, the statements in the bill, which are not denied by the plea, must, on this argument, be taken to be true. Now, according to the allegations of the bill, the Plaintiffs established their right in this Court, and obtained a decree in 1813.

Fourthly, in 1831 the Plaintiffs granted a lease of the tithes, and therefore, at the passing of the Act their estate was a reversion only, which only came into possession upon the surrender in 1837, at which time, therefore, their right, by the fifth section, first accrued. (See Chadwick v. Broadwood, 3 Beavan, 308.)

The plea also states, that the Plaintiffs, and those through whom they claim, have not been in possession within twenty years; it should have stated that the Plaintiffs and those who claim through them (viz., the lessee), have not been in possession within that time.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

Salkeld v. Johnston (1 Hare, 196), Fellowes v. Clay (Queen's Bench, Feb. 10, 1837), and the twenty-ninth section of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, were referred to.

[579] May 10. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Plaintiffs claim themselves to be grantees, under letters patent, dated 10th of September, 33 H. 8, of the Rectory or Parsonage of Lakenheath, and of the tithes therein arising. Within the titheable places of the parish of Lakenheath, there is a district called Lakenheath Fen, which was formerly uninclosed and unproductive, but that the land therein were afterwards drained, and about fifty years ago, were brought into a state of cultivation, and have since been used and cultivated as arable, meadow, or pasture land, and have produced titheable matters of considerable value, the tithes of which, since the 21st of December 1837, ought to have been rendered to the Plaintiffs. That the Defendant, amongst others, is an occupier of land within the district, as, in every year since the 21st of December 1837, taken titheable matters, without stinting out any tithes to the Plaintiffs, and that he refuses to do so. The bill charges that the lands are not exempted from payment; that in former times they were frequently under water, and were not, till about fifty years ago, brought into regular cultivation, and did not produce any corn or grain, or not any considerable quantity, so that the tithes of lamb and wool of sheep fed thereon was paid to the Plaintiffs and their lessees, and other tithes were paid to the vicar. And by way of evidence, that the land was not exempt from payment of tithes, it is charged, that in 1808 the mesne of the Plaintiffs filed their bill in this Court against certain occupiers of land, situated to be within the district, for an account of tithes; that the Defendants to that bill alleged an exemption, but that, nevertheless, on the 16th of December 1813, an account of tithes was decreed; and it is further charged, that under an indenture, dated the 4th of March 1831, the rectory and tithes of Lakenheath were demised to lessee for a term of years, which was sur-[580]-rendered on the 21st of December 1837, from which day the account of tithes is claimed.

To this bill, the Defendant Roper Cash has pleaded the statute of the 3 & 4 W. c. 27, and that neither the Plaintiffs, nor any person through whom they claim, have or hath been in possession or receipt of the profits of the tithes of Lakenheath man, or any of them, within twenty years next before the institution of this suit; and that no acknowledgment of the title (if any) of the Plaintiffs to the tithes, or any of them, has ever been given to the Plaintiffs or their agent, in writing signed by the Defendant, nor, to his knowledge or belief, by any other persons in possession or receipt of the profits of the tithes, within twenty years next before the institution of this suit.

The case, therefore, as it appears upon the bill and the plea, is, that the Plaintiffs are entitled generally to the rectorial tithes arising within the Rectory and Parsonage of Lakenheath; that, within the rectory, there is a particular tract of land called Lakenheath Fen, that the Defendant is an occupier of land within that tract, and has taken titheable matters therein arising; but that within twenty years before the institution of this suit, the Plaintiffs have not received any tithes arising from Lakenheath Fen, and no acknowledgment of their right has been given or made.

The question is, whether the Plaintiffs' right, if any they had, is extinguished, or whether they are barred of their right or remedy by the statute 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27. In the first section of that Act, it is enacted, that the word "land" shall in its meaning extend to tithes, other than tithes belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole. The second section enacts, that, after the 31st of December 1833, no person shall bring [581] an action to recover land, but within twenty years next after the right to bring such action first accrued to the person bringing the same. The third section defines the time when the right to bring an action shall be deemed to have accrued, in the particular cases therein specified. (James v. Satter, 3 Bing. C. 553.) The twenty-fourth section enacts, that no suit in equity shall be brought after the period, when the Plaintiffs, if entitled at law, might have brought an action. The thirty-fourth enacts, that at the end of the period of limitation, the right of a party out of possession shall be extinguished.

The tithes sought to be recovered by this bill, not being tithes belonging to a spiritual or eleemosynary corporation sole, come within the meaning of the word "land" as employed in this Act of Parliament; and the question arises, not as to all tithes arising within the Rectory or Parsonage of Lakenheath, but only as to such tithes as arise in the district within the rectory, which, in the bill, is distinguished by the name of Lakenheath Fen. Upon this occasion, I must consider the Plaintiffs to be entitled generally to the tithes arising within the rectory, and independently of the date, and of special circumstances, the Plaintiffs would have had a right of action, from the time of their original grant, and therefore the question seems to be, whether there are, in this case, any particular circumstances to prevent the operation of the Act.

It is, in the first place, said, that the effect which by the plea is imputed to the Act 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 27, would entirely subvert the Act 2 & 3 W. 4, c. 100, passed in the preceding year, for shortening the time required in claims of exemption from, or discharge of tithes. I [582] think that it has been correctly observed upon the two Acts, that they have different objects; but it appears to me to be a sufficient answer to the objection to say, that if two inconsistent Acts be passed at different times, the last is to be obeyed, and if obedience cannot be observed without derogating from the first, it is the first which must give way. Every Act of Parliament must be considered with reference to the state of the law subsisting when it came into operation, and when it is to be applied; it cannot otherwise be rationally construed. Every Act made, either for the purpose of making a change in the law, or for the purpose of better declaring the law, and its operation is not to be impeded by the mere fact that it is inconsistent with some previous enactment.

The next objection is, that the tithes now sought are demanded in respect of titheable matters which were not produced till within twenty years before the filing of the bill; that no right of action could arise, nor could the statute have any operation in such a case, and that the plea ought to have alleged, that the titheable matters, in respect of which the tithes are demanded, were produced more than twenty years ago, and consequently that the right of action, in respect of such tithes, accrued more than twenty years ago.

The plea should be adapted to the bill, and this bill, after requiring the Defendant to set out an account of the corn, grain, lambs and wool, and of all other titheable matters and things, which have arisen upon the lands of the Defendant, and have been taken by him in each year since December 1837, prays, that an account may be taken under the decree of the Court, of the tithes of such titheable matters, which have been subtracted by the Defendant. The bill therefore prays, [583] generally, an account of all the tithes of all titheable matters, which have been produced since the 21st of December 1837, not at all distinguishing such tithes as have arisen from the titheable matters, which were not produced till within the last twenty years, and in the stating part of the bill, it is not alleged, that the titheable matters, in respect of which the tithes are sought, were not produced till within twenty years before the bill was filed; but on the contrary, it is stated, that under an Act passed in the eighth year of George the Third, Lakenheath Fen was improved, and by the means aforesaid, Lakenheath Fen, which had previously been unproductive, or had produced titheable matters of very inconsiderable value, became fit for cultivation; and about fifty years ago the lands forming Lakenheath Fen were brought into a state of cultivation, and have since been used and cultivated as arable, meadow, and pasture land, and have produced titheable matters and things of considerable value. Upon this bill therefore cannot, even on the view taken of the subject by the Plaintiffs, be contended, that the right of action did not accrue more than twenty years ago.

But then the bill, by way of evidence that the lands are not exempt or discharged from payment of tithes, charges, that in 1808 the lessees of the Plaintiffs filed a bill against certain occupiers of land, part of Lakenheath Fen, for the tithes of corn, grain, lamb, and wool; that the answer, amongst other things, stated that the Manor of Lakenheath and the Rectory of Lakenheath were parcels of the Monastery of St. Peter and St. Ethelred at Ely, and that Lakenheath Fen was, for the reasons stated in the answer, exonerated from the payment of tithes, and that, notwithstanding the defence, an account of the tithes claimed by the bill was, on the 16th of December 1813, decreed to be taken as against [584] the Defendants. Supposing the decree to have established that lands in the occupation of the Defendants to that suit, or even the same lands which are now in the occupation of the Defendant to this suit, were not exempt from the payment of tithes, on the grounds of defence which were relied on in that cause, there is nothing inconsistent with this plea in the fact. The plea claiming the benefit of the statute is consistent with the allegation, that before the Act came into operation the lands were not exempt from the payment of tithes, and the bill does not allege that tithes were ever received or accounted for under the decree.

The bill further alleges, that on the 4th of March 1831 the Plaintiffs demanded the tithes belonging to the Rectory of Lakenheath (which they say included the tithes claimed by the bill) to Hugh Robert Evans; that the lease was subsisting at the time when the Act took effect, and was not surrendered till the 21st day of December 1837; and it was thereupon argued that the Plaintiffs' right of action did not accrue till that time. (Chadwick v. Broadwood, 3 Beavan, 308.) But it is not suggested at the lease was granted with a view to these tithes, or that the lessee paid or saved anything on account of these tithes.

Upon the bill and the plea it seems to me to stand thus :—that the Plaintiffs being, anything that appears to the contrary, entitled to the tithes now in question, and having a right to bring actions in respect of them, did, during the twenty years and without special reference to these particular tithes, but by general words which would have included them, if payable, grant a lease which was in force at the time when the Act passed, and it not appearing that anything was paid or [585] received, or intended to be so, in respect of the tithes now in question, either before the lease was made or afterwards, I think that the existence of that lease does not prevent the operation of the Act, and, on the whole, I think that this plea must be allowed; but the Plaintiffs, if they desire it, may have leave to amend the bill.

[585] EZART v. LISTER. EZART v. GOODILL. Nov. 4, 24, 1842.

Ability of a party acting as a solicitor in a proceeding in which funds are wrongfully obtained out of Court.

A solicitor knowing that money in Court belongs to one person, presents a petition and obtains payment to another, he is personally responsible. The principle applies if he has merely a knowledge of circumstances which, if duly considered, would lead to a knowledge of the fact.

Patty Goodill was entitled, for life, to an annuity of £20, payable out of the assets of the testator in the cause. The assets were administered in this Court, and provision was made for the payment of this annuity by setting apart a sum of £666, 8d. consols for the purpose. By the decree on further directions, in 1810, the assets in Court were apportioned, and the residue was ordered to be paid to William Goodill, who also was entitled to the £666, 6s. 8d., subject to the life interest of Patty Goodill.

It was afterwards ascertained that the Plaintiffs, the trustees, had a charge of £3 against the assets, for expenses incurred by them, and by an order made in Feb. 1815, it was referred to the Master to tax all parties their costs; and it was ordered that £108, 4s. 11d. annuities then in Court, together with a sum of £4, 7s. 9d., should be applied in payment (so far as those sums would extend) of the costs; and it was declared that the sum of £263, which had been reported due to the Plaintiffs, was a charge upon the sum of £666, 13s. 4d. 3 per cent. annuities, set apart to answer Patty Goodill's [586] annuity of £20. Liberty was given to the Plaintiffs to apply on the death of Patty Goodill.

No stop order was obtained by the Plaintiffs.

The costs were not taxed, and the sum of £108, 4s. 11d. stock and £4, 7s. 9d. cash remained in Court.

Patty Goodill died in January 1842, and in May following William Goodill presented a petition, stating the proceedings in the cause up to the order of 1810, but stating that of 1815. An order was made on that petition in May 1842, whereby a sum of £108, 4s. 11d. Reduced annuities, and a sum of £94, 14s. 9d. cash, which had arisen from the dividends thereon, and also the sum of £666, 13s. 4d., were ordered to be paid to William Goodill.

Messrs. A. & B. were not solicitors in the cause, but they acted as the solicitors of William Goodill, in the matter of the petition.

A petition was now presented by the personal representative of the surviving wife, praying either that William Goodill and Messrs. A. & B. might be ordered to tender into Court the sums obtained out of Court in May 1842, and that the same should be applied in payment of the costs directed to be paid by the order of March 1815, together with interest and the costs of the application, or that William Goodill and Messrs. A. & B. might be ordered to pay those costs, &c.

Mr. Pemberton, in support of the petition.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Heberden, contra, on behalf of Messrs. A. & B. William Goodill did not appear.

[587] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am of opinion that under the circumstances I cannot grant the order which is now asked. There is no doubt of the principle, that if a solicitor, knowing that money which is in Court belongs to one person, presents a petition in the name of another, and obtains payment, he is personally chargeable with the amount. I go further, if he has not the knowledge of the fact, but has knowledge of circumstances which, if duly considered, would lead to knowledge of the fact, he must be made personally answerable for that loss, which by want of due consideration has occasioned. It is very rarely, that such cases come before the Court. I only recollect one which came before Sir William Grant, who said that the solicitor had better pay the money at once, and it was done.

In this case there are several peculiar circumstances which have been necessarily commented upon.

HIS LORDSHIP (after detailing the circumstances of the case, and the grounds on which the Petitioner rested this claim as against Messrs. A. & B.) said—The question is, whether, under the circumstances, I am to impute to the solicitors such knowledge of the charge upon the fund in Court, or of circumstances, which, if duly considered, would have led to a knowledge of that charge, as ought to induce me to say that they must be charged with the loss. I do not think that I have before me sufficient evidence of established facts to compel me to impute to these gentlemen such a knowledge of the circumstances, as to require me to say that they are personally liable. On the whole I do not think I can make them personally liable, although these funds ought never to have been paid out in the way they have been.

[588] The order which is asked for against William Goodill must be granted, and the petition must be dismissed as against Messrs. A. & B. without costs.

[588] LANGLEY v. FISHER. Dec. 8, 15, 1842.

When the Plaintiff obtains an unconditional order to enlarge publication, the Defendant can neither set down the cause, nor serve a subpoena to hear judgment until the time has expired. Having contravened this rule, an order was made to quash the subpoena, and to strike the cause out of the cause paper.

The bill was filed in November 1836, and after great delay on the part of the Plaintiff, the cause was at issue in Easter term 1841. The Defendant then proceeded in the cause, and in Michaelmas term 1841 he gave rules to produce witnesses, and in Easter term gave rules to pass publication.

The Plaintiff, afterwards, made four several applications to the Master to enlarge publication. On the first and third occasions the Master granted that indulgence, on the terms of the Plaintiff undertaking to set down the cause for hearing within a given time (which terms were not complied with by the Plaintiff); he imposed terms by the second and fourth orders.

The fourth order of the Master enlarged publication until Hilary term 1843. The Defendant before that time had expired, and on the 1st of December 1842, set down the cause, and served subpoenas to hear judgment.

The Plaintiff now moved to quash the subpoena to hear judgment, and to strike the cause out of the cause paper.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Romilly, in support of the motion.

[589] The proceeding of the Defendant is quite irregular; publication being enlarged, the cause cannot be set down without special permission. They cited R. v. King (4 Mad. 126) in support of the form of the application.

Mr. G. Turner, contra. Under the old practice, where a party obtained an order to enlarge publication, that did not prevent the other party setting down the cause, and the practice, in this respect, has not been altered. The usual order, on obtaining an enlargement of publication, provides that the indulgence shall not obstruct the other party from setting down the cause (see Hinde, 384); and it is the opinion of the Master's office that this course is regular.

The Plaintiff has not complied with the conditions of the 1st and 3d orders, and not been relieved therefrom, he has therefore no right to complain.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that his present impression was in favour of the Plaintiff; but he should inquire as to the practice.

Sec. 15. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It was alleged that the taken in this case by the Defendant was not according to the understood practice of the Court, and I reserved the case for the purpose of making inquiry upon the subject.

The case was this: The bill being filed in November 1836, and the answer being filed in February 1837, the Plaintiff lingered in his proceedings very much, and, notwithstanding the exertions which were used on the [590] part of the Defendant, a subpoena to rejoin was served until Easter term 1841. The Defendant took the management of the cause, and obtained rules for passing publication. The Plaintiff had four times successively to the Master to enlarge publication. It has not been asked of me on what principle it was that these orders were made in the form in which they were; for it appears that the first and third orders put the Plaintiff under the necessity of setting down the cause, and that the second and the fourth were made without such terms. Pending the last of these four orders to enlarge publication, the Plaintiff set down the cause for hearing, and served a subpoena to hear judgment. I was certainly very much surprised at such a course being adopted—it was clearly in conformity with the old practice of the Court. Since orders for enlarging publication have been made by the Master, it was possible that some new understanding might have arisen, and I therefore thought it right to make enquiries on the subject.

The old practice appears clear, and free from doubt. If the Plaintiff obtained an order to enlarge publication, it was considered that he was causing a delay to himself, and terms were imposed upon him, and the Defendant was not at liberty, pending the order to enlarge publication, to set down the cause for hearing; if the Defendant did so, the consequence was that the subpoena would be quashed, and the cause struck out of the paper. On the other hand, if the Defendant applied for an order to enlarge publication, he was delaying the Plaintiff; and if he obtained the order, there was no objection to it a direction that it should not hinder the Plaintiff setting down the cause.

Now the very form of that order shews that, pending the order to enlarge publication, the opposite party was not at liberty to set down the cause, without an order for that purpose [591] expressly given by the order. I apprehend, therefore, that the present course of proceeding had been adopted under the old practice, the Plaintiff would have been in error.

I have endeavoured to ascertain what the practice is now that the Act of 1833 empowers the Master to enlarge publication. It may be doubted whether the Master has authority to add any terms or conditions to the order to enlarge publication; it has been done on some occasions, as in two out of four in the present case, and I have found other instances in which terms have been added; but in by far the greater number there have been no such terms imposed. In this state of the law it has been conceived that where the Plaintiff has delayed the passing publication, the Defendant would be without the means of getting rid of the suit, or of bringing it pending the Plaintiff's delay, unless he has power to set down the cause. But this is not so; because under such circumstances the Defendant might apply to the Court for leave to set down the cause; and on such application the Court might be enabled to judge of the delay which had taken place, on the part of the Plaintiff. I find an understanding has grown up in the Master's office that a Plaintiff is at liberty to do that which has been done in the present case, and the Defendant has, no doubt, acted upon that understanding; but I am of opinion that the understanding in the office was erroneous, and that the Defendant has no right, without the leave of the Court, to set down the cause pending the order to enlarge publication.

Under these circumstances I must grant this application, so far as it asks that the subpoena may be quashed, and the cause struck out of the paper; but I cannot give any costs of the motion; in the first place, because the Plaintiff has obtained an order upon terms which he has not complied with, and next, because I think the course which has been adopted by the Defendant has been founded upon an erroneous impression entertained in the Master's office.

[592] ALDEN v. FOSTER. Dec. 15, 1842.

If a mortgagee receives rents after the Master's report and before the day appointed for payment, there must be a further reference and account, and a new day appointed for payment.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Toller, moved to make absolute a decree for foreclosure. Mr. Bacon, contrà. Since the day appointed by the Master for payment the mortgagee has received rents, and the balance due has thus undergone a variation. The mortgagee is not therefore entitled to a foreclosure.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. I have already had occasion to consider this question (Garlick v. Jackson, 4 Beavan, 154; and see Geldard v. Hornby, 1 Hare, 251.) If a certain sum is found to be due on a particular day, and payment of that sum is directed to be then made, and in default the party is to be foreclosed. The mortgagee having in the interim varied the account, there must be a new reference to the Master and a new day fixed by him for payment.

NOTE.—The Master of the Rolls, in a subsequent case, upon the motion of the mortgagee, made a new order of reference. See Ellis v. Griffiths, post.

[593] LOOKER v. BRADLEY. Dec. 21, 23, 1842.

A testator gave specific legacies to three of his nieces (daughters of his sister, name, and the residue to his sister and her husband for their lives, subject to an annuity to A., and after the death of the parents and A., he directed the residue to be "divided equally between the daughters of his said sister," and which he bequeathed "to his said nieces." There was a gift over, if no daughter of his sister should be then living.

The sister had four daughters born at the date of the will, and another born after the testator's death. Some only survived the tenants for life.

Held, that the residue was divisible among all the nieces, and that they took their interests, subject to be divested in an event which had not happened.

The testator James Bradley, by his will dated in February 1793, directed that the interest arising from his three shares in the tontine of 1789, on the lives of his nieces, Frances Rosalia Dyne, Elizabeth Dyne, and Mary Dyne (daughters of Andrew Hawes Dyne and Frances his wife), to be respectively applied by the executors towards the maintenance, &c., of each of his said nieces; and he bequeathed to each of his said nieces one share when they should separately arrive at the age of twenty-one years, to be also transferred to each of them when they attained that age. He directed his residuary property to be invested in the names of his executors in trust, which he declared as follows:—"After deducting the aforesaid £200 I have directed to be paid to the aforesaid Margaret Jack, and after deducting the aforesaid £100 a year directed to be paid to the said Frances Dyne aforesaid, and after deducting the produce of the three tontine shares aforesaid, and also after deducting any other legacy or legacies which I may give in this my last will, or by any will annexed or added thereto, then I give and bequeath the remaining interest of the said tontine to my said sister Frances Dyne and her husband Andrew Hawes Dyne, for and during their joint lives, and for the life of the survivor of them. And further I direct, that after the said Margaret Jack and my said sister Frances Dyne, and her husband Andrew Hawes Dyne shall all be dead, the principal of the interest of [594] which I have bequeathed to them in the manner before mentioned shall be divided equally between the daughters of the said Frances Dyne, my said sister, and which I give and bequeath to them my said nieces, to be divided equally amongst them, share and share alike. And if no daughter of my said sister should be living, then and in that case, I give and bequeath to my nephews, the sons of my said sister Frances Dyne, what would otherwise have been divided amongst her daughters."

At the date of the testator's will, Andrew H. Bradley and Frances his wife had three children, namely, the three daughters named in his will, and Frances Dyne and Frances Dyne, all of whom were living at the testator's death. Andrew Hayes Bradley and Frances his wife, had another child Margaret, born on the 24th of June 1796, at the date of the testator's will, but in his lifetime. There were no other children.

Andrew Hawes Bradley died in December 1820, and Margaret Jack died in July 24, and Frances Bradley died in August 1842.

Of the nieces some had died in the lifetime of the tenants for life, and some survived them.

The first question was, whether the shares vested in the daughters, so as to be referable to their personal representatives in the event of their dying in the lifetime of the tenants for life, and,

Secondly, whether the whole vested in the three nieces named in the will alone, or was divisible between them and the other daughters of the testator's sister.

[595] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Renshaw contended, that the gift to the nieces was vested, and that the shares of such as died in the life of the tenants for life passed to their representatives. Hallifax v. Wilson (16 Ves. 168), Skey v. Barnes (Mer. 335), Harrison v. Foreman (5 Ves. 206). That the gift over was, if no niece then living, an event which had not happened, and that, therefore, the vested gift was unaffected. Sturgess v. Pearson (4 Mad. 411).

Secondly, that the residue was given "to my said nieces," which meant those specially named, and consequently that it was divisible amongst those only to whom the tontine shares had been previously given.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Busk, for Mrs. Morgan, the daughter born after the date of the will, contended, that the nieces did not take vested interests, and that the residue was divisible amongst such only of the class as were living at the period of distribution.

They cited Batsford v. Kebbell (3 Ves. 363), in which a testatrix gave to A. the dividends of £500 stock till he should attain the age of thirty-two, at which time she directed her executors to transfer the principal to him. It was held that the legacy did not vest till the age of thirty-two. They cited also 1 Roper on Legacies, 507, Levesse v. Liege (3 B. P. C. 365, 373), and Stonor v. Curwen (5 Sim. 264).

Secondly, they contended that all the nieces living at the death of the previous tenants for life were entitled to share, and that the gift was not limited to those specially named in the will. The Court, they argued, [596] favoured the construction which would admit all the daughters to take, and the words "said nieces" referred to the last antecedent, namely, "the daughters of my sister," where the word daughters was used generally, and included all daughters, and that the gift was, if no daughters should be then living, shewed, by implication, that all were to take.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. W. T. S. Daniel, for Bradley.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved judgment.

Dec. 23. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have read this will, and it appears to me that the testator has used the words "nieces" and "daughters" interchangeably. Any ambiguity which might arise in the expression, "my said nieces," is removed by the generality of the gift over, which is, "in case no daughter should then living."

I think that all the nieces are included in the residuary gift, and I do not find in the will any words, which appear to me to indicate an intention that the gift to the nieces should be contingent.

I think they take vested interests, subject to be divested in an event which has not happened.

The property is, therefore, divisible in fifths.

[597] JOHNSTON v. TODD. Feb. 14, 15, 20, 1843.

Observations on traditionary evidence in pedigree cases, and its fallibility. It is to be wholly rejected because error is proved as to part.

The veracity, or even accuracy, of an ignorant and illiterate person, is not to be conclusively tested by comparing an affidavit made by him, with his oral testimony; discrepancies between them is not conclusive against his testimony.

Observations on the value of testimony given by affidavit. When the witness is illiterate and ignorant, the language is not his own, but that of the person preparing the affidavit; being taken ex parte, it is almost always incomplete, and often inaccurate.

Where on an issue, the evidence is fairly before the jury, and the Judge is satisfied there is great difficulty in supporting a motion for a new trial on the ground that the verdict is not supported by the evidence; but the Court will, nevertheless, entertain the motion, and attend to the course of the trial, the issue having been directed for its satisfaction.

This case has been several times before the Court. (See 3 Beavan, 218; 5 Beav. 394.) It now came on upon a motion for a new trial of an issue directed to the Court.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Court.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Parry, in support of the motion.

Mr. Turner, in the same interest.

Mr. S. Wortley, Mr. J. Anderson, and Mr. Monteath, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. An issue having been directed to try whether Peter, the son of John Marshall of Longformacus was the next of kin to Robert Marshall the testator, at the time of his death, and the jury having found the affirmative, a motion is now made for a new trial.

There is not, on this occasion, any complaint that evidence has been improperly rejected or admitted; it is [598] not alleged that any new evidence has been discovered, or that all parties did not come fully prepared for the trial, or that the true state of facts, as appearing by evidence, was not duly presented to the jury, and though some observations were made on the summing-up of the Judge, in which it may be collected that the Defendants considered that some things might have been more favourably stated for them, no allegation is made that the jury was misled by any misdirection.

The sole ground of the application is the allegation that the verdict is not supported by the evidence.

The evidence having been fairly before the jury, and the Judge having expressed his satisfaction with the verdict, there must, on that account, be great difficulty in supporting the motion; but undoubtedly the issue was directed to be tried for the satisfaction of this Court, and the course of the trial must be attended to here.

The testator, Robert Marshall, was about eighty years of age when he died in Jamaica, in the year 1820. His father, William Marshall, married Elizabeth Jeffrey of Stitchell Mill in 1734, and he was baptized in 1740, and went to Jamaica when a boy. So far the facts are not subject to controversy. The testator was the son of William Marshall who married Elizabeth Jeffrey of Stitchell Mill, and he went to Jamaica early in life.

On the other hand, John Marshall of Longformacus died in November 1788, a very old man. He was married to Margaret Marshall, at Longformacus, in June 1750, and by that marriage had two sons Peter and Robert, and three daughters Ann Giles and Jean and Margaret Marshall. The widow of John died in August [599] 1792. Of these facts there does not appear to be any reasonable doubt.

But the Plaintiff in the issue alleges that John Marshall of Longformacus, prior to his marriage in 1750, had married another Margaret Marshall, by whom he had a son William, who was the father of the testator. The Plaintiff's allegation is that William Marshall, the testator's father, was the son of John Marshall of Longformacus, and the half brother of the children of that John, who were the issue of the marriage which took place in 1750.

Whether William Marshall was so connected with John and his family is the question to be determined. If he was, it is not disputed that Peter, the son of John, was next of kin of the testator at the time of his death.

When, in cases of this kind, we speak of evidence and proof, we must be understood to mean such evidence and proof as the law allows, and as the nature of the case admits of. In cases where the whole evidence is traditionary, when it consists entirely of family reputation or of statements of declarations made by persons who died long ago, it must be taken with such allowances, and also with such suspicions, as ought reasonably to be attached to it. When family reputation, or declarations of kindred made in a family, are the subject of evidence, and the reputation is of long standing, or the declarations are of old date, the memory as to the source of the reputation, or as to the persons who made the declarations, can rarely be characterised by perfect accuracy. What is true may become blended with, and scarcely distinguishable from, something that is erroneous; the detection of error in any part of the statement necessarily throws doubt upon the whole statement, and yet all [600] that is material to the case may be perfectly true; and if the whole be rejected as false because error in some part is proved, the greatest injustice may be done. All testimony is subject to such errors, and testimony of this kind is more particularly so; and however difficult it may be to discover the truth, in cases where there can be no demonstration and where every conclusion which may be drawn is subject to some doubt or uncertainty, or to some opposing probabilities, the Courts are bound to adopt the conclusion which appears to rest on the most solid foundation.

On the late trial, the Plaintiff examined five witnesses to prove the kindred. Four of them were children of Robert Marshall, the son of John. The fifth was William Jeffrey. They had all of them made affidavits in the Master's office, and all of them had been examined on the former trial, so that the Defendants were fully prepared to cross-examine them, and to bring, with full effect, before the Judge and the jury, any inconsistent statement in the evidence given by them on different occasions.

It appears that in the evidence of the children of Robert Marshall there are very considerable discrepancies, discrepancies as to the members of the family from whom the information is alleged to have been received, discrepancies also as to some facts which are distinctly stated to be within the knowledge of the witnesses.

I do not think that the veracity or even the accuracy of an ignorant and illiterate person is to be conclusively tested by comparing an affidavit, which he has made, with his testimony given upon an oral examination in open Court. We have too much experience of the [601] great infirmity of affidavit evidence. When the witness is illiterate and ignorant, the language presented to the Court is not his: it is, and must be, the language of the person who prepares the affidavit; and it may be, and too often is, the expression of that person's erroneous inference as to the meaning of the language used by the witness himself; and however carefully the affidavit may be read over to the witness, he may not understand what is said in language so different from that which he is accustomed to use. Having expressed his meaning in his own language, and finding it translated by a person on whom he relies into language not his own, and which he does not perfectly understand, he is too apt to acquiesce; and testimony not intended by him is brought before the Court as his. Again, evidence taken on affidavit, being taken ex parte, is almost always incomplete and often inaccurate, sometimes from partial suggestions, and sometimes from the want of suggestions and inquiries, without the aid of which the witness may be unable to recall the connected collateral circumstances necessary for the correction of the first suggestions of his memory, and for his accurate recollection of all that belongs to the subject. For these and other reasons, I do not think that discrepancies between the affidavit and the oral testimony of a witness are conclusive against the testimony of the witness.

It is further to be observed, that witnesses, and particularly ignorant and illiterate witnesses, must always be liable to give imperfect or erroneous evidence, even when orally examined in open Court. The novelty of the situation, the agitation and hurry which accompanies it, the cajolery or intimidation to which the witness may be subjected, the want of questions calculated to excite those recollections which might clear up every difficulty, and the confusion occasioned by cross-examination as [602] it is too often conducted, may give rise to important errors and omissions, and the truth is to be elicited not by giving equal weight to every word the witness may have uttered, but by considering all the words with reference to the particular occasion of saying them, and to the personal demeanour and deportment of the witness during the examination.

All the discrepancies which occur, and all that the witness says in respect to them, are to be carefully attended to, and the result, according to the special circumstances of each case, may be, either that the testimony must be altogether rejected on the ground that the witness has said that which is untrue, either wilfully under self-delusion, so strong as to invalidate all that he has said, or else the result must be, that the testimony must, as to the main purpose, be admitted, notwithstanding discrepancies which may have arisen from innocent mistake, extending to collateral matters, but perhaps not affecting the main question in any important degree.

One of the reasons which induced me to grant a new trial on the former occasion was, that the discrepancies between the affidavits and the oral testimony on the last trial might, if possible, be explained, or, at all events, that the discrepancies might be distinctly brought under the consideration of the Judge and of the jury.

This has now been done; the evidence given by affidavit, the evidence given on the first trial, and the evidence orally given on the last trial have been compared and contrasted. Looking at the statement of what passed, as it appears on paper, I own that I find nothing which I consider to be satisfactory as an explanation of the differences; but having regard to the [603] nature of the testimony, seeing that the demeanour of the witnesses during the examination and cross-examination to which they were subjected, was under the observation of the Judge and of the Jury, and that the Judge is satisfied with the verdict, I do not think that the discrepancies in the evidence of the Marshalls afford a sufficient reason for granting a new trial in this case.

The evidence of William Jeffrey is subject to much less observation. In his affidavit there was an admitted mistake, which was afterwards amended, but neither affidavit did he state what he subsequently stated he had heard from Robert the brother of Peter Marshall, or from the family of the Jeffreys. I am asked to attribute the evidence subsequently given of Robert's declaration to the supposed efficacy of ex vivo examination, but to suppose that the whole statement is untrue because it was not stated in the affidavit; and I am desired to consider the whole of his evidence incredible, either for the same reason, or because it so strongly supports the case of the Plaintiff at law; and, undoubtedly, if the evidence of William Jeffrey be true, and the jury must have so considered it, the case of the Plaintiff must be deemed to be established, unless other facts be shewn, leading decisively to another conclusion.

The Plaintiff at law had, on former occasions, alleged, that John Marshall Longformacus was baptized at Torpichen on the 21st of February 1697, and if this had been made out, it would have appeared that he was not far from ninety-four years old at the time of his death, that he was eighty-eight years old in 1783, thirty-seven years old when his alleged son married Elizabeth Jeffrey, in May 1741, and only sixteen or seventeen years old when he was married in 1713.

[604] I do not find that the Plaintiff succeeded in shewing that John Marshall Longformacus was baptized at Torpichen in 1697; and on the last trial no evidence was given as to his origin or family connections.

But a statement, in which it was implied that he had himself married at the age of sixteen or seventeen years, that he had a son married when he was himself thirty-seven years old, was sufficient to excite attention; and one of the grounds on which a new trial was granted on the former occasion was, that the Defendants discovered evidence, by which it was said to be proved, that John Marshall of Longformacus was born in 1705, and consequently was only twenty-nine years old when his alleged son was married, and was only eight years old at the time when he himself was alleged to have been first married.

In order to establish this fact, the Defendants produced in evidence certain proceedings which were had before the Sheriff-Depute of Berwickshire in the year 1785, for the purpose of procuring John Marshall to be admitted on the poor's roll of the parish of Longformacus, and afterwards in the year 1787 for an increase of aliment.

In these proceedings, John Marshall's petition and replication, signed by William Marshall as his procurator, represented him to be eighty years old, and to have been born in the parish of Ecclesmachan in the year 1705; but I am of opinion that these statements, though proper to be considered, do not afford anything like proof, either that John Marshall was born at Ecclesmachan, or that his age did not exceed eighty [605] It does not appear that he was baptized at Torpichen, and he may have been born and baptized at Ecclesmachan; but there is no reason to suppose that any entry of baptism, before the year 1716, was in existence in the year 1785. The reference to the sessions book of Ecclesmachan, for the purpose of shewing that John Marshall was born in 1705, seems to have been made at random, and the date of 1705 seems to have been obtained merely by computation of the assumed age of eighty in the year 1785. I do not think that such a statement, under such circumstances, is to be in any degree relied on as shewing the exact age of John at the time.

There are circumstances in the case which are involved in considerable obscurity. The Plaintiff has given no account of the origin of John Marshall. The Defendants have not only given no account of the origin of William Marshall, who is alleged by the Plaintiff to have been the son of John, but they have adduced no evidence of any connection respecting him in the family of Jeffreys. It is singular that the testator, who was baptized in 1740, and is alleged to have gone to Jamaica when a boy, should not be shewn to have made any inquiry about his relations till the year 1810; and that his inquiry at that time should extend only to the descendants of Robert Jeffrey Mitchell Mill. He makes no allusion to any connection of his father's, and his will, in subsequent date, makes no reference to any member of his father's family. The Defendants consider this circumstance as proving that the testator knew that he had no relation on the father's side. The circumstance is, no doubt, very fit to be considered, and it was brought distinctly before the jury. If it be true, as William Jeffrey states, that his father George gave the testator money to enable him to go to Jamaica, it seems singular that an act of such kindness should not have [606] been remembered, and have induced some notice in the inquiry made in 1810, but still the fact itself may be true.

On the whole of the case, although there are many obscurities which have not been explained, although the principal fact does not admit of demonstration, and it therefore be for ever subject to the degree of doubt which is attached to every case in which opposing probabilities are to be contrasted and balanced against each other, in which you have something perhaps to suspect, and something to make allowance for, in the testimony of almost every witness, yet, as it is necessary to give effect to that conclusion, which, upon a careful examination of the whole, appears to be best supported, as upon the trial the whole evidence has been fully sifted, and the issues have been called upon to answer for the differences in the evidence before the jury, and in the presence of the Judge, who is satisfied and would himself have acted in the verdict if he had been upon the jury, as no new evidence has been discovered, and there seems to be no reasonable prospect of obtaining any better conclusion, or any greater satisfaction upon a new trial, I think it right to refuse this application.

[607] TUCKER v. BOSWELL. Feb. 21, 1843.

The testator directed his residuary personal estate to be invested in land from time to time and at all convenient opportunities, and in the meantime to be accumulated. He held, that the tenant for life of the land was entitled to the interest of the invested personalty, as from a year from the testator's death.

In the same case the testator gave £400 a year to his wife if she recovered her mental faculties, otherwise £200 a year, and to be paid out of his Government stock; and he directed as soon as conveniently might be after her death, the investment of the stock out of which the annuity was payable, in land to be conveyed in strict settlement. The wife did not recover. Held, that the extra £200 a year became part of the residue to be invested, and did not belong to the tenant for life.

The testator gave the residue of his personal estate to trustees, upon trust to pay his wife an annuity of £400 a year for life, if she should recover her mental faculties; and until that event, upon trust to apply for her use an annuity of £200 a year; the said annuity of £400 or £200 (as the case might be) to be paid out of the dividends on the Government stock standing in his name at the Bank of England; and as to directing his leaseholds to be sold, he directed that the purchase-money for the leasehold premises, together with the residue of his personal estate not disposed of or applied for the purposes thereinbefore mentioned, should be laid out and invested from time to time, and at all convenient opportunities, by his trustees in the purchase of lands and hereditaments in England of freehold tenure, which should be conveyed and assured unto his trustees and their heirs, upon the like trusts as were then before declared with respect to his freehold estates; and upon further trust that the trustees should, as conveniently as might be after the decease of his said wife, lay out and invest the stock, out of the dividends of which her said annuity should have been payable, in the purchase of freehold lands and hereditaments in England, to be conveyed and assured upon the like trusts as were directed with respect to the leaseholds to be purchased; and until proper and eligible purchases could be made, directed his trustees to lay out the [608] produce of the sale of his said leasehold house, together with any other trust monies in their or his hands not produced by interest, in their names in Government stocks or funds of Great Britain; and as to the residue of the said stock, until such purchases of freehold property should have been made as aforesaid, to lay out and invest the interest, dividends and annual produce of his residuary personal estate, as and when the same interest, dividends and produce should be received, and accumulate the same in the nature of compound interest.

The real estates were devised to one for life, with remainders over.

The testator died in 1826.

His widow died in 1835 without having recovered, so that only £200 a year had been applied to her use.

The questions were, first, whether the tenant for life of the freeholds was entitled to the income of the personal estate uninvested, as from twelve months from the testator's death, or whether it ought to be accumulated, so as to form part of the capital to be invested; and, secondly, whether the £200 a year (being the annual produce of the fund set apart to answer the wife's annuity, after payment for her part of the annuity of £200 a year), formed part of the income of the tenant for life, or part of the capital to be invested.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. A. Austen, for the tenant for life, argued, that the tenant for life was, upon the authorities, entitled to the income as from twelve months from the testator's death; Kilvington v. Gray (2 Sim. & Stu. 396), where a testator directed his residuary estate to be laid out in the purchase of land, as soon as a convenient purchase could be found producing $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and in the meantime the interest to be accumulated; it was held that the tenant for life was entitled to the interest of the residuary estate from the end of one year after the testator's death until it had been laid out. Parry v. Warrington (6 Mad. 155), Sitwell v. Bernard (Ves. 520), Entwistle v. Markland (6 Ves. 528, n.), and Vigor v. Harwood (12 Sim. 134).

Secondly, that the particular object of the testator in directing the investment to continue in the funds, was for securing to the widow the annuity to which she was entitled under the will; but that the general object was to invest the available residuary estate in land for the benefit of the tenant for life, and the remainder. That, consequently, when the particular object had been satisfied, the remainder of the fund must be considered invested, and the interest would belong to the tenant for life.

Mr. Romilly and Mr. Willcock, for the other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held, that the tenant for life entitled to the income of the uninvested personalty as from one year from the testator's death: but that the £200 a year became part of the general residue to be invested, and that the tenant for life was entitled to the income only of it.

[610] HAY v. BOWEN. Dec. 22, 23, 1842.

[8. C. 12 L. J. Ch. 78; 6 Jur. 1119. See Seaton v. Grant, 1867, 36 L. J. Ch. 642.]

bill was filed for the administration of the testator's estate, by a party entitled to a contingent reversionary interest, and a decree for an account was obtained. Before the report, the Plaintiff's interest wholly failed. Held, that the Plaintiff was not entitled to his costs of suit either as against the Defendants or the fund, and a petition for the purpose was dismissed with costs. sole Plaintiff whose interest failed pending a reference to take the accounts, was restrained from proceeding further in the suit.

In 1835 Alfred Farr became insolvent, and the Plaintiff Hay was appointed his assignee. At the time of his insolvency, he was entitled, in right of his wife, to a contingent reversionary interest in the real and personal estate of the testator, and which the Defendant Bowen (the testator's widow and executrix), was entitled to bring her widowhood.

In 1835 the assignee, under the authority of the creditors and the Insolvent Debtors Court, filed his bill against the executrix, and against Farr, his wife and other persons interested in the property, for the administration of the estate, and charge the widow with a breach of trust. In 1839 a decree was made for taking a usual accounts; the Master was to inquire if any and what advances had been made to the husband, and if any and what settlement had been made on the marriage of Farr and wife, with liberty to state special circumstances.

While the proceedings were going on in the Master's office Farr died, whereby all interest of the Plaintiff ceased. The Plaintiff, nevertheless, continued prosecuting the accounts, and a petition was, in consequence, presented by the Defendants to stay proceedings. A cross-petition was thereupon presented by the Plaintiff, for payment to him of the costs of the suit, either by Mrs. Bowen personally, or out of the assets.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Hubback, for the Plaintiff. This suit was properly instituted and conducted; it was for the benefit of all parties that the accounts [611] should be taken, and the estate protected by this Court. The fund, at least, should, according to the established principles, bear the costs of the administration, and if it, they should be paid by Mrs. Bowen, who appears by the proceedings in the Master's office to be a defaulter.

It was settled by the decree in this cause, that the Plaintiff, though his interest was contingent on Farr surviving the wife, had a sufficient interest to maintain the bill. Though legacies are contingent, the legatees "have such an interest, as entitles them to know what debts the testator owed." Andrew v. Wrigley (4 Bro. C. C. 135). In Stidholme v. Hodgson (3 P. W. 300), the bill was filed by a party who could only come entitled in the event of the death of certain parties without children; it was rejected that the Plaintiff had no present right, and might possibly never have any, and the Court said, "As to what has been objected concerning the costs, these ought not to be paid out of the assets of the testator, who, by his will, has occasioned the difficulties. Here is a possibility, at least, of a right's coming to this contingent issue, and it is reasonable that all rights, such as they are, whether vested or contingent, should be preserved. On the death of Mary Hodgson the mother, it will be determined whether this right will ever vest or not, which has been adjudged not too remote a distance of time. If the Defendants were not to be called to an account in their lifetime, they might waste and embezzle everything, and that estate, which at present may be easily accounted for, in process of time (viz.), at the death of the defendant Mary Hodgson, may be impossible to be discovered, by which means the issue over may be deprived of his right, and the intentions of the [612] testator defeated, and though there may be these inconveniences on the one side, I for my part am able to foresee none on the other. In the case of Maddox v. Staines (3 Wms. 421), where the bill was for securing a like contingent right, the Master of the Rolls made a decree of this nature which was affirmed by the Lord Chancellor King and his Lordship's decree affirmed in Parliament.

Again, the decree operates for the benefit of all the parties, Plaintiff and Defendants; after decree any of the Defendants can prosecute the suit, and revive if necessary. Here the Defendants have claimed the benefit of the suit by the answer, and have adopted it; it is but reasonable, that taking the benefit, they should pay the costs of it.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Steere, contra. The Plaintiff has instituted this suit at his own risk, taking the chance of the insolvent surviving his wife. The effect of his death, is not to shew that all the Plaintiff's interest has ceased, but to prove he never had any. On what principle then is a party, who has not and never had any interest, to be indemnified his costs out of a fund belonging to other persons?

The Plaintiff's proceedings have wholly failed, he has no right to bring the suit for further directions; it must not be assumed that, if it were so brought on, he would be entitled to the costs, he, on the contrary, might be ordered to pay them. That point cannot be decided on petition without hearing the cause, and with going fully into the merits.

[613] The suit, it is said, was for the benefit of the parties; far from it, it deprecates the litigation, no advantage has resulted from it, and they have themselves incurred expenses which they must bear. They have unwillingly been made parties to this litigation.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I confess I do not see any reason for doubting what order ought to be made on this petition. There is no apprehend, nothing more clear than this, that to enable a Plaintiff to obtain relief which he asks by his bill, the interest which supports it, must be continuing at the time of the decree. If the interest has ceased to exist before the cause is brought on for hearing, it is utterly impossible for the Court to make any decree in his favour. I will not say that a case might not exist, but it must be a very extraordinary and special case indeed, in which the Court could make any order, upon the application of a person who clearly has no interest in the subject of litigation.

In this case the bill is filed by the assignee of the insolvent husband of a married woman, who, in right of his wife, had a reversionary interest in the testator's estate. The Plaintiff's interest therefore, would entirely cease upon the death of the husband in the lifetime of the wife. The testator having by his will given the interest to his wife, the Plaintiff, the assignee of the husband sought by his bill to establish a claim against the estate of the wife. The cause proceeds to a hearing, and at the hearing, one or more points are decided, and an account is directed. At the hearing the Plaintiff had the same contingent and terminable interest which he had when he filed his bill, and an account was directed. The account proceeds to a certain extent but pending the proceedings in the Master's office [614] when the Master was preparing his report, the husband died, leaving his wife surviving him; there was consequently an entire cessation of all interest on the part of the Plaintiff. I do not understand why he should have thought it fit to proceed in the Master's office when the interest in respect of which he instituted the suit had ceased, nor how it was that the Master who had been informed of the state of things, permitted the Plaintiff to proceed or take any steps in the cause. It has been stated at the Bar, and I do not doubt with truth, that the Plaintiff's object in proceeding was, in some way or other (though not in a regular mode), to obtain his costs of the suit; he however made it necessary for the Defendants to apply to the Court to stay the proceedings.

I am by no means satisfied that the Defendants, finding the suit prosecuted by a person who had no interest, might not have made an application of another kind. The application they made (which they were entitled to) was to restrain the proceedings of a person who had ceased to have any interest whatever in the subject of the suit.

The question having arisen whether the Plaintiff was entitled to his costs, he brought it before the Court by petition. Just consider how the case would have stood if the Plaintiff had been permitted to pursue the course he was adopting.

he parties had not intercepted him. Suppose he had brought the cause on for saving on further directions; there would have been a Plaintiff without any interest whatever in the matter, and I do not know what could have been done, but to dismiss the bill. I do not see what right the Plaintiff could have had to claim costs up to the hearing of the cause, when confessedly he had no right whatever to any relief. The Plaintiff having no interest whatever, and [615] the sole object of the bill being to secure an interest which he expected to have, could not be entitled to costs. It is as well that such a course was not adopted, and that a petition which is much shorter and less expensive mode of obtaining the decision of the Court on his question, was presented.

The Plaintiff says that there are special circumstances in this case, and, that for that reason, he ought to have the costs. Now I will not deny that cases may possibly be found, in which, having regard to the interests of infants—of unascertained persons of various kinds—and other special circumstances, the Court has not thought fit to give to other persons the substantial benefit of the proceedings, without giving to the person whose interest has ceased the costs which he has incurred in securing the benefit to others. (See Thomason v. Moses, 5 Beav. 77.) There may possibly be such cases, but what the Plaintiff says is, first, that the suit was for the administration of assets, and that it must, therefore, be assumed that such a suit must be beneficial to all persons interested in the estate. Secondly, that whether this be true as a general rule or not, yet I must assume it to be so in this particular case, because the Defendants who are interested in the assets, finding this bill in prosecution, have by their answers claimed rights of their own, saying, if any relief be granted to the Plaintiff, we, the Defendants, desire to have a particular benefit resulting from it for ourselves; and, thirdly, it is said that the proceedings have succeeded in the Master's office so far as to charge the executrix.

I am of opinion that none of these circumstances entitle the Plaintiff to any order in respect of his costs. [616] In the first place, I do not agree that a bill filed for the administration of assets must, of necessity, be beneficial for all persons interested in the estate. It often turns out to be very much the contrary. I believe a bill for the administration of assets is, in a sense, generally beneficial for the executor, for he can get a complete exoneration in that way, and in no other. (Knatchbull v. Fearnhead, 3 Myl. & Cr. 122; Low v. Carter, 1 Beavan, 426; Hill v. Lomme, 1 Beavan, 540); but if it be a benefit which the executor does not want, I do not think a suit for administration must necessarily be for the benefit of all persons interested in the assets; on the contrary, it may occasion much delay, expense, and vexation to them, in various ways, and notwithstanding the accurate mode in which the account is taken, it may be extremely prejudicial. In the next place, where a bill is filed by a person who desires to have an account of assets taken, charging the accounting parties with various defaults and breaches of trust, and the persons beneficially interested in the estate claim, by their answer, such benefit as they may be entitled to, I do not think that such a claim is to be considered such an approbation of the suit, or such an adoption of the proceedings as to subject either the assets or the executors to the costs of the suit. Thirdly, as to the personal charge against the executrix in the Master's office, I have no evidence whatever before me; I find the persons who would be entitled to the benefit of this charge joining in the petition to stay the proceedings, and there is nothing in the former part of the proceedings which pledges them to an adoption of the suit, come of it what may.

Looking at the case altogether, I think that the Plaintiff did file his bill, at the risk and upon the chance [617] of his continuing to have at the hearing of the cause that right, which he very fairly alleged he had at the commencement. I must add, that I do not think it is by any means clear that if he had brought the cause to a hearing while his interest continued, he would have been entitled to costs; it does not appear to me to be clear, it is possible that he might, but that would depend upon circumstances, the evidence and the report; these are matters upon which I cannot now form a proper opinion.

The Plaintiff's interest having altogether ceased, and there being no special circumstances in this case, which in my opinion, entitle him to be reimbursed, by the other party, those costs which were incurred for his own benefit, I must refuse this application with costs. The other petition to stay proceedings does not ask for costs, and I must simply make an order according to the prayer of it.

[617] EGREMONT v. COWELL. Jan. 11, 18, 1843.

A demurrer is considered as set down, from the time when the order for setting it down is carried into the registrar's office, and not from the time of its entry in the registrar's book.

The question in this cause arose under the 34th Order of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 174.)

The twelve days limited by that order for the Plaintiff to set down the demurrer, expired on the 1st of January 1843, which was on Sunday; and it being in the Vacation, the Plaintiff, on the following day (Monday the 2d of January), left the order for setting down the demurrer [618] with a clerk in the registrar's office, but the demurrer was not actually set down in the registrar's book until Tuesday the 3d.

By the order in question it is ordered, "That where the Defendant shall file a demurrer to the whole bill, the demurrer shall be held sufficient, and the Plaintiff be held to have submitted thereto, unless the Plaintiff shall, within twelve days from the expiration of the time allowed to the Defendant for filing such demurrer, cause the same to be set down for argument."

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Beavan moved, that the demurrer having been submitted to, the costs of the suit might be taxed and paid by the Plaintiff.

They argued that there had not been a setting down of the demurrer within the time, and that under the 34th Order the Plaintiff must be considered to have submitted thereto, unless, upon a special application to be made by him, the Court should think fit to relieve him from the effect of the 34th Order.

That the order required the Plaintiff, "to cause the demurrer to be set down, and it therefore became the duty of the Plaintiff's solicitor, not only to take the order into the registrar's office, but to see that the demurrer was actually set down in the book, and which he had not done in this case.

They referred to Charlton v. Richmond (4 Beav. 397) decided as shewing that the twelve days did not mean office days.

[619] Mr. Koe and Mr. Shea, for the Plaintiff, were not heard by

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS who said, he would make enquiry as to what had really taken place, for there appeared some inconsistency on the affidavits.

Jan. 18. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after stating the facts as ascertained by him from the officers of the Court said,

The whole is reduced to this, whether a Plaintiff who obtains an order for setting down a demurrer, and leaves it within the limited time at the registrar's office has not complied with the order.

I am clearly of opinion that he has. I must consider this demurrer as set down from the time when the order was delivered to the clerk at the registrar's office, and as there was no surprise or prejudice to the Defendant, I must refuse the motion with costs.

It appeared in the course of this motion, that it was the practice of the registrar's office not to allow an inspection of the book of causes until the commencement of the term; so that it could not be ascertained what causes, &c., had been set down between the two terms, or when they had been entered.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS disapproved of the practice and expressed a wish that it might be altered, so that the public and the suitors of the Court might not be excluded from the opportunity of ascertaining the real state of the cause book.

statement "that the Defendant alleges and the Plaintiff believes the fact to be," is not a sufficient allegation of a material fact. A bill was, at the hearing, held defective for want of parties, and stood over. Another bill was filed, stating that at the hearing the sole Plaintiff was dead, and stating circumstances intended to remove the objection for want of parties, and praying the discharge of the former order and a revivor. A demurrer for want of parties was sustained.

The original cause is reported in a former volume (1 Beav. 529). It was a suit by a pauper for foreclosure and redemption, and one of the mortgages having been made to Greenwood and Bollond, and the latter being dead, it was objected that his personal representatives were necessary parties, on the ground that they were tenants in common of the mortgage money. The objection was allowed, and it was ordered, that the case should stand over with liberty to the Plaintiff to amend, by adding parties with apt words to charge them, and bring on the case to a hearing as she should be advised."

It turned out, that at the former hearing, Mrs. Vickers the sole Plaintiff had been dead nearly a twelvemonth.

A new bill was now filed by the representative of the Plaintiff, which stated, that at the former hearing the sole Plaintiff was dead, and alleged that the order then made was irregular.

The bill then went on to state that Greenwood and Bollond were trustees of a matrimonial settlement of a sum of £6000, "and that the Defendant Greenwood alleged, and the Plaintiff believed the fact to be," that the sum of money lent on mortgage was part of the trust funds comprised in the settlement, and that Greenwood and Bollond were jointly interested in the mortgage money, and that the Plaintiff was advised that the mort-[621]-gage money survived to Greenwood, and submitted that Bollond's representatives were not necessary parties.

The bill prayed that the suit might be revived, and that the order made on the previous hearing might be discharged, &c.

The Defendant Cowell demurred, on the ground that Bollond's representatives had not been made parties.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Beavan, in support of the demurrer, contended that there was no sufficient allegation that Greenwood and Bollond were joint-tenants of the mortgage money; for the statement was, that Greenwood stated, and the Plaintiff believed the facts to be so; but this was a mere statement by Greenwood in his own favour, and of the belief of the Plaintiff therein; that this was not a distinct allegation of the fact, and in cases of this kind the statement was to be taken most strongly against the pleader; Balls v. Margrave (3 Beav. 284).

Mr. Koe and Mr. Shea, contra, contended that the allegation of fact, being one relating to the Defendant's case was sufficiently alleged; and, secondly, that a Defendant could not demur to a bill of revivor for want of parties, the object of which species of bill was to place the pleadings in the same state as they were at the time of the abatement; Metcalf v. Metcalf (1 Keen, 74).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. When it was ascertained that this suit had abated before the hearing, the first and proper thing to be done was to revive the suit, and then to consider what was to be done as to the objection for want of parties.

[622] When this cause came on for hearing, an objection was made for want of parties, which was sustained because the mortgage was made to two, and it did not appear that each was not interested in the mortgage money; it is quite clear that a suit could not proceed in that state. It was ordered to stand over, with liberty to add parties. The usual order made in such cases is, that the Plaintiff shall add parties or shew that they are not necessary; the latter clause was not inserted in the order on this occasion, though it would have been if the order had been drawn up carefully.

If it had, nothing would have been more simple than to have revived the suit, and then to apply for leave to amend to shew that it was not necessary to add parties.

We have this singular proceeding; the bill now filed states the abatement, states that the case came on for hearing, that an objection was then made for want of parties, and was allowed, and that it was afterwards discovered that there had been a complete abatement by the death of the sole Plaintiff, and that the order then made was not regular; and it states, by way of supplement certain matters by which the conclusion is attempted to be drawn, that the personal representatives of Bollond are not necessary or proper parties. To this it is said by the Plaintiff that this is not done with reference to that part of the prayer of the bill which asks that the Plaintiff may have the full benefit of all the proceedings in the suit up to the death of Mrs. Vickers, but with reference to the statement that the personal representatives of Bollond are not necessary parties according to the statements in this supplemental bill.

This is not a case of simple abatement with a right to revive, but is one mixed up with circumstances now for the first time introduced, and which brings [623] forward facts shewing that it is not necessary to make these persons parties who by original bill were not made parties.

It is not a sufficient allegation to say that one Defendant alleges, and the Plaintiff believes a statement to be true, the Defendant may allege that which is quite false and the Plaintiff may believe it to be true, but this is not a sufficient allegation on the part of the Plaintiff of that fact.

The demurrer must be allowed with costs, and liberty must be given to amend.

After answer, and after liberty to amend had been refused, a suit abated by the death of the Plaintiff. The executors filed an original bill of a similar nature. The Court stayed the proceedings in the second suit, until the costs in the first had been paid.

The original bill was filed by two Plaintiffs in 1836 to set aside a purchase, alleged to have been made by a trustee, thirty years ago. After all the answers had been filed, a special application was made to amend, which was refused. Both the Plaintiffs died, and the suit having thereby become abated, the executors of the last surviving Plaintiff, instead of reviving the suit, filed a new bill in respect of the same matters.

It was now, in effect, moved by the Defendants in the second suit, that the second bill might be taken off the file for irregularity, or that the proceedings in the second suit might be stayed until the Plaintiffs had paid the costs of the first suit. The notice of motion, however, was considered by the Court, as unnecessarily long and complicated.

[624] The first suit was attached to the Court of the Vice-Chancellor of England, and the second was attached to the Rolls.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Craig, in support of the motion. There having been no decree, the Plaintiffs alone have the right of reviving the original suit. If they adopt their testator's right of suit, they must follow up his proceedings; they cannot seek the same relief by a second independent suit, without abandoning the former proceedings, and paying the costs of the abandoned suit. Defendants are not to be vexed with two suits for the same cause. They cited Chowick v. Dimes (3 Beavan, 290; and see Dryden v. Walford, 1 Y. & C. (N. C.), 625, and Lee v. Lee, 1 Hare, 617).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. S. Jones, contra. The Defendants are not entitled to what they ask. They ought to have applied to the Vice-Chancellor of England in the first suit, for an order similar to that made in Chowick v. Dimes.

It does not follow that if the first suit had been prosecuted to a hearing, the Defendants would have been found entitled to the costs of it. It cannot therefore, on this application, be assumed that they are entitled to them. Another objection that the Plaintiffs in the second suit, sue not only as representatives of their ancestor, but in another character.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is a motion, made on the part of four of the Defendants, that the bill may be taken off the file of this Court, with costs to be paid by the Plaintiffs, or that all proceedings in the cause against the four De-[625]-fendants may be stayed until the Plaintiffs shall have paid to the Defendants their costs of the first suit.

The first bill was filed on the 22d of November 1836 by James Altree and Edward Stephen Altree. The answers of all the Defendants, except one, were filed in 1837, and the answer of the remaining Defendant was obtained on the 19th of January 1838. In July 1839, upon a motion made before His Honor the Vice-Chancellor of England, leave was given to the Plaintiffs to amend their bill. That order was afterwards discharged by the Lord Chancellor upon appeal, so that the Plaintiffs not being at liberty to amend their bill, were under the necessity either of proceeding with the bill as it then stood, or of filing a new bill, which they could only do, as I apprehend, by dismissing the first bill with costs. What they, however, did, under the circumstances, was to obtain leave, by an order of course, to amend the bill by joining parties, and they made that amendment.

In that state of things, James Altree, one of the Plaintiffs, died, and the suit was then sustained by the single remaining Plaintiff, Edward Stephen Altree. After the death of James Altree the answer of the new Defendants was, on the 24th of January 1840, put in, and on the 17th of March 1842 the surviving Plaintiff Edward Stephen Altree died. The suit therefore became wholly abated. According to my understanding of the practice of the Court (as to which, however, I ought to speak with deference, because I understand there are different opinions upon the point), it was at that time competent for the Defendants to move, as against the executors of the surviving Plaintiff, that the bill might be revived within a limited time, or that the bill might be dismissed. I do not think they would have obtained a more favourable answer. They did not [626] take that course, but seem to have waited to see what answer would be adopted by those who succeeded to the interest of the deceased Plaintiff.

On the 17th of November 1842 the executors of the surviving Plaintiff filed a new bill, and I think that I can only treat it as such a bill as might have resulted from an amendment of the original bill; for the transaction, in respect of which the relief is sought by the second bill, is precisely the same, and although there are other different portions of relief which are sought by it, yet, generally speaking, the relief is of the same sort as that asked by the first bill. It has not, in any way, been stated to me, that the second bill differs from a bill which might have resulted from an amendment of the original bill.

The second bill having been filed on the 17th of November last, the present application is made, and the question is, what ought now to be done. Considering the second bill to be such a bill as might have resulted from an amendment of the former bill if permission to amend had not been refused, it cannot surely be contended that those who are seeking to have the benefit of the former proceedings, and who founded their allegations in the second bill upon the statements made in the answer to the first bill, are entitled to all the benefit of the former proceedings, and, at the same time, to lay them aside, in such a manner as to deprive the Defendants of the opportunity of applying, in any stage of the cause, for relief in respect of the costs to which they have been subjected: nor can it be contended that the Plaintiffs are to be at liberty to adopt the former proceedings for their benefit:—that they are to come in and subject themselves to the jurisdiction of the Court, and seek its exercise as against the De-[627]-fendants, and yet that they are not to be subject to the costs of anything that has hitherto been done. I confess nothing appears to me to be more reasonable than to ask that the Plaintiffs may not be allowed to prosecute this new suit until they have paid the costs of the former suit; and unless I find some difficulty which I am not now aware of, I think there is in this Court sufficient jurisdiction to say that these Plaintiffs shall not be at liberty to prosecute this suit, founded as it is upon the former suit, and seeking, though not precisely the same relief, yet relief founded on the same transaction, without first relieving the Defendants from the costs which have been incurred in the former suit. I think it is no answer to say, that if that former suit had been prosecuted, the Defendants might not have obtained costs—very possibly it might be so. That suit might, after a simple bill of revivor, have been brought to a hearing, and the Defendants might not have obtained costs; on the contrary, they might have had to pay the costs; nevertheless I think that the Plaintiffs, who alone have the power of prosecuting the original suit, are not to be permitted to adopt these proceedings for their own benefit, and at the same time to abandon them to the detriment of the Defendants in such a manner as to deprive them of every opportunity of bringing under the consideration of the Court their right to the costs.

The order will be according to the first part of the notice of motion, which is that proceedings in the second cause may be stayed until the costs of the first are paid; but, though I think it is very probable that no direct authorities can be found on the point, I shall suspend my opinion for a little while as to the other part of the notice of motion.

[628] I think that the form of the notice of motion is too complicated, and on that ground no costs of the motion ought to be given.

Dec. 22. Mr. Pemberton having asked for judgment in this cause,

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, my opinion remains the same. Upon the best consideration I can give the matter I think the Defendants are entitled to have the second suit stayed till the costs of the first are paid. I consider the matter in the same light as if the Plaintiffs in the original cause had filed an original bill to take advantage of all the proceedings in the first suit in which leave to amend had been refused, and had thereby abandoned the first suit, without paying the costs of it. I think in such a state of things the Defendants would have been entitled to stay the proceedings in the second suit until the costs of the first had been paid. I think this is the minor relief the Defendants are entitled to, for I will not say the Defendants may not hereafter be entitled to have the second bill taken off the file.

I give no costs in consequence of the complication of the notice of motion. (1)

[629] HARE v. HARE. April 4, 1843.

The testator appointed his widow and two other persons guardians of his child.

By a codicil, he "left their care, charge, and education" to his widow. Held, that the appointment by the will of guardians was not revoked by the codicil. Practice in a suit to establish a will where one of the witnesses is abroad.

By his will, dated in August 1839, the testator nominated and appointed John Charles Hare and Marcus Theodore Hare executors of that his will, and, jointly with his wife, guardians of all his children except his son Augustus.

By a codicil, dated in January 1842, the testator left the care, charge, and education of his three eldest children Francis George Hare, William Robert Hare, and Anna Frances Maria Louisa Hare, to his wife Anne Frances Hare, and he begged the executors named in his said will to pay the said Anne Frances Hare such sum of money, from time to time, as they should think necessary for the purposes aforesaid. As to his fourth child Augustus Hare, he placed him entirely under the joint management of the widow of his late brother Augustus William Hare, and of his brother Rev. Julius Charles Hare.

The bill, amongst other things, sought to establish the will as to the real estate. One of the witnesses was residing out of the jurisdiction. His handwriting proved, as was also the fact of his being out of the jurisdiction, and the execution of the will was proved by the other witness.

The questions were, first, whether the will was sufficiently proved; and, secondly, whether, under the codicil, the wife had the sole guardianship of the three children.

[630] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Hull, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Tinney suggested the proper mode was, not to declare the will well proved, but to enter the evidence as read, and direct the trusts of the will to be carried into execution.

Mr. R. W. E. Forster, for the widow.

Mr. Rolt, for another party.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] thought that such was the proper mode, and said he was of opinion the appointment of guardian by the will was not asked by the direction in the codicil, that the widow should have the care, charge, and education of the three children.(1)

[630] HANBURY v. SPOONER. June 13, 1843.

aged executor, who was incapable by bodily and mental infirmity of proving the will: Held, not entitled to a legacy given by the testator's will to him as executor.

The testator appointed Mr. Ireland and three other persons the executors of his will, and he gave to each of them the sum of £500."

The testator died in March 1839.

With respect to Mr. Ireland the Master by his report found as follows:—"Ireland died in 1841 in his eighty-second year, without having proved the testator's will, having been, during the whole period which intervened [631] between the time of the said testator's death and his own death, from mental as well as bodily infirmity, wholly incapable of undertaking the duty of executor to the said testator."

The question was, whether Mr. Ireland was, under the circumstances, entitled to the legacy of £500.

Mr. James Parker, in support of the claim. To disentitle an executor, he must be able to prove the will; the fact of not having obtained probate is not, of itself, sufficient. The rule is thus stated in Piggott v. Green (6 Sim. 74): "Where a legacy is given to an executor, prima facie it is given to him for his trouble, and if he refuses to execute the office, he is not entitled to it." Probate alone will not entitle an executor; see Jard v. Browning (1 Cox, 302). Though one only of several executors proves, the others must be joined in an action at law. This shews that at law they all sustain the character of executors.

There is another principle which applies to this case; where a condition is imposed on a party, which, by the act of God he is unable to perform, the party is excused: see Payne's case (1 Coke's Rep. 97); 3 Com. Dig. Condition, 125. He also cited Harrison v. Wyley (4 Ves. 212); Brydges v. Wotton (1 Ves. & B. 134).

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. G. Turner, Mr. Simons, Mr. Chapman, Mr. Chandless, Mr. Lewin, for other parties, were not called on by

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], who was of opinion that this legacy was not payable. (See Calvert v. Sebbon, 4 Beavan, 222, and the cases cited in the notes.)

Discussion of the question whether a sovereign prince is liable to the jurisdiction of the Courts of a foreign country, in which he happens to be resident, and as to his liability to suit of one who unites in himself the characters both of an independent foreign sovereign and a subject.

A sovereign prince, resident in the dominions of another, is ordinarily exempt from the jurisdiction of the Courts there.

A foreign sovereign may sue in this country, both at law and in equity; and, if he sues in equity, he submits himself to the jurisdiction, and a cross-bill may be filed against him, which he must answer on oath; but a foreign sovereign does not submit to filing a bill in Chancery against A., making himself liable to be sued in that Court for an independent matter by B.

The King of Hanover, after his accession, renewed his oath of allegiance to the Queen of England, and claimed the rights of an English peer. Held, that he was exempt from the jurisdiction of the English Courts for acts done by him as a sovereign prince, but was liable to be sued in those Courts in respect of matters done by him as a subject. Held, also, that the sovereign character prevailed where the acts were done abroad, and also where it was doubtful in which of the characters they had been done.

A foreign sovereign prince, who was also an English peer, was made a Defendant in a suit and served with a letter missive. The Lord Chancellor refused to receive the bill. The Defendant then appeared, and filed a demurrer for want of jurisdiction. Held, first, that the Lord Chancellor had not decided that the Defendant was liable to the jurisdiction of the Court; and, secondly, that the Defendant had not, by appearing, waived any defence to the bill.

A bill, filed by Charles, ex-Duke of Brunswick, against the King of Hanover (a subject of this realm), stated, that by a decree of the Germanic Diet, followed by a declaration of his Agnati, he had been deposed, and his brother appointed successor, and that by an instrument signed by the reigning duke and by William the First and his brothers, the Duke of Cambridge had been appointed guardian, of the Plaintiff's fortune, and the guardianship "was to be legally established in Brunswick, where it was to have its locality." That on the death of William the Fourth, the King of Hanover was appointed guardian, and possessed himself of the private property of the Plaintiff. The bill alleged that the instrument was void, and prayed a declaration to that effect, and for an account. Held, that the alleged acts under the instrument, were not such as rendered the Defendant liable to be sued or subject to the jurisdiction of this Court.

It is also, that the instrument complained of was, under the circumstances stated in the bill, connected with political and State transactions, and was a State document. In a suit against a sovereign prince, who is also a subject, the bill ought, upon the face of it, to shew a case rendering the sovereign prince liable to be sued as a subject.

A simple allegation that a foreign instrument depending on foreign law is null and void, is too vague.

This case came on upon general demurrer to the bill filed by Charles Duke of Brunswick against the King of Hanover.

[2] The bill stated that in September 1830 the Plaintiff was the Sovereign reigning Duke of Brunswick; that, in his private capacity, the Plaintiff was possessed of real and personal property in England and elsewhere to a very considerable amount.

That, on the 6th of September 1830, a revolutionary movement took place at Brunswick, in the course of which the Government was overthrown. That a decree of the Germanic Diet of Confederation was made, on the 2d of December 1830, whereby the Plaintiff's brother, William Duke of Brunswick, was invited to take upon himself, provisionally, the Government of the said duchy, and the Diet left it to the legitimate agnati of the Plaintiff to provide for the future Government of the said duchy.

That in February 1831 His late Majesty King William the Fourth and the said William Duke of Brunswick, claiming to be the legitimate agnati of the Plaintiff, caused to be published a declaration whereby they purported to depose the Plaintiff from the throne of the said duchy, and declared that the throne had passed to the said William Duke of Brunswick; and that, in consequence, the Plaintiff's brother had ever since exercised [3] the rights, powers, and authorities of Sovereign Duke of Brunswick.

That, in the year 1833, the following instrument in writing, signed by King William the Fourth and William Duke of Brunswick, was promulgated by them:—We, William the Fourth, by the grace of God King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and of Ireland and of Hanover, Duke of Brunswick and of Lunebourg, and we, William, by the grace of God Duke of Brunswick and of Lunebourg, make known what follows:—Moved by the interests of our house, whose well-being is dear to us, and yielding to a painful but inevitable necessity, have thought it necessary to consider what measures the interests (rightly understood) of His Highness the Duke of Brunswick, the preservation of the fortune now in his hands, the safety and illegality of the enterprises pursued by the said duke, and lastly, the honour and dignity of our house may require; and after having heard the advice of a commission charged by us with the examination into this affair, and after having weighed and exactly balanced all points of fact and law; and whereas, after the dissolution of the German Empire, the powers of supreme guardianship over the affairs of the empire, which, up to that period, had appertained to the emperor, devolved to the heads of sovereign states; we, taking into consideration the laws and customs, and by virtue of the rights unto us belonging, in quality of heads of the two houses of our house, have decreed as follows:—

"Article the first. Certain facts, either notorious or sufficiently proved, have led us to arrive at the conviction that His Highness Duke Charles is, at this time, squandering the fortune which he possesses in enterprises alike impossible and dangerous to himself and [4] other persons, and is seeking to damage the just claims which persons interested now or hereafter may legally have upon his property; we have consequently considered that the only method of preserving the fortune of His Highness Duke Charles from total ruin, is to appoint a guardian over him.

"Article the 2d. In consequence of this conviction, we decree that Charles Duke of Brunswick shall be deprived of the management and administration of his fortune. A guardian shall be appointed, whom we shall choose by mutual consent from among the very noble or noble male ascendants of our house, although the right of choice belongs to the legitimate Sovereign of the Duchy of Brunswick in virtue of his title alone.

"Article the 3d. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Viceroy of Hanover, having declared that he will willingly accept such guardianship, we confer the same to His Royal Highness by the present decree, which he will be pleased to consider as constituting his title to such guardianship.

"Article the 4th. As His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge cannot, reason of his position, by himself alone, exercise the functions of guardian; he is authorised to limit himself to the functions of supreme guardian, and to substitute for the management and administration of the property, one or more persons, who, under oath, will proceed in their own name and on their own personal responsibility to make an inventory of the same, and to take measures for the preservation and administration of the fortune placed under the guardianship of His Royal Highness the supreme guardian, who is to be at liberty to grant to them fees proportionate to their duties.

[5] "Article the 5th. The administrators shall render an annual account of the management to His Royal Highness the supreme guardian, who shall be asked to transmit the same to us, that we may cause the same to be settled and approved. Our confirmation shall be applied for, in all cases wherein the laws require the consent of the supreme guardian.

"Article the 6th. The guardianship is to be considered as legally established in Brunswick, where it is to have its locality.

"Article the 7th. The present decree shall be published in the bulletins of the laws of the kingdom, in accordance with the usual forms, and all whom the same concern are bound to render obedience thereto. Given at our Palace of St. James the 6th of February 1833, and at Brunswick the 14th of March 1833. We have signed with our proper hands and have placed our seal.

"WILLIAM (L. S.).

"WILLIAM, DUKE (L. S.).

"The Baron Ompteda de Schleinitz."

That at the foot of the said instrument was a note signed by the Defendant (the Duke of Cumberland), and by the Dukes of Sussex and Cambridge, which was as follows:—"The undersigned have acknowledged, with gratitude, the foregoing arrangement, adopted by His Majesty in accordance with His Highness the reigning Duke of Brunswick, in the interests, well advised, of His Highness the Duke of Brunswick, for the preservation of the fortune remaining in his hands, for the maintenance of the public peace in the Duchy of Brunswick and in the Kingdom of Hanover, and for the honour and dignity of the great house of [6] Brunswick-Lüneburg, another proof of the foresight of His Majesty and of His Highness for the well-being of that house. We solemnly attest this declaration by these present signed with our hand, and to which we have placed our seals. London, 6th February 1833, ERNEST (L. S.); Kensington, 3d February 1833, AUGUSTUS FREDERICK (L. S.); Hanover, 13th February 1833, ADOLPHE (L. S.)."

The bill then stated, that the Plaintiff was advised, as the fact was, that the instrument was absolutely void and of no effect, but that nevertheless the Duke of Cambridge accepted the appointment of supreme guardian of the Plaintiff's fortune and property; that he took possession of the real estates to which the Plaintiff was entitled in his private capacity, at Brunswick, and took possession of all such part of the Plaintiff's property in Brunswick and elsewhere of a personal nature, as he could discover, and to the amount of several hundred thousand pounds in the whole; that he sold and converted several parts thereof into money, and made certain payments on account of the Plaintiff and of his property; but that after allowing for such payments there remained in his hands a very large surplus unaccounted for. That the William the Fourth died on the 20th of June 1837; and thereupon, the present Defendant became King of Hanover; and the Duke of Cambridge having resigned his pointment of guardian, by some instrument in writing to which the Defendant was party, and which was signed by him and by William Duke of Brunswick, the Defendant was purported to be appointed guardian of the Plaintiff, and of his fortune and property, in the place of the Duke of Cambridge, under the instrument of the 6th of February, and the 14th of March 1833, and with all the same powers and authorities were thereby purported to be conferred on the Duke of Cambridge; that the Duke of Cambridge accounted for [7] his receipts and payments to the Defendant, and paid the balance; that the Defendant took possession of the Plaintiff's property, and received large sums of money on account thereof, and had thereout made some payments on account of the Plaintiff, but that a very large balance or surplus, to the amount of several hundred thousand pounds, remained due from the Defendant to the Plaintiff on account thereof, and that the Defendant refused to comply with the Plaintiff's application for an account thereof.

The bill charged that the instrument of the 6th of February and the 14th of March 1833, and the appointment of the Duke of Cambridge as guardian, and the pointment of the Defendant as guardian, were wholly invalid, according to the law, as well of Brunswick and of Hanover as of Great Britain, but that, under colour thereof, the Duke of Cambridge and the Defendant, respectively, took possession of the Plaintiff's property on his behalf, and not adversely; that by the law of England, the appointments of guardians and all the rights thereby purported to be given were valid, even if the same were valid by the law of Brunswick; and that if the same were valid at the time when the same were issued, having regard to the circumstances and situation of the Plaintiff at the time (which, however, the Plaintiff denied), there was nothing, in the circumstances or conduct or state of mind of the Plaintiff, to deprive him from the full right and power of enjoyment and disposition of his property.

The bill charged that the Defendant was liable to account to the Plaintiff for the receipts and payments, acts, neglects, and defaults of himself and his agents, under colour of his alleged appointment as such guardian as aforesaid.

[8] That the Duke of Cambridge, after becoming guardian, appointed three persons administrators or managers under him, who had been continued by the Defendant, and who made inventories of the Plaintiff's property, and from time to time accounted to the Defendant for their receipts and paid over the balances.

The bill specified certain property taken possession of by the Duke of Cambridge by the Defendant, and stated, that in 1833 and 1834 the Plaintiff was resident in France, and that the Duke of Cambridge, as guardian, attached his property there, and that the French Courts declared that the demand of the Duke of Cambridge was justifiable and without legal foundation, and they removed the attachments, and awarded to the Plaintiff damages, together with the costs of the proceedings, the amount of which the Plaintiff recovered from the Duke of Cambridge, by an action in Common Pleas here, to which he submitted. The bill also charged that the damages and costs, amounting to about £6000, had been paid out of the Plaintiff's personal estate.

The bill stated, that in November 1830, the Plaintiff made a peaceable attempt to take possession of his throne; that while at Osterode in Hanover, for that purpose, he was attacked by a party of armed men, but made his escape, leaving behind him property amounting to £4500, which was delivered to the Duke of Cambridge, and which had been paid over to the Defendant.

The bill charged that the accounts thereby prayed were intricate and complex, and could not properly be taken except in a Court of Equity.

The bill also contained the following charge, "That the Defendant is a peer of the realm, and that his title [9] as such is His Royal Highness Ernest Augustus Duke of Cumberland and Teviotdale in Great Britain, and Earl of Armagh in Ireland; and that since his arrival in this country, and during his late residence here, he has exercised, and now exercises, his rights and privileges as such peer as aforesaid."

The bill prayed a declaration that the instrument of February and March 1833, and the appointment of the Duke of Cambridge as guardian of the Plaintiff's property, and the appointment of the Defendant were void; and that the Defendant might account to the Plaintiff for the property possessed by him, or by any person by his order, &c., since his appointment, including that which had been accounted for to the Defendant by the Duke of Cambridge; and that the Defendant might pay to the Plaintiff the balance found due from him on taking such account, the Plaintiff thereby offering, on taking such account, to make to the Defendant all just allowances.

The Defendant being resident in England, was served with a letter missive, whereupon an application was made, on his behalf, to the Lord Chancellor to discharge it, but which was unsuccessful. (1)

[10] The Defendant thereupon demurred to the bill, first for want of equity, and secondly on the ground that this Court "had no jurisdiction to grant relief or discovery, as to all or any of the matters or things in the said bill stated and alleged."

The demurrer now came on for argument.

Sir Charles Wetherell, Mr. Pemberton Leigh, and Mr. Elmsley, in support of the demurrer. The Defendant, who is a recognised independent sovereign, is not amenable to the jurisdiction of this Court. The law of nations, founded on principle of public policy, grants to an individual of this rank while in a foreign country immunity from process. Vattel, who treats of this subject says (Book 4, ch. 7, § 108), "We cannot introduce in any more proper place, an important question of the law of nations which is nearly allied to the right of embassies. It is asked, what are the rights of a sovereign who happens to be in a foreign country, and how the master of the country is to treat him? If that prince be come to negotiate or to treat about some public affair, he is doubtless entitled in a more eminent degree, to enjoy all the rights of ambassadors. If he be come as a traveller, his dignity alone, and the respect due to the nation which he represents and governs, shelters him from all insult, gives him a claim to respect and attention of every kind, and exempts him from all jurisdiction. On his making himself known, he cannot be treated as subject to the common laws, for it is not to be presumed that he has consented to such a subjection, and if prince will not suffer him in his dominions on that footing, he should give him notice of his [11] intentions. But if the foreign prince forms any plot against the safety and welfare of the State—in a word, if he acts as an enemy, he may very justly be treated as such. In every other case he is entitled to full security, since even a private individual of a foreign nation has a right to expect it."

"A ridiculous notion has possessed the minds even of persons who deem themselves of superior understanding to the common herd of mankind. They think that a sovereign who enters a foreign country without permission, may be arrested there; but on what reason can such an act of violence be grounded? The absurdity of the doctrine carries its own refutation on the face of it."

Though a foreign sovereign may sue as Plaintiff in the Courts of this country, the general proposition that he may be sued has never been laid down. The dictum in Calvin's case (7 Rep. 15 b.), the case in Selden (Table Talk, Law, 3), and the case Hullett v. The King of Spain (4 Russ. 225 and 560. 1 Dow & Cl. 169, and 2 R. (N. S.), 31. 1 R. & M. 9, n. 1 Cl. & Fin. 333, and 7 Bli. 359), which will be cited by the Plaintiff, do not warrant the proposition. In Calvin's case, it is said that a foreign king shall sue and be sued by the name of a king; but no instance is there cited of a sovereign being sued except that of Baliol King of Scotland, who was feudatory to the King of England, and as such was liable to the jurisdiction of his acknowledged

(1) The Lord Chancellor (on that occasion) said:—

This application is informal, the petition not being intitled in the cause, and on this ground alone I might dismiss the application. But upon the main point, namely, whether a letter missive ought to have been issued in this case, the Defendant is a peer of the realm, has taken the oath of allegiance to the sovereign, and his seat is in the House of Peers, and at present is resident here. I am of opinion, therefore, without reference to the more general question, that the letter missive was, in this case, properly issued. My attention was directed to the bill in this case, but I do not think I can look at the nature or subject of the suit, in deciding a question respecting the regularity of the process issued for the purpose of obtaining an appearance.

rior lord. Calvin's case shews that a king carries with him to a foreign country his privileges. It is said, "And hereof there is a notable precedent in Fleta, lib. cap. 3, sect. 9, where treating of the jurisdiction of the King's Court of Marshalsea, it is said, et hæc omnia ex officio suo licite facere poterit (ss. Seneschal' aul' hospitii) [12] non obstante alicujus libertate, etiam in alieno regno dum tamen reus in hospitio regis poterit inveniri secundum quod contingit Paris. anno 14 Ed. 1, de Helamo de Nogent capto in hospitio regis Angl' (ipso rege tunc apud Parisiam existente) cum discis argenti furatis recenter super facto, rege Franc' tunc presente, unde licet curia regis Franc' de præd' latrone per castellanum Paris. petita fuerit, ita hinc et inde tractatibus in consilio regis Franc' tandem consideratum fuit; sed Rex Angl' illa regia prerogativa, et hospitii sui privilegio uteretur, et gauderet, coram Roberto Fitz-John milite tunc hospitii regis Angl' Seneschallo de latrocinio victus, per considerationem, ejus cur, fuit (Moore, 798, 799), suspensus in patibulo ut Germani de pratis. Which proveth, that though the king be in a foreign kingdom, yet he is judged in law a king there."

The case in Selden is not an authority for this proceeding. It was referred to by Lord Thurlow in The Nabob of the Carnatic v. The East India Company (1 Ves. jun. 386), and appears by the note to that case, where it is stated, "The Lord Chancellor also observed, that the King of Spain had been once outlawed by Selden's advice to prevent him from taking advantage of his suit: that the outlawry was bad enough; but it was until reversed; therefore it was necessary for him to come in to reverse it, in order to take advantage of his suit. His Lordship said, he could not quote a better authority for this than Selden's Table Talk." The outlawry was therefore bad; besides which, it is clear from the circumstance that the Plaintiff had recovered costs, and the existence of other suits, that the King of Spain had submitted to the jurisdiction. [13] Hullett v. The King of Spain was the case of a cross-bill, (1) in which the King of Spain having, by his original bill, submitted to the jurisdiction, had rendered himself "subject to the control of the Court, and liable to the rules of practice" (1 & Fin. 354); and when the King of Spain "sues here as a Plaintiff, the Court has complete control over him, and may hold him to all proper terms." (1 Dow & Ry. 74.) The decision in The Colombian Government v. Rothschild (1 Sim 94) depended on the same principle.

The privilege of the foreign sovereign is, at least, equal to that of his ambassador, or his representative of the king? Now the Act of Ann (7 Ann, c. 12) is merely declaratory of the common law and of the law of nations. Viveash v. Becker (3 M. & Sel. 298); Lockwood v. Coysgarne (3 Bur. 1676). That statute, after reciting that the King had committed on the Russian Ambassador by publicly arresting him (see 1 Black. 255), "in contempt of the protection granted by Her Majesty, contrary to the law of nations, and in prejudice of the rights and privileges which Ambassadors and other public ministers, authorised and received as such, have, at all times, been thereby possessed of, and ought to be kept sacred and inviolable," it enacts that all writs "whereby the person of any ambassador, or other public minister of any foreign prince or State, authorised and received as such by Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, or the domestic or domestic servant of any such ambassador, or [14] other public minister, may be arrested or imprisoned or his goods or chattels may be distrained, seized, or attached, shall be deemed adjudged to be utterly null and void."

"by the common law and the law of nations," as declared by that statute, the privilege of the ambassador's retinue be privileged, how can it be maintained that the sovereign himself, whom the ambassador represents, is, by that law, entitled to the same respect?

Considerations of public policy must not be disregarded in this question; what would be the consequence of holding a contrary doctrine? If an independent sovereign be subject to the jurisdiction of this Court, he must be liable to the consequences of a disobedience to its process, decrees, and orders; he must necessarily be liable to be attached and subject to personal restraint and incarceration. His imprisonment would cause the suspension of the functions of his Government, and such an act of outrage and aggression committed against a sovereign personally, and through him against his subjects, would inevitably be regarded by them as a casus belli.

The Defendant happens to be a peer of Parliament, and as such is privileged from arrest; but suppose the King of the Belgians or the King of Prussia came to the country on the invitation of the queen, on business of the utmost importance to the interests and peace of the two nations, or if the King of the French, with the reciprocity and courtesy so desirable and advantageous to both countries, were to return the sovereign's late visit, are they and all their retinue to be subject to be thrown in prison on bailable process, issuing out of the Queen's Courts, to answer a demand to which they [15] might not be liable in their own country, and which might ultimately turn out to be without foundation, would the French nation submit to such an insult? The friendly intercourse between sovereigns would be wholly prevented, if, by going to a foreign country, they are to render themselves liable to the most inferior Courts there; the consequences to this country by countenancing such suits might be most disastrous, and the public welfare requires that the consequences should be avoided.

The mere accident of a foreign sovereign being an English peer does not answer the question, his higher recognised dignity must prevail, the regal character cannot be annihilated so as to enable the Plaintiff to sue a party otherwise privileged. If it were necessary, the Court would make a distinction between the acts of a Defendant done as King of Hanover, and those done in his quality of an English peer. This was done in the case of The Nabob of Arcot v. The East India Company, where the Defendants filled the double character of sovereigns and a trading corporation. There the bill was dismissed, on the ground that the whole subject-matter of the suit was a political, and not a mercantile transaction. Here the whole transactions took place abroad, and are of such a nature that they ought to be imputed to the Defendant's regal character.

[16] Again, if the Defendant were liable to the jurisdiction, still he came to the country by the consent of the sovereign, and impliedly under her safe conduct, and he is entitled to the same protection as if the writ itself had been made out, in which case he would be protected from suit. (Registrum Brevium, 23, "volumus et quod idem W. interim sit quietus de omnibus placitis et querelis," &c.)

Secondly, the subject-matter of the suit is not one which is within the limits of forensic jurisdiction. It is one of an imperial and political nature, the guardian is a legitimate act of State emanating from the Germanic body, of which Brunswick is a component part. The Court is incompetent to deal with it.

By the civil law, curators were appointed over prodigals as well as over lunatics. Furiosi quoque et prodigi, licet majores viginti quinque annis sint, tamen in curam adgnatorum ex lege duodecim tabularum. (Justinian Inst. lib. 1, tit. 23.) Previous to the dissolution of the German Empire (1804), the powers of supreme guardianship over the princes of the empire belonged to the emperor. It afterwards devolved on the heads of sovereign states. The deed of curatorship was an act of State by the de facto Duke of Brunswick and the other Agnati, and followed out the decrees of the Germanic Diet and the deposition. What authority has the Rolls Court to deal with such a matter, or with the internal political arrangements of an independent State, or with the decrees of the Germanic Diet, or the imperial powers of the Agnati? How can this Court take on itself to determine these State questions?

(1) 4 B. C. C. 180, 198, and see Moodalay v. Morton, 1 B. C. C. 470, in which Lord Kenyon says, "I admit that no suit will lie in this Court against a sovereign power for anything done in that capacity; but I do not think the East India Company is within that rule. They have rights as a sovereign power, they have also duties as individuals; if they enter into bonds in India, the sums secured may be recovered here. So in this case, as a private company they have entered into a private contract, to which they must be liable."

it assumes jurisdiction, it will become the arbiter of any political transactions that may have taken place abroad, [17] although it is confessedly incompetent to adjudicate on such matters if they had taken place in this country, and although in the country in which the transactions happened the ordinary Courts have no jurisdiction.

The deed of curatorship is simply alleged to be void, but no ground is stated for that conclusion. The Court cannot take judicial cognizance of the law of a foreign country, the law itself must be stated as a fact. It is not alleged that the parties to the document were not the legitimate Agnati, or that they had not the powers which they assumed to exercise. In point of pleading the allegation is insufficient.

Thirdly. Independently of the privileged character of the Defendant, and the political nature of the subject, this Court has no jurisdiction in this case. Here is an act of a forum competens which cannot be questioned in this country; the whole matter has its locality in Brunswick, and there alone must the Plaintiff proceed. By the law of that country, the Plaintiff has been declared to be in such a state as to require a curator; until that decision has been reversed, he has no locus standi in this Court. A lunatic cannot file a bill against his committee for an account, nor can a bankrupt against his assignees; Tarleton v. Hornby (1 Y. & Coll. (Exch.) 172, 333); the proper proceeding is first to supersede the commission. If these transactions had taken place on British soil, the Plaintiff could not have maintained his bill until the deed of curatorship had been first set aside.

But supposing the deed, as is alleged, to be void, the Defendant is a mere wrong-doer. What right then has the Plaintiff to come into equity for an account, or to have a declaration that the deed is void? If void, it is [18] as void at law as in equity, and there is no prayer that it may be delivered up or be cancelled. This Court cannot declare the invalidity of the deed. It would first be necessary to enter into the legality of the deposition and the rights of the Agnati. As to the account, a party cannot treat an instrument as invalid, and yet seek an account under it, on the footing of its validity. If the deed be void, there exists no fiduciary relation to support such relief, and it would be perfectly impossible for the Master to take such an account, even if it were directed.

The bill too is multifarious, and seeks an account of the receipts of the Duke of Cambridge in his absence.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Heathfield, contra, in support of the bill. There is no instance in Lord Redesdale's Treatise, or in any other work, in which a Defendant has claimed an immunity from suit by demurrer. If a Defendant pleads to the jurisdiction, he must shew what other Court has jurisdiction; The Earl of Derby v. The Duke of Athol (1 Ves. sen. 201).

Here the Defendant has submitted to the jurisdiction of the Court by appearing. If he wished to question the regularity of the process, he ought to have entered a conditional appearance with the registrar, and have sought to discharge it; Davidson v. The Marchioness of Hastings (2 Keen, 509). It is now too late, and the point has in fact been determined by the Lord Chancellor, who, after argument, and after the same points had been brought to his notice, determined that the letter missive had issued properly, and refused to recall it.

[19] It is not necessary to decide the general question, whether an independent foreign sovereign coming into this country is liable to the process of the Court, for here both parties, Plaintiff and Defendant, are British subjects; the Defendant by reason of the Act of Ann (4 Ann. c. 4), which enacts, "that the Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, and the issue of her body, and all persons lineally descending from her born or thereafter to be born, be and should be, to all intents and purposes whatsoever, deemed, taken, and esteemed natural born subjects of this kingdom, as if the said princess and the issue of her body, and all persons lineally descending from her, born or thereafter to be born, had been born within this realm of England, any law, statute, matter, or thing whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding." The Defendant, on the other hand, is a natural born subject; he is a peer of the realm, and since his accession to the Crown of Hanover, has exercised his rights as a peer. Having been born a British subject, he cannot put off his allegiance (1 Bl. Com. 369); but here he has since confirmed it, by taking the oath of allegiance to Her present Majesty; he has voluntarily submitted to the Queen's jurisdiction, and is as liable to the Queen's writs as was Baliol King of Scotland to Edward the First, or Edward the First to Philip le Bel of France.

It is admitted that a foreign sovereign can sue in the Courts here; then, a priori, and independent of authority, one would say, that if he has a right to sue, he had a correlative liability to be sued.

There is, however, authority for saying that the [20] sovereign of a foreign country is liable to be sued. In Calvin's case (7 Rep. 15 b.) it is said: "But yet there is a diversity in our books worthy of observation; for the highest and lowest dignities are universal: for if a king of a foreign nation come into England, by the leave of the king of this realm (as it ought to be) in this case he shall sue and be sued by the name of a king; and herewith agreeth, 11 E. 3 tit. Br. (Moore, 803) 473, where the case was, that Alice, which was the wife of R. de O., brought a writ of dower against John Earl of Richmond, and the writ was Præcip. Johann' Comiti Richmondia custodi terri & hæredis of William the son of R. de O.: the tenant pleaded that he is Duke of Britain, not named duke, judgment of the writ? But it is ruled that the writ was good; for that the dukedom of Britain was not within the realm of England. But there it is said, that if a man bring a writ against Edward Baliol (Ibid.), and name him not King of Scotland, the writ shall abate for the cause aforesaid."

Selden, in his Table Talk, mentions an instance of the King of Spain being outlawed. (Selden's Works, vol. vi. 2041. See also the case of Ericus, King of Norway, before Edward the 1st., Ryley, Placita Parliamentaria, 143.) He says: "The King of Spain was outlawed in Westminster Hall, I being of council against him. A merchant had recovered costs against him in a suit, which because he could not get, we advised to have him outlawed for not appearing, and so he was. As soon as Gondimar heard that, he presently sent the money, by reason, if his master had been outlawed, he could not have the benefit of the law, which would have been very prejudicial, there being then many suits depending betwixt the King of Spain and the English merchants."

[21] Sir John Leach was of opinion, that a foreign sovereign could both sue and be sued. In Hovenden's Supplement to Vesey junior (vol. i. 149), it is stated, in a note to the case of The Nabob of the Carnatic v. The East India Company, "That a political treaty, between sovereigns, or parties exercising sovereign authority, cannot be the subject of municipal jurisdiction; but that its observance, or neglect, must depend on that respect which the parties bound thereby can be made to feel for the jus gentium, is established by the final result of this case. Lord Rosalyn even thought it doubtful, whether in any case, a foreign sovereign could sue or be sued, in a municipal Court of this country; Barclay v. Russell (3 Ves. 431, 433); but, in De la Torre v. Bernales, Sir John Leach, V.-C. (on the 22d April 1818) ordered the King of Spain to be named as a party to that suit, the object of which was to charge the Defendant, Bernales, in respect of acts done by him as agent of that king: and on a subsequent occasion (18th March 1819), when the same cause was under discussion, His Honor distinctly laid it down, that a foreign Government, or sovereign, could both sue and be sued in the Courts of this country. This determination is perfectly consistent with the principal case, understanding the Vice-Chancellor to allude, not to federal agreements bearing a political character, but only to personal demands of a private nature, and to cases where the fund, or the accountable parties, are within reach of the jurisdiction."

In the cases of Hullett v. The King of Spain (4 Russ. 225 and 560, 1 Dow & Cl. 168, 2 Bli. (N. S.), 31, 1 Russ. & My. 9, n., 1 Cl. & Fin. 333, and 7 Bli. 359), and Glyn v. Soares (1 Y. & Col. (Exch.) 644, and 7 Cl. & Fin. 466), a sovereign was made a Defendant. If this case depended on the Defendant's submitting to the jurisdiction, he has done so. He is, at the present moment, the Plaintiff in a suit in this Court; The King of Hanover v. Wheatley (4 Beavan, 78). The Queen herself, by a particular process, is liable to suit in this country: it would be absurd to place the Defendant in a better situation. It has been determined that a question concerning the right to the Isle of Man may be determined here; The Earl of Derby v. The Duke of Athol (1 Ves. sen. 201).

The instances of ambassadors do not apply: their immunity arises from the necessity of their perfect freedom when negotiating between two countries. It is not suggested that the Defendant came here for any such a purpose, or otherwise than to exercise his rights of British subject as a peer of the realm. The Defendant claims an entire immunity, but ambassadors are not in all cases privileged, as if they are traders (1 Bl. Com. 260), or are subjects of the country to which they are accredited.

It is said that the consequences of the restraint to which sovereigns would be exposed on a disobedience to the process should prevent this Court interfering. The same reason would apply to cross-bills, in which cases it is admitted that a sovereign is liable to suit, but that reason does not prevail; the Court might modify its process of contempt, as in the case of peers, and might enforce obedience, and give relief by means of a sequestration against the goods of a Royal Defendant.

It is said to be matter of State. The decree of the [23] Germanic Diet, or the dethronement in consequence of it, might be so, but the deed of curatorship has no reference whatever to the former; it is quite independent. The Defendant and his agents have taken possession of the property of the Plaintiff, and is he not to be accountable for it? But matters of State are constantly inquired into, as in the cases of ship-money (3 State Trials, 826), general warrants, Money v. Leach (1 W. Blackstone, 555), and French compensation fund. (Hill v. Beardon, Jacob. 84.)

The argument as to safe conduct does not apply, that writ is only granted in times of war; in the present case no such writ is in existence.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. It is due to the great learning and ingenuity which have been brought to bear upon the important question raised in this case, and to the great extent and variety of the legal, historical, and political arguments used, that I should take time to consider of the judgment which I shall pronounce upon it.

[24] Jan. 13. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case came on to be heard for argument, on a demurrer to the bill for want of jurisdiction and for want of parties.

The bill is filed by His Serene Highness Charles Frederick William Augustus Duke of Brunswick against His Majesty the King of Hanover, who is sued as His Royal Highness Ernest Augustus Duke of Cumberland and Teviotdale in Great Britain, and Earl of Armagh in Ireland.

The bill prays, that it may be declared that a certain instrument or writing, in the bill mentioned to be dated the 6th day of February and the 14th day of March 1833, and the appointment of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge as guardian of the fortune and property of the Plaintiff, thereby purported to be made, and of the persons purported to be appointed administrators and managers under him, and the subsequent appointment of the Defendant as such guardian, are absolutely void and of no effect; and that it may be declared that the Defendant is liable and ought to account to the Plaintiff for the personal estate, property, and effects, and the rents, profits, and produce of the sale of the real estate of the Plaintiff possessed by the Defendant, or any person by his order or for his use, or any person having acted or purported to act under any appointment as administrator or manager under the Defendant, since his appointment as guardian by virtue of the instrument of the 6th of February and the 14th of March 1833, including therein the personal estate and effects, rents profits, and produce of the real estate paid or accounted for to the Defendant by the Duke of Cambridge; and that such accounts may be accordingly [25] taken—the Plaintiff offering, on the taking of such accounts, to make the Defendant all just allowances.

For this purpose, the bill states, that in the year 1830 the Plaintiff was the reigning duke of the Duchy of Brunswick, and was, in his private character or capacity, possessed of or entitled to real and personal property in Brunswick, and in England, Hanover, France, and elsewhere in Europe, to a very considerable value: that the Duchy of Brunswick borders on the kingdom of Hanover: and that in the month of September 1830 His late Majesty King William the Fourth was King of Hanover, and His Royal Highness Adolphus Frederick Duke of Cambridge was Viceroy of Hanover, acting under the authority of His late Majesty King William the Fourth: that pending a revolutionary movement in Brunswick, a decree of the Germanic Diet of Confederation was made on the 2d of December 1830, whereby the Plaintiff's brother, William Duke of Brunswick, was invited to take on himself provisionally the government of the duchy; and the Diet left it to the legitimate dynasty of the Plaintiff to provide for the future government of the duchy; and that in February 1831 His late Majesty King William the Fourth, and William Duke of Brunswick, claiming to be the legitimate Agnati of the Plaintiff, caused to be published a declaration whereby they purported to dethrone the Plaintiff from the throne of the duchy, and declared that the throne had passed to Duke William; and that after this declaration was made, it was signed by their Royal Highnesses the Duke of Cumberland, (the present Defendant,) the Duke of Cambridge, and the Duke of Sussex; and that in pursuance of the declaration, William Duke of Brunswick took upon himself the government of the duchy, and he has ever since exercised the rights, powers, and authorities of Sovereign Duke of Brunswick.

[26] The bill then proceeded to state, that early in the year 1833 an instrument in writing, dated the 6th of February and the 14th of March in that year, signed by His late Majesty King William the Fourth, and by William Duke of Brunswick, was promulgated by them, and was to the effect following, viz. :—

"We, William the Fourth, by the grace of God, King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and of Ireland and of Hanover, Duke of Brunswick and of Lunebourg, and we William, by the grace of God, Duke of Brunswick and of Lunebourg make known what follows :—Moved by the interests of our House, whose well-being is confided to us, and yielding to a painful but inevitable necessity have thought it necessary to consider what measures the interests (rightly understood) of His Highness Charles Duke of Brunswick, the preservation of the fortune now in his hands, the dangers and illegality of the enterprises pursued by the said duke, and, lastly, the honour and dignity of our House, may require; and after having heard the advice of a commission, charged by us with the examination into this affair, and after having weighed and exactly balanced all points of fact and law: and whereas after the dissolution of the German empire, the powers of supreme guardianship over the princes of the empire, which, up to that period, had appertained to the emperor, devolved on the heads of sovereign states, we, taking into consideration the laws and customs, and by virtue of the rights unto us belonging, in quality of heads of the two branches of our House, have decreed as follows :—

"Article 1st. Certain facts, either notorious or sufficiently proved, have caused us to arrive at the conviction that His Highness Duke Charles is at this time wasting the fortune which he possesses in enterprises [27] alike impossible and dangerous both to himself and other persons, and is seeking to damage the just claims which certain persons interested now or hereafter may legally have upon his property, we have consequently considered that the only method of preserving the fortune of His Highness Duke Charles from total ruin is to appoint a guardian over him.

"Article 2d. In consequence of this conviction, we decree that Charles Duke of Brunswick shall be deprived of the management and administration of his fortune, a guardian shall be appointed, whom we shall choose by mutual consent from amongst the very noble or noble male scions of our House, although the right of choice belongs to the legitimate sovereign of the Duchy of Brunswick, in virtue of his title alone.

"Article 3d. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Viceroy of Hanover, having declared that he will willingly accept such guardianship, we confide the same to His Royal Highness by the present decree, which he will be pleased to consider as constituting his title to such guardianship.

"Article 4th. As His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge cannot, by reason of his position, by himself alone exercise the functions of guardian, he is authorized limit himself to the functions of supreme guardian, and to substitute for the management and administration of the property one or more persons, who, under the authority of the King, will proceed in their own name, and on their own personal responsibility, to take an inventory of the same, and to take measures for the preservation and administration of the fortune placed under the guardianship of His Royal Highness, the Duke of Brunswick, who is to be at liberty to grant to them fees proportionate to their duties.

Article 5th. The administrators shall render an annual account of their management to His Royal Highness, the supreme guardian, who shall be asked to submit the same to us, that we may cause the same to be settled and approved. Confirmation shall be applied for in all cases wherein the laws require the consent of the supreme guardian.

Article 6th. The guardianship is to be considered as legally established in Brunswick, where it is to have its locality.

Article 7th. The present decree shall be published in the bulletin of the laws of the kingdom, in accordance with the usual forms; and all whom the same may concern are bound to render obedience thereto.

Given at our palace of St. James's, the 6th of February 1833, and at Brunswick the 14th of March 1833. We have signed with our proper hands and have placed our seals.

“WILLIAM (L.S.).

“WILLIAM, DUKE (L.S.).

The Baron Ompteda de Schleinitz.”

To this instrument was subjoined a note, which was signed by the Defendant, the Duke of Cumberland, and by the Dukes of Sussex and Cambridge, to the effect being:—“The undersigned have acknowledged with gratitude the foregoing management adopted by His Majesty, in accordance with His Highness the reigning Duke of Brunswick, in the interests well advised of His Highness the Duke Charles of Brunswick, for the [29] preservation of the fortune remaining in his hands, for the maintenance of the public peace in the Duchy of Brunswick and in the kingdom of Hanover, and for the honour and dignity of the great House of Brunswick and of the King of Hanover, another proof of the foresight of His Majesty and of His Highness for the well-being of that House: we solemnly attest this declaration by these presents, and with our hands, and to which we have placed our seals. London, 6th February 1833, ERNEST (L.S.). Kensington, 3d February 1833, AUGUSTUS FREDERICK (L.S.). Hanover, 13th February 1833, ADOLPHE (L.S.).”

The bill then states that the Plaintiff is advised, as the fact is, that the said instrument is absolutely void and of no effect; but that nevertheless the Duke of Cambridge accepted the appointment of supreme guardian of the Plaintiff's fortune and property, took possession of the real estates to which he was entitled in his capacity at Brunswick, and took possession of all such parts of the Plaintiff's property in Brunswick, and elsewhere, of a personal nature, as he could discover, to the amount of several hundred thousand pounds in the whole: that he sold and parted several parts thereof into money, and made certain payments on account of the Plaintiff and of his property; but that after allowing for such payments, there remained in his hands a very large surplus unaccounted for: that King William the 4th died on the 20th of June 1837, and thereupon the present Defendant became King of Hanover; and the Duke of Cambridge having resigned his appointment of guardian by some instrument in writing, to which the Defendant was a party, and which was signed by him and by William Duke of Brunswick, the Defendant was appointed guardian of the Plaintiff, and of his fortune and property, in the place of the Duke of Cambridge, under the instrument of the 6th of February and the 14th of March 1833, and with all the same powers and authorities as were thereby purported to be conferred on the Duke of Cambridge: that the Duke of Cambridge accounted for his receipts and payments to the Defendant, and paid him the balance; and that the Defendant took possession of the Plaintiff's property, and he received large sums of money on account thereof, and has thereout made some payments on account of the Plaintiff; but that a very large balance or surplus, to the amount of several hundred thousand pounds, remains due from the Defendant to the Plaintiff on account thereof; and that the Defendant refuses to comply with the Plaintiff's application for an account thereof.

The bill charges, that the instrument of the 6th of February and the 14th of March 1833, and the appointment of the Duke of Cambridge as guardian, and the appointment of the Defendant as guardian, are wholly invalid, according to the law as well of Brunswick and of Hanover as of Great Britain; but that under colour thereof, the Duke of Cambridge and the Defendant respectively took possession of the Plaintiff's property, on his behalf, and not adversely: that by the law of England such appointments of guardians, and all the rights thereby purported to be given are void, even if the same were valid by the law of Brunswick; and that if the same were valid at the time when the same issued, having regard to the circumstances and situation of the Plaintiff at the time (which, however, the Plaintiff denies), there is now nothing in the circumstances, or conduct, or state of mind of the Plaintiff to debar him from the full right and power of enjoyment and disposition of his property.

[31] There is a charge, that the receipts and payments by the Duke of Cambridge and the Defendant respectively, on account of the Plaintiff and the management of his property, constitute a mutual account, containing many items as well on the debit as on the credit side thereof; that such account is still open and running, and is of an intricate and complex nature, and can only be taken in Court of Equity.

There are also charges relating to the administrators and managers who were appointed by the Duke of Cambridge, and are alleged to have accounted to the Defendant, and a very long statement of certain proceedings in France, in which it is alleged, that the Duke of Cambridge attached, but failed in an attempt to establish a claim to the Plaintiff's property in that country; a specification of certain property alleged to have been seized by the Duke of Cambridge and the Defendant respectively; and the statement of a transaction alleged to have taken place at Osterode in November or December 1830.

The Plaintiff having, in an earlier part of the bill, stated, that from a time previous to the Duke of Cambridge resigning the appointment of guardian, and within a few weeks past, the Defendant had been residing in Hanover out of the jurisdiction of this Court, and having charged that he the Plaintiff was resident and domiciled in England; and that the Plaintiff and Defendant were respectively subjects of the Crown of Great Britain and Ireland, concludes the charging part of his bill by charging, that the Defendant is a peer of this realm, and that his title as such is His Royal Highness Ernest Augustus Duke of Cumberland and Teviotdale in Great Britain, and Earl of Armagh in Ireland; and that since his arrival in this country, and during his [32] residence here, he had exercised, and thereby exercised his rights and privileges as such peer as aforesaid.

It has been stated to me as a fact on both sides, that the Plaintiff availed himself of a temporary residence of the Defendant in this country to serve him here with the process of this Court; and that the Defendant, before he appeared to the bill, and consequently before the demurrer was filed, applied to the Lord Chancellor to be relieved from the process; that the Lord Chancellor refused the application; and that thereupon the Defendant appeared to the bill in the usual manner: and upon this state of things the Plaintiff has founded an argument, which, if valid, would make it unnecessary for me to consider the principal question upon the demurrer. The Plaintiff has contended, first, that the appearance of the Defendant to the process ought to be deemed a waiver of any claim to personal exemption from liability to be sued; and, secondly, that the refusal of the Lord Chancellor to relieve the Defendant from the process ought to be considered by me as a decision of the Lord Chancellor that the Defendant is subject to the jurisdiction of this Court with reference to the subject-matter of this bill.

As to the first of these points, it would be singular if appearance, which is the first step towards making a defence, should be deemed an abandonment or waiver of any defence which the Defendant may have. An appearance may be a waiver of any mere irregularity in the service of process; but I am of opinion, that it is no waiver such a defence as is now made; and which the Defendant has clearly a right to submit to the consideration of the Court. He claims to be exempt from liability to be sued; but he nevertheless appears, in order that he may, in a regular manner, form the [33] Court of the reasons upon which his claim is founded. As to the other point it appeared to me very improbable that the Lord Chancellor, in refusing to stay the process upon a bill, the contents of which were not regularly known to me, could have meant to decide that the Defendant was, with reference to the intents of the bill, liable to the jurisdiction of the Court. Upon this part of the case I have, however, thought it right to communicate with the Lord Chancellor, who has informed me, that in declining to interfere with the process, he did nothing which could in any way prevent the Defendant from making any defence which was open to him in the usual course of proceeding; and gave no opinion upon the question of jurisdiction in the particular case.

It is, therefore, incumbent upon me to consider the defence made to this bill by the present demurrer.

In support of the demurrer for want of jurisdiction, the following are amongst the principal propositions advanced on behalf of the Defendant:—

First, he is admitted by the bill to be King of Hanover, a sovereign prince, recognised as such by the Crown of England. As a sovereign prince, his person is inviolable, and he is not liable to be sued in any Court.

Second, the inviolability of a sovereign prince is not confined to his own dominions, but attends him everywhere. (Jurisconsulti melioris notæ negant Principem extra ditionem esse mere privatum esse, &c., Zouch, 63.) Though a king be in a foreign kingdom, yet he is judged in law a king. (Calvin's case, 7 Coke, 15 b.)

[34] Third, his inviolability is not affected by his being temporarily resident in a foreign kingdom of which he is a subject. The Defendant is not the less a sovereign prince, and not the less exempt from being sued in any Court here, because he is a subject of the Queen and a peer of the realm.

Fourth, even if the Defendant should be held liable to be sued for some things in a foreign country, he ought not to be held liable to be sued in respect of the particular subject-matter of this suit, which is alleged to be matter of State, and not matter of common law jurisdiction.

Fifth and last, even if the Defendant should be held to be liable to be sued here, and if the subject-matter of the suit should be held to be matter of forensic jurisdiction, yet that it is not matter subject to the jurisdiction of this Court, but matter which must be deemed to be subject to the jurisdiction of some Court of special and peculiar jurisdiction, such as in this country are matters arising in bankruptcy, and various other matters, which, although proper subjects of common law jurisdiction, can only be adjudicated upon in Courts specially appointed for that purpose.

On the other hand, the following are amongst the principal propositions advanced in support of the bill on behalf of the Plaintiff:—

First, this ought to be considered as an ordinary suit between subject and subject. The Plaintiff and the Defendant are lineal descendants of the Princess Sophia, Electress and Duchess Dowager of Hanover, and as such (4 Ann. c. 4) are, to all intents and purposes, to be deemed [35] natural-born subjects of this realm. The Plaintiff is domiciled here. The Defendant was born here, is an English peer, and has taken the oath of allegiance. (1 G. 1, st. 2, c. 13.)

Second, no English subject can withdraw from his allegiance and subjection to the laws of the land. (Foster, Cr. L. 60, 184, 1 Bl. Com. 370, Moore, 798.) His becoming a sovereign prince of another country can make no difference in this respect: he remains an English subject, and is bound to obey the laws of England.

Third, the law of England affords no authority for the proposition, that sovereign princes resident here may not be sued in the Courts here; and there are dicta to the contrary; as in Calvin's case (7 Coke, 15) it is said, that "if a king of a foreign nation comes into England by the leave of the King of this realm, as it ought to be, in this case he shall sue and be sued in the name of king;" and it is reported, in the case of la Torre v. Bernales (1 Hov. Supp. 149), that Sir John Leach stated it to be his opinion that foreign sovereigns could both sue and be sued in this country. In support of this proposition, reference was made to proceedings (1) in which John Balliol, King of Scotland, was summoned to answer charges made against him by the Court of Edward I., King of England; and to proceedings in which Edward I., King of England, was summoned to answer charges made against him in the Court of Philip Le Bel, King of France, at Paris. But these cases have nothing to do with the question: they were respectively adopted in virtue of, and for the purpose of enforcing the feudal superiority which Edward I. [36] claimed to have in the kingdom of Scotland, and the superiority which the King of France had over the province of Guienne.

Fourth, liability to suit does not necessarily involve liability to coercion. Defendant, as an English peer, is, by privilege, protected from personal coercion; even if a sovereign prince without such peculiar privilege were a Defendant here, the Court has power so to modify its process, as at the same time to do justice to the Plaintiff and have due regard to the person and dignity of the Defendant.

Fifth, the law of nations, the general law and the common interest of all mankind, is, that justice should be done all over the world. The right of a suitor here is not to be impeded by the assertion of an unrecognised privilege in any person against whom he has a legal demand.

Sixth, the Queen of England is liable to be sued in a proper form—a form applicable to a foreign sovereign; but if a foreign sovereign were not liable to be sued here, he would be placed in a better situation than our own sovereign, which, as I have said, would be absurd.

These propositions are all of them more or less important to be considered on the present occasion, and I have thought it convenient to enumerate them, although I do not have occasion to observe upon them all, in stating the grounds of the opinion which I have formed upon this demurrer.

The general proposition of the Defendant is, that by reason of his character as a sovereign prince, he is [37] exempt from the jurisdiction of any tribunal or Court in this country.

His limited or modified proposition, adapted to the specialties of the present case, is, that he is exempt from the jurisdiction of any tribunal in this country in respect of acts done in a foreign country, under foreign authority, and in no way connected with his own character of English peer and English subject.

It has been fully established (2) that a foreign sovereign may sue in this country both at law and in equity; and further, that if he sues in a Court of Equity, he submits himself to the jurisdiction of the Court. A cross-bill may be filed against him, and he must put in his answer thereto, not by any officer, agent, or substitute, but personally, upon his own oath. The King of Spain v. Hullett (1 Cl. & Fin. 359; 7 Bli. 359).

Lord Redesdale (2 Bli. N. S. 60) considered, that to refuse a foreign sovereign the right of suing in our Courts might be a just cause of war; and the liability of a foreign sovereign to be sued in a case where he himself was suing here, was considered as founded upon the principle that by suing here he had submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the Court in which he sued. The decision is in accordance with the principles of the civil law. The Reconventio is a species of defence, and Qui non [38] cogitur aliquo loco judicium pati, si ipse ibi agat, cogitur excipere actiones et ad eundem judicem (1 Digest, l. 22, Corpus Juris Civilis, 131.)

In the case of Glyn v. Soares (1 Y. & Col. (Exch.) 644), it was supposed that a person who was not a party to an action, but whose agent was, on his behalf the Plaintiff, might be made a Defendant to a bill in equity, for discovery in aid of defence to the action, and on that supposition it was held that the Queen of Por-was properly made a Defendant to the bill. Her demurrer, however, was allowed in the House of Lords (7 Cl. & Fin. 466), where it was held that such a bill of discovery could only be sustained against parties to the action. If she had been Plaintiff in the action, I presume that she would have been held to be a proper Defendant to the bill.

The case mentioned by Selden in his Table Talk (Law, 3), was probably of the same sort: there were many suits pending between the King of Spain and English merchants; a merchant had recovered costs against him in a suit, and could not get them, and process of outlawry was taken out against him for not appearing; but the circumstances are not stated with such particularity as to make it practicable to draw any conclusion from them.

The cases which we have upon this point go no further than this; that where a foreign sovereign files a bill, or prosecutes an action in this country, he may be made Defendant to a cross-bill or bill of discovery in the nature of a defence to the proceeding, which the foreign sovereign has himself adopted. There is no case to shew that, because he may be Plaintiff in the Courts of [39] this country for one matter, he may therefore be made a Defendant in the Courts of this country for another and quite distinct matter; and the question to be now determined is independent of the fact stated at the Bar, that the King of Hanover is or was himself Plaintiff in a suit for an entirely distinct matter in this Court.

There have been cases, in which this Court being called upon to distribute a fund in which some foreign sovereign or State may have had an interest, it has been thought expedient and proper, in order to a due distribution of the fund, to make such sovereign or State a party. The effect has been, to make the suit perfect as to parties, but as to the sovereign or State made a Defendant in cases of that kind, the fact has not been, to compel, or attempt to compel, such sovereign or State to come and submit to judgment in the ordinary course, but to give the sovereign an opportunity to come in to claim his right, or establish his interest in the subject-matter of the suit. Coming in to make his claim, he would, by doing so, submit himself to the jurisdiction of the Court in that matter; refusing to come in, he might perhaps be precluded from establishing any claim to the same interest in another form. Where a Defendant in this country is called upon to account for some matter in respect of which he has acted as agent for a foreign sovereign, the suit would not be perfect as to parties, unless the foreign sovereign were formally a Defendant, and by making him a party, an opportunity is afforded him of defending himself, instead of leaving the defence to his agent, and he may come in if he pleases; in such a case, if he refuses to come in, he may perhaps be held bound by the decision against his agent.

[40] There may be other cases in which sovereign princes, for the sake of having their claim or right determined, may have been afforded an opportunity of appearing, and they have voluntarily appeared as Defendants before the tribunals of this country, save in the case of a cross-bill or bill of discovery in aid of a defence, and in the case of a sovereign prince voluntarily coming in to make or resist a claim, it does not appear how he can be effectually cited, or what control the Court can have over him or his rights; and no case has been produced in which it has been determined that a foreign sovereign, not himself a Plaintiff or Claimant and insisting upon his alleged right to be exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary Courts, has been held bound to submit to it.

On the other hand, no case has been produced in which, upon the question properly raised, it has been held that a sovereign prince, resident within the dominions of another prince, is exempt from the jurisdiction of the country in which he is. In the case of Glyn v. Soares (1 Y. & Col. (Exch.), 698) the question was not argued at the Bar, but Lord Abinger took it into consideration, and distinctly expressed his opinion that, as a general proposition, a sovereign prince could not be made amenable to any Court of Judicature in this country; and upon this occasion, the Defendant insists upon it as a general rule, that in times of peace at least, a sovereign prince is, by the law of nations, inviolable: that obvious inconveniences and the greatest danger of war would arise, from any attempt to compel obedience to any process or order of any Court, by any proceeding against either the person or the property of a sovereign prince; and indeed that any such attempt would be deemed a [41] hostile aggression, not only against the sovereign prince himself, but against the State and people of which he is the sovereign: that it is the policy of the law (to be everywhere taken notice of), that such risks ought to be avoided, and that this view of the subject ought of itself to induce the Court to allow demurrer.

If a foreign sovereign could be made personally amenable to the Courts of a country in which he happened to reside, he must be subject to the ordinary process of the Courts, and if not protected by any privilege legally established by the law of England, he would, in this country, be subject to the execution of writs of attachment and ne exeat regno, and other processes upon which he might be arrested, and in this the counsel of the Defendant cited the opinion of Vattel, who considered it to be a ridiculous notion, and an absurdity to think that a sovereign who enters a foreign country, even without permission, might be arrested there. (Vattel, iv. 7, s. 1, p. 486.)

It was attempted to meet the force of this argument, by alleging that this Court had authority to modify the means of executing its process, and compelling obedience to its orders, so as to suit the rank or dignity of particular Defendants; but this allegation was not supported by any authority, or by reference to any known practice of the Court. In the case of the King of Spain it was stated (7 Bli. 224) that his right, "in respect of privilege, was not greater than that of any of his subjects:" and the Lord Chancellor said, "The King of Spain sues here by his own right of sovereign, and so he must be sued, if at all; but beyond the mere name of sovereign it has no effect. He brings with him no privileges which exempt him from the common fare of other suitors." I am of opinion that the only exemptions from the ordinary effects of the process of this Court, are privileges which have a recognised legal origin, and that no others can be allowed.

To shew that a sovereign prince carries his prerogative with him into the dominions of other princes, reference was made to the case of Ingelram de Nesle, stated in Fleta. (Lib. 2, ch. 3, s. 9, p. 68, and cited in Calvin's case, 7 Coke, 15 b. and in Moore 798.) This man was an attendant upon Edward I., King of England, who, in France; he committed a theft there, and was apprehended for it by the French; but the King of England required to have him redelivered, being his subject, and he was sent to the King of England, to do his own justice upon him; whereupon he was tried before the king and marshal of the King of England's house, and executed in France. At a recent period, Monaldeschi, an attendant upon Christina, the abdicated Queen of Sweden, was, by her orders, put to death within her residence in France (see Relation de la Mort du Marq. de Monaldeschi, &c., Arch. Cur. 2^e Serie, viii. 224). This fact in itself atrocious, but which was not seriously resented by France; and it is to have been afterwards defended by great authority. (Leibnitz.) Bynkershoek speaks of it thus:—"Quod factum Galli, quamvis indignabundi, impune transmissum est, ex impotentia muliebri, dicet alter, alter vero ex jure gentium, ut optimum est." (Bynkershoek, Op. ii. 151.)

But I own that with reference to the present case, I do not attach much importance to instances of this sort. [43] The doctrine or fiction which has been exposed by some writers on the Law of Nations, under the name of extra territoriality (Martens, 46, 1 Wheatley, 273), if it were carried out to its legitimate consequences, would, as it appears to me, render it highly dangerous for the sovereign of a country to admit within his dominions any foreign sovereign, or even any ambassador of a foreign sovereign. It is admitted, that the extent to which the doctrine should be carried out, must be subject to great modifications, and I do not think that it affords any assistance in the practical consideration of the question, as to the exemptions or privileges which ought, by the law of nations, to be allowed to a foreign sovereign temporarily resident within the dominions of another prince.

Another argument for the Defendant was, that a sovereign coming from his dominions into this country, attending the Court of the Queen, and sitting in Parliament, must be deemed to have come with the consent of the Queen, and to have entitled to a safe conduct, (1) which would have contained a prohibition to sue him in Court (Reg. Brev. 26); that, therefore, the Defendant ought to be deemed to have resided here on the faith of such right, which he is not the less entitled to, since the letters of safe conduct were not actually applied for and issued. This argument assumes, that letters of safe conduct, such as might and lawfully ought to be issued at this time, and on the occasion of such a visit as that made to this country by the King of Hanover, would have contained a prohibition to prosecute a suit as this.

[44] But the argument for the Defendant, which appears to me to be the most important, was founded upon analogy to the immunities of ambassadors, recognised and declared to be in accordance with the law of England, by the statute 22. c. 12.

By that statute, it was declared, "that all writs and processes sued forth and executed, whereby the person of any ambassador of any foreign prince authorised and received as such by Her Majesty, may be arrested or imprisoned, or his goods seized, or attached, shall be deemed to be utterly null and void;" and a penal clause affecting any person who may sue out any such writ or process, is a proviso, that no merchant or trader within the description of the statute bankrupts, who puts himself into the service of any ambassador, shall have or enjoy any benefit by the Act.

It is argued, that the law of nations and the law of the land having granted such immunities to such ambassadors, the mere envoys and agents of sovereign princes, must have refused at least equal immunities to the sovereigns themselves, on whose behalf the immunities to ambassadors were given. If it be right, as it is universally admitted to be, that ambassadors should have such immunities, it must a fortiori be right that princes should have them; and thus it is argued, that because ambassadors are held to be inviolable in the countries where they reside, princes must also to be so.

But, on the part of the Plaintiff, this is denied, and it is said, that we must look to the reason of the law. An ambassador, who comes into a foreign State on the business of his sovereign, which cannot be transacted [45] without entire freedom and independence on his part, must be allowed privileges which are in no way required for the protection or accommodation of a prince who comes on a visit of pure or complimentary; and, moreover, that the immunity of an ambassador does not extend to every suit of every kind. There are exceptions depending on the peculiar liabilities or obligations of the person, or on the nature of the transaction; it cannot be inferred, that because an ambassador is in some or many cases exempt from suit, that therefore a sovereign prince is exempt from suit in all cases.

The question upon the demurrer is to be determined by that which may be taken to be the law of nations applicable to the case: there is no English law applicable to the present subject, unless it can be derived from the law of nations, and, when ascertained, is to be deemed part of the common law of England.

The law of nations includes all regulations which have been adopted by the common consent of nations, in cases where such common consent is evidenced by usage or custom.

In cases where no usage or custom can be found, we are compelled, amidst doubts and difficulties of every kind, to decide in particular cases, according to such light as may be afforded to us by natural reason, or the dictates of that which is thought to be the policy of the law.

"Legis deficiente, recurritur ad consuetudinem, et deficiente consuetudine, recurritur ad rationem naturalem," and in the case now in question, it does not appear that there have been cases, or that events have occurred [46] from which any usage or custom of nations can be collected.

Synkershoeek, in his Treatise de Foro Legatorum (cap. 3 (Op. ii. 150)), discusses every question which is now under consideration. He supposes a sovereign prince to pass into the dominions of another prince, for any cause whatever of business or pleasure. It is not, he says, to be supposed, that the prince went there with the intent to put off his own sovereignty, and become the subject of another; yet, what is to be done, if he commits violence, or contracts debts in the country where he is; this, he says, will depend on the law of nations, adopted from reason and mutual consent, and established by usage. If we consult reason, much is to be said on either side. If a prince, in the dominions of another, becomes a robber, homicide, or conspirator, is he to escape with impunity? If he extorts money or becomes indebted, is he to be permitted to carry home his plunder? It is, he says, difficult to admit that; and yet, on the other hand, is that which reason and the consent of all nations has granted to ambassadors because they represent a prince and obey his orders, to be refused to the prince himself, perhaps transacting his own affairs? Is the sanction of the prince less than that of his ambassador? Shall we compel the prince himself to answer when his envoy is free? The learned writer, after in vain searching for precedents, proceeds thus:—"Nihil in hoc argumento proficies, rebus similiter gentibus judicatis, atque ita sola superest ratio quam consulamus. Et hac consulti ego non ausim plus juris tribuere in principem non subditum, quam in legatum et subditum. . . . Quare ut extremum est in legato, ut jubeatur imperio excedere, et in principe statuerem, si jus hospitii [47] violat. . . . In causâ aeris alieni id dixerim, nam arresto detinere principem ut æs alienum expungat, quamvis fuit stricti juris ratio permetteret, non permetteret tamen analogia ejus juris quod a legatis ubique gentium receptum est. Si neges, ubi de jure gentium agitur, analogiâ disputari posse, ego negaverim hanc questionem ex jure gentium expellere posse, cum exempla deficiant, quibus consensus gentium probetur, nec quicquam ad supersit quam ut ad legatorum exemplum ipsos reges et principes et quidem magis ab arresto dicamus immunes, et in eo a cæteris privatis differe."

In a case where there is no precedent—no positive law—no evidence of the common consent of nations—no usage which can be relied on—where reason, important and plausible are arrayed in opposition to each other—and where no clear and decided preponderance is to be found, it seems reasonable to endeavour to borrow for our guidance such light, however feeble and uncertain, as may be afforded by analogous cases, from whence have been derived rules adopted with great, though not perfect uniformity, by all nations.

It is true, that a decision derived from principles supported by analogous cases alone, cannot be entirely satisfactory; and yet it may be the best, the most satisfactory which the nature of the case admits of.

It will be more satisfactory in proportion to the clearness of the analogy between the cases under consideration.

It must be admitted, that all the reasons assigned for the immunity of ambassadors are not applicable to the case of sovereign princes; and it has been truly observed that an ambassador, if exempt from the coercive power [48] of the law in the country where he is, may, nevertheless, be compelled to submit to justice by the prince in his own country (II. Ward. 515, 596, 598); but that if you exonerate the prince himself, justice fails altogether: but in ultimate effect, the cases come very nearly to the same result. The prince, not being subject to a foreign power, may refuse to compel his ambassador to do justice, or may refuse to do the justice declared by a foreign tribunal, when requested by a foreign power: and the refusal, in either case, becomes a ground of imputation against the prince who refuses, and may give rise to those irritations which are so apt to prove incentives to war. Investigate the subject as we may, considerations of this sort press upon us. Whilst a prevailing respect for humanity and justice resides in the breasts of princes, and when there is consent as to the means of ascertaining and promoting the ends of justice in particular cases, it is well; but in the last result of any inquiry on the subject, we find, that in the absence of moral sanctions and of treaty, war and reprisal (i.e., war again in a particular form) are the sanctions of that which is called the law of nations.

If we hold sovereign princes to be amenable to the Courts of this country, the orders and decrees which may be made cannot be executed by the ordinary means. Where is the power which can enforce obedience? If accidental circumstances should give the power, and if, for the supposed purposes of justice, an attempt were made to compel the obedience of a sovereign prince to any process, order, or judgment, he and the nation of which he is the head, and probably all other princes and the nations of which they are the heads, would see, in the attempt, nothing but hostile aggression upon the inviolability which all claim as the requisite of their [49] sovereign and national independence. On the other hand, if the jurisdiction of the Courts against sovereign princes be excluded, we are, on the institution of a claim, very nearly, though not quite, in the state to which we are brought by the process, order, or judgment on the former supposition. The State may have to seek redress for the injured subject, and justice is to be requested from a prince or chief against whom we have no ordinary means of enforcing it. It may be refused; acquiescence in the refusal is the abandonment of justice, and pressure after refusal implies an imputation, and gives rise to discussions and irritations which may again prove incentives to war. Justice can be peaceably and effectually administered there only where there is recognised authority and adequate power. What is to be done in cases where there is no power to enforce it?

It must be admitted, that the subject is replete with difficulties. These difficulties and the importance of maintaining the legal inviolability of sovereign princes, can scarcely be shewn more strongly, than by adverting to the opinions which have been expressed by eminent jurists, that offences committed by sovereign princes in foreign states ought rather to be treated as causes of war, than as violations of the law of the country where they are committed, and ought rather to be checked by vengeance, and making war on the offender, than by any attempt to obtain justice through lawful means.

Zouch (Solutio questionis, &c., cap. iv. p. 66) says, "Ad id quod asseritur, malè principibus actum iri, si in eorum territoriis aliis principibus in eorum perniciem injurandi licentia sit permittenda, respondetur quod talis licentia neutiquam est permittenda. Sed eos bello prosequi juri gentium con-[50]-sentaneum est; et si cum in territorio principis in quem conjurarunt deprehensi sunt, præsenti vindictâ uti melius habebitur; juri gentium convenit disfidare et pro hostibus declarare unde non spectato judicio cuivis eos interficere impune liceat." And Bynkershoek (Op. ii. 151) says, "Quid si enim, more latronis, in vitam, in bona, in pudicitiam cujusque irruat, ne secus atque hostis, captâ grassetur in urbe. Poterit utique detineri forte et eludi quamvis per turbam malim quam constituto judicio."

When great and eminent lawyers, men of experience and reflection, so express themselves as to shew their opinion, that less mischief would ensue from the unrestrained and irregular vengeance of individuals and of the multitude, than from attempts to bring sovereign princes to judgment in the ordinary Courts of a foreign country where they have offended, however much we may lament that such should be the condition of the world, we may be sure of the sense which they entertained of the difficulty of making, and of the danger of attempting to make, sovereign princes amenable to the Courts of Justice of the country in which they happen to be.

After giving to the subject the best consideration in my power, it appearing to me that all the reasons upon which the immunities of ambassadors are founded do not apply to the case of sovereigns, but that there are reasons for the immunities of sovereign princes, at least as strong, if not much stronger, than any which have been advanced for the immunities of ambassadors; that suits against sovereign princes of foreign countries must, in all ordinary cases in which orders or declarations of right may be made, end in requests for justice, which [51] might be made without any suit at all; that even the failure of justice in some particular cases, would be less prejudicial than attempts to obtain it by violating immunities thought necessary to the independence of princes and nations, I think that, on the whole, it ought to be considered as a general rule, in accordance with the law of nations, that a sovereign prince, resident in the dominions of another, is exempt from the jurisdiction of the Courts there.

It is true, as was argued for the Plaintiff, that the common interest of mankind requires that justice should everywhere be done, and that, for the attainment of justice, all persons should be amenable to the Courts of Justice in the country where they are. Such is the general rule; but in cases where either party has no superior by whom obedience can be compelled, where the execution of justice is not provided for by treaty, and cannot be enforced by the authority of the Judge; and where an attempt to enforce it by the authority of the State may probably become a cause of war; the same common interest, which is the foundation of the rule, requires that some exception should be made to it, and that exception is the general rule with respect to sovereign princes.

The question then arises, whether the exception in favour of sovereign princes and the exemption from suit thereby allowed, is to be entire and universal, or subject to any and what limitations.

The Act of Parliament relating to ambassadors professes to be, and has frequently been adjudged to be, declaratory (1 Barn. & C. 562), and in confirmation of the common law; [52] and, as Lord Tenterden said, "it must be construed according to the common law, of which the law of nations must be deemed a part."

The statute does not, in words, apply to the case in which the ambassador may be a subject of the Crown of England; but there is an exception to the exemption in the case of bankrupts in the service of ambassadors; and cases have frequently occurred in which an ambassador has himself been a subject of the sovereign, to whom he is accredited; and, notwithstanding some differences of opinion on the subject, it seems to be considered, that such an ambassador would not enjoy a perfect immunity from legal process, but would have an immunity extending only to such things as are connected with his office and ministry, and not to transactions and matters wholly distinct and independent of his office and its duties. Bynkershoek (Op. ii. 162) expresses his opinion:—"Legatum scilicet manere subditum, ubi ante legationem fuit, atque adeo si contraxit, aut deliquit subesse imperio cujus antea suberat. His autem consequens est nostros subditos quamvis alterius principis legationem accipere, subditos nostros esse non desinere, neque forum quo semper uti sunt jure subfugere." And Vattel (book 4, ch. 8, sec. 112) says, "It may happen that the minister of a foreign power is the subject of the State in which he is employed, and in this case he is unquestionably under the jurisdiction of the country in everything which does not directly relate to his ministry." And, after some discussion upon the question how we are to determine in what cases the two characters of subject and foreign minister are united in the same person, Vattel adds, "Whatever inconveniences attend the subjection of a minister to the sovereign with whom he [53] may reside, the foreign prince chooses to acquiesce in such a state of things, and is content to have a minister on that footing, it is his own concern."

And presuming from this view of what is considered to be the law of nations, with respect to the immunity of an ambassador who is a subject in the country of his residence, it must be distinguished what acts of his were connected with, or required for, the discharge of the duties of his ministry, and what were not; and that with regard to acts connected with his ministry, the Courts (considering his character as ambassador) would hold him to be exempt from suit; but that, with regard to acts not connected with his ministry, the Courts (considering his character of subject) would hold him liable to suit. The inquiry is whether, in like manner, a sovereign prince, resident in the dominions of another prince, whose subject he is, may justly and reasonably be held free from suit in all matters connected with his sovereignty, and his rights, duties, and acts as sovereign, and yet be held liable to suit in respect to all matters unconnected with his sovereignty, and arising wholly within the country to the sovereign of which he is a subject.

The first and most general rule is, that all persons should be amenable to the Courts of Justice, and should be liable to be sued. A consideration of the policy of the law creates an exception in the case of sovereign princes. May not a further consideration of the policy of the law create a modification or limitation of the exception in the case of sovereign princes who are subjects?

There are in Europe other sovereign princes who, if not now, have been subjects of the country of their origin or adoption. Upon such a question as this, [54] I do not disregard those cases, but they may have their specialties, of which I am not aware.

I cannot venture to say, that a subject acquiring the character of a sovereign prince in another country, and being recognised as a sovereign prince by the sovereign

[the country of his origin, may not, by the act of recognition, in ordinary circumstances and by the laws of some countries, be altogether released from the allegiance and legal subjection which he previously owed; but the case now before me must depend on its own circumstances; and I am of opinion, that it is not contrary to any principle and not unreasonable to consider, that in the contemplation of the Courts of this country, the inviolability which belongs to His Majesty the King of Hanover as a sovereign prince, ought to be, and is modified by his character and duties as a subject of the Queen of England.]

Previously to his becoming King of Hanover, he always lived in allegiance to the Crown of England, and in subjection to the laws of England. His accession to the throne was contemporaneous with the accession of the Queen to the throne of this kingdom; and since he became King of Hanover, he has been so far from renouncing or from shewing any desire to renounce, his allegiance to the Crown or his subjection to the laws of England—he has been so far from admitting it to be questionable, whether his sovereignty, and the recognition of it by the Queen, has absolved his allegiance or his subjection to the laws of England, that he has renewed his oath of allegiance, and taken his seat in the English Legislature, and has claimed and exercised the political rights of an English subject and an English peer.

[55] If he came here as King of Hanover only, the same inviolability and privileges which are deemed to belong to all sovereign princes would have been his, and, save in peculiar cases, such as I have before referred to, he would have been exempt from all suits and legal process. But coming here, not as King of Hanover only, but as a subject, as a peer of the realm, and as a member of Her Majesty's Privy Council, can it be reasonably said, that he is exempt from all jurisdiction, or, in other words, from all responsibility for his conduct in any of those characters?

The law of England admits the legal inviolability of the sovereign, requiring, at the same time, the legal responsibility of those who advise the sovereign. Can the law of England, in any individual case, admit the strange anomaly of an inviolable adviser of an inviolable sovereign, of a legal subjection without any legal superiority? Can any peer or Privy Councillor, whatever station he may occupy elsewhere, be permitted to give advice, for which any other peer, or any other member of the Privy Council, might be justly impeached, and yet hold himself exempt from the jurisdiction of the highest tribunal in the realm? May he enter into a contract which any other subject would be compelled to perform, and yet refuse to answer or claim whatever, either for specific performance or for damages?

Great inconveniences may arise from the exercise of any jurisdiction in such a case. They arise, perhaps inevitably, from the two characters which His Majesty as King of Hanover unites in his own person, and from the claim which he voluntarily makes to enjoy or exercise, concurrently, in this country, his rights as a sovereign prince, and also his rights as an English subject, peer, and Privy Councillor. He is a sovereign prince, [56] and, as such, inviolable in his own dominions, and, I presume, also in the dominions of every other prince to whom he is not a subject. Remaining in his own dominions, or in the dominions of any other prince to whom he is not a subject, he would, as I presume, be exempt from all forensic jurisdiction. But he comes to this country where he is a subject, and claims and exercises his rights as such. As a subject, he owes duties correlative to which, not individually, but the country at large may have legal rights, which are to be respected, and giving legal rights against a subject in respect of his acts and duties as a subject, it seems that they ought, if necessary and practicable, to be vindicated and enforced by the law. Those legal rights would be nugatory, if his inviolability as a sovereign prince would admit of no exception or modification. But any contradiction or inconsistency may be obviated by distinguishing, as in the analogous case of the ambassador, the acts which ought to be attributed to one character or the other; and, it appears to me, that, when necessary, it must be the office and duty of the Courts to make the distinction.

If the distinction can be justly made, why should it not, and why should not the jurisdiction be exercised, so far as the circumstances of the case will allow?

Admitting it to be the general rule, that sovereign princes are not liable to be sued, and that all sovereign princes may consider themselves interested to maintain the inviolability which each one claims, and that any aggression upon it might, in ordinary circumstances, be a cause of war; yet, observing what is stated to be the law of nations in the case of ambassadors, conceiving that a rule applicable only to the case of sovereigns who are subjects, and think fit actively to exercise their rights as subjects, cannot have any extensive application, [57] and is not likely to excite any general interest, or any alarm, and having regard to that which is absolutely required to maintain the relation of sovereign and subject in any country, I am of opinion that no complaint can justly or will probably arise, from any legal proceeding, the object of which is to compel, as far as practically may be, a sovereign prince residing in the territory of another prince whose subject he is, to perform the duties of a subject, in relation to his own acts done in the character of subject only.

And admitting that, in ordinary cases, it may happen, that the execution of a decree cannot be enforced against a sovereign prince though a subject of this realm, I do not think that, for that reason, a Plaintiff should be deprived of all means of establishing his right in a due course of procedure; I do not think that I ought to presume that a sovereign prince, who deems it to be consistent with his dignity and interest to come here and practically exercise the rights of an English subject, will not also deem it consistent with his dignity and interest to yield willing obedience to the law of England when duly declared.

And for these reasons I am of opinion, that His Majesty the King of Hanover is and ought to be exempt from all liability of being sued in the Courts of this country for any acts done by him as King of Hanover, or in his character of sovereign prince; but that, being a subject of the Queen, he is and ought to be liable to be sued in the Courts of this country, in respect of any acts and transactions done by him, or in which he may have been engaged as such subject.

And in respect of any act done out of this realm, or any act as to which it may be doubtful, whether it ought to be attributed to the character of sovereign or to the character of subject, it appears to me, that it ought to be presumed to be attributable rather to the character of sovereign than to the character of subject.

And it further appears to me, that in a suit in this Court against a sovereign prince, who is also a subject, the bill ought, upon the face of it, to shew that the subject-matter of it constitutes a case in which a sovereign prince is liable to be sued as a subject.

I cannot, therefore, consider the present suit as an ordinary suit between subject and subject; it is a suit against a Defendant who is prima facie entitled to special immunities, and it ought to appear on the bill, that the case made by it is a case to which the special immunities ought not to be extended.

What is shewn is, that the Defendant is an English subject, and may therefore not be exempt from suit in some cases. Is it shewn that this is one of the cases in which the Defendant is liable to be sued?

The object of the suit is to obtain an account of property belonging to the Plaintiff, alleged to have been possessed by the Defendant, under colour of an instrument creating a species of guardianship unknown to the law of England. It is not pretended that any one act was done, or that any one receipt in respect of which the account is asked, was made in this country. Every act alleged as a ground of complaint was done abroad, in Brunswick, in Hanover, or elsewhere in foreign countries. No act alleged as a ground of complaint, was done by the Defendant before he became King of Hanover, and from the nature of the transaction, and the recitals in this instrument, there are strong grounds to presume, that it was only by reason of his being King [59] of Hanover, that the Defendant was appointed guardian of the Plaintiff's fortune and property. It is not pretended that the instrument has been impeached, or attempted to be impeached, in the country where alone it has its locality and operation, although it is alleged to be illegal there, and no reason is given why the Plaintiff has not availed himself of that illegality to obtain relief from it.

It is alleged to be null and void here; and upon this I may observe, that although, with regard to English instruments, intended to operate according to English law, the Court, knowing the nature of the instrument, the relation between the parties to it, and the law applicable to the case, may be able, even on demurrer in a simple case, to adjudicate thereon upon a mere allegation that the instrument is null and void, yet that with regard to a foreign instrument, intending to operate according to a law not known in England, and which, as foreign law is to be proved as a fact in the cause, an allegation that the instrument is void is too vague. But passing that over, and considering the other matters which I have mentioned, and observing, notwithstanding the allegation at the Bar that the instrument complained of is wholly independent of any political or State transaction, it is in the bill stated as the sequel to a political revolution, which resulted in the deposition of a sovereign prince and the appointment of a successor, made under the authority of a decree of the Germanic Diet by the late King of Hanover and the reigning Duke of Brunswick; considering also that the instrument, stated as the sequel of these political proceedings (which I must consider to be either wholly immaterial, or as introduced into the bill for the purpose of shewing the character of the transaction in question), is stated to have been executed by the late [60] King of Hanover and the reigning Duke of Brunswick; and considering further, the objects for which the instrument is purported to have been executed, connecting those objects with the political transactions stated in the bill, and the transactions alleged to have taken place at Osterode in 1830, I should, if it were necessary for me to decide the question, be disposed to think that the instrument complained of is connected with political and State transactions, and is itself, what in common parlance is said to be a State document, and evidence of an act of State.

But, upon this occasion, it is not necessary for me to give any opinion upon the question whether the act complained of is or is not an act of State, or upon the question, which seems to have been raised in France, whether the Courts of a foreign country ought to take notice of such an instrument, for the purpose of enabling the guardian, under its authority, to possess the property and effects of the Plaintiff in such foreign country; it is not even necessary for me to decide the question whether, as against a subject only, this Court could have any jurisdiction to give relief in respect of acts done abroad, under such a foreign instrument as this.

The question which I have had to consider is, whether, under the circumstances of this case, and as against a sovereign prince who is a subject of the Queen, this Court has the jurisdiction which is attributed to it by this bill.

And I am of opinion, that the alleged acts and transactions of the Defendant, under colour or under the authority of the instrument in question, are not acts and transactions, in respect of which the Defendant is [61] liable to be sued in this Court, or in respect of which this Court has any jurisdiction over him.

Let this demurrer, therefore, be allowed.

[61] BRADSTOCK v. WHATLEY. July 7, 1843.

Notice of exceptions was not given until a day too late and was intitled wrongly. The Court relieved the party from the effects of the irregularity on payment of costs.

On the 7th of June the Plaintiff took exceptions to the Defendant's answer for insufficiency.

Notice of the exceptions was not served till the 8th of June, and such notice was intitled in a cause of Smart v. Bradstock instead of in Bradstock v. Whatley.

On the 17th of June an order was obtained referring the exceptions to the Master; and on the 20th the mistake in the title of the notice was discovered.

By the 24th Order of October 1842 (Ord. Can. 216) it is ordered, "That when any exceptions for scandal, impertinence, or insufficiency shall be taken, the solicitor of the party taking the same, or the party himself, if he acts in person, shall leave such exceptions at the Record and Writ Clerks' Office to be filed; and shall, on the same day, give notice of the filing thereof to the solicitor for the adverse party, or to the adverse party himself if he acts in person."

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, for the Plaintiff, now moved that the Plaintiff might be at liberty to give to the Defendant [62] a notice of having filed exceptions to his answer in this cause on the 7th day of June last, and if the Defendant should not, within eight days after service of such notice, submit to answer such exceptions, then that the Plaintiff might be at liberty to obtain the usual order for a reference to the Master of this Court in rotation to look into the Plaintiff's bill, the answer of the said Defendant and the exceptions taken thereto, and see if the said answer be sufficient in the points excepted to or not.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Borrett, for the Defendant, contended that the Plaintiff was not entitled to be relieved from the effect of his non-compliance with the General Order, especially as the notice had been wrongly intituled. They cited Pearse v. Ord (4 Beavan, 127), Salomon v. Stalman (4 Beavan, 243).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said there appeared to have been a mere slip, from which he might relieve the Plaintiff on payment of costs, but that the difficulty was as to the form of the order to be made.

[63] HOBSON v. SHERWOOD. July 13, 1843.

The four-day order to enforce the production of documents in the Master's office is a party to the cause, does not require personal service.

The 11th Order of August 1841, as amended by the 6th Order of April 1842, does not apply to a case of default by a party in producing deeds in the Master's office pursuant to the decree, in which case the serjeant-at-arms goes upon a disobedience of the four-day order.

By the decree, as ultimately drawn up, the Defendants were ordered to produce before the Master all books, papers, and writings in their custody or power.

On the 31st of May 1842 the Master ordered the Defendants to produce deeds in their possession within fourteen days, and, default having been made, he, on the 21st of June, certified such default.

Upon this certificate, the Court, on the 21st of June 1842, made the four-day order, by which the Defendants were ordered to produce the deeds, within four days after personal notice on their clerk in Court, and, in default, it was ordered, that the serjeant-at-arms should bring them to the Bar of the Court to answer the contempt.

The Defendants, persisting in not producing the deeds, were afterwards arrested under this order, and brought to the Bar and turned over to the Queen's Prison.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Addis now moved that the Defendants might be discharged, on the ground of irregularity in the proceedings. They contended, first, that the four-day order, being the foundation for process of contempt, ought to have been personally served on the Defendants. De Manneville v. De Manneville (12 W. 203), Rider [64] v. Kidder (12 Ves. 202), in which it was said "The practice in this Court that, in order to fix a person with contempt, the service must be personal, is a strong analogy to the practice in Courts of Common Law upon attachment. That service must be personal, unless upon some very special application it is dispensed with; which may be under circumstances certainly. The reason of requiring personal service is, non constat that there is a contempt; that the party knows that he has neglected to do anything he was called upon to perform."

Secondly, that the mode of process ought to have been by attachment, in the first instance, and not by serjeant-at-arms; for, by the 11th Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 166, note (a.)), it was ordered, "That if any party who is by an order of the Court decreed to pay money or do any other act in a limited time, shall, after service of such order, refuse or neglect to obey the same, according to the exigency thereof, the party duly prosecuting such order shall, at the expiration of the time limited for the performance thereof, be entitled to an order for a serjeant-at-arms and such other process as he hath hitherto been entitled to upon a return non est inventus, by the Commissioners named in a commission of rebellion, issued for non-performance of a decree or order." On the 11th of April 1842 this order was amended (Ord. Can. 198), and an attachment was substituted for the serjeant-at-arms. That the 11th Amended Order was therefore applicable to this case where the four-day order issued in June 1842.

Thirdly, they contended, that the Defendants had repudiated the services of their solicitor, who had become [65] lunatic previous to the order in question being made, and that the Plaintiff had notice of it, and that therefore the Six Clerk employed by him had no authority to act afterwards for the Defendants.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Parker, contra, were not called on by

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] who said: The only question is whether there has been any irregularity in the proceedings; if there has, then notwithstanding the obstinate disobedience of the Defendants in complying with the order of the Court, they are entitled to their discharge.

The Court has ordered the production of these deeds, and the Master has certified to me that he has regularly summoned the Defendants to produce them, and that they have made default. It is said that the order was irregular, because personal service was not directed; but the order is perfectly consistent with the general practice of the Court. So far back as the year 1746 the terms of the order to compel the production of documents under a decree were (Seton's Decrees, 420) "that the Defendants shall produce before the Master all books of account, papers, and writings in their custody or power, in four days after notice thereof to their clerk in Court, in default thereof, that the serjeant-at-arms attending the Court should go against the Defendants, and bring them to the Bar of the Court to answer their contempt;" and I believe that these are precisely the terms of the order which has ever since been made.

The General Order of August 1841 does not apply to this case; it applies to cases where the order is made [66] by the Court, and not to proceedings in the Master's office by warrant and subsequent process, under a decree.

The last point is, that the person on whom the order was served is not to be considered the clerk in Court of these Defendants; there is, however, an ordinary proceeding for changing the clerk in Court by order; no such proceeding has been adopted in this instance, and therefore the clerk in Court has not been regularly charged.

It is then said that the Defendants had no knowledge of these proceedings; but in the affidavits it is perfectly clear that they had notice of the order made, and one of them has throughout expressed her determination not to produce these deeds. There does not appear to be any irregularity, and I must therefore refuse this application with costs.

[66] PERRY v. TRUEFITT. Dec. 8, 9, 1842.

The Leather Cloth Company v. The American Leather Cloth Company, 1865, 11 H. L. C. 523; 11 E. R. 1435 (with note); Morgan v. M'Adam, 1866, 36 L. J. Ch. 229; Ford v. Foster, 1872, L. R. 7 Ch. 625; Singer Manufacturing Company v. Wilson, 1876, 2 Ch. D. 461; Johnston v. Orr-Ewing, 1882, 7 App. Cas. 229; Reddaway v. Banham [1896], A. C. 209. As to Gout v. Aleploglu, 6 Beav. 69, n. See In re Betherham's Trade Mark, 1879-80, 11 Ch. D. 253; 14 Ch. D. 587.]

A ground on which the Court protects trade marks is, that it will not permit a party to sell his own goods as the goods of another; a party will not, therefore, be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia by which he may pass off his own goods to purchasers as the manufacture of another person.

A Plaintiff coming for an injunction in such a case appears to have been guilty of misrepresentations to the public the Court will not interfere in the first instance.

This was a motion for a special injunction to restrain the Defendant from selling a greasy composition for the hair, under the name of "Medicated Mexican Balm," under similar designations.

It appeared that, in 1836, a Mr. Leathart invented a grease or mixture for the hair, the secret and recipe for making which he sold to the Plaintiff, a hairdresser and barber residing in Burlington Arcade.

[67] The Plaintiff gave to the composition in question, the name of "Medicated Mexican Balm," and sold it as "Perry's Medicated Mexican Balm." It having acquired an extensive sale and repute, the Defendant Truefitt (a rival hairdresser and perfumer living in the same place), had lately commenced selling a greasy composition, somewhat similar to that of the Plaintiff, in bottles, and with labels closely resembling those used by him. He designated and sold it as "Truefitt's Medicated Mexican Balm."

The Plaintiff thereupon filed this bill, alleging that the name or designation of Medicated Mexican Balm had become of great value to him as a trade mark: that its adoption by the Defendant was apt to deceive persons desirous of purchasing the Plaintiff's composition, and was very injurious to him. The bill prayed an account of the profits made by the Defendant, and for an injunction.

Though Mr. Leathart was the inventor, yet the Plaintiff, according to his own statement, used a printed shew card, in which he represented the article in question in the following terms:—"By special appointment—MEDICATED MEXICAN BALM, for restoring, nourishing, strengthening, and beautifying the hair, Perry, 12 and 13 Burlington Arcade, London. It is a highly concentrated extract from vegetable balsamic productions, of that interesting but little known country, Mexico, and possesses mild astringent properties, which give tone to weak and impoverished hair, and impart a glossy appearance to the naturally dull and harsh. Where there is a tendency to fall off, the Mexican Balm exerts its astringent qualities, and gradually but infallibly, braces the pores of the cuticle, and arrests the deterioration of the most beautiful ornament of the [68] human frame, a fine head of hair. This admirable composition is made from an original recipe of the learned J. F. Von Blumenbach, and recently presented to the proprietor by a very near relation of that illustrious physiologist."

The application was supported and resisted by affidavits, in one of which, filed on the part of the Plaintiff, it was stated, that the Defendant's mixture being submitted to chemical analysis, was found to be "composed of lard and olive oil, perfumed with essential oils;" but that that of the Plaintiff "did not contain lard or any other animal fat."

It appeared also from an affidavit, that the Plaintiff had in many instances adopted the fanciful names invented for similar articles by the Defendant and other persons, he merely prefixing his own name thereto, as in the present case.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Trotter, in support of the motion. The Plaintiff had acquired the sole right of using the name invented by him, and of which he has had the uninterrupted enjoyment for six years. It has become a trade mark which the Defendant has no right to assume, and which this Court will protect. In Milling v. Fox (3 M. & Cr. 338), it was held that the Court "will grant a perpetual injunction against the use, by one tradesman, of the trade marks of another, although such marks have been so used in ignorance of their being any person's property, and under the belief that they were merely technical terms."

So in the "Watch case" (1 Chitty's General Prac. 721), "the Vice-Chancellor granted an injunction to restrain the Defendant from [69] sending to Constantinople certain watches with the word 'Pesendede,' in Turkish characters (meaning 'warranted'), in imitation of the watches of the Plaintiff, by which they had for very many years been distinguished, and by which he had obtained great credit in the Turkish trade." (1)

(1) Gout v. Aleploglu. V.-C. April 15, 1833.

Injunction to restrain a party from making and sending to Turkey watches having the Plaintiff's name or the word "warranted" engraved thereon in Turkish characters in imitation of the Plaintiff's watches.

This case seems to have been as follows:—The Plaintiff Gout had been accustomed to manufacture watches for the Turkish market, in which country they had acquired great repute, and were known by the marks engraved thereon, as after stated. The Plaintiff had been accustomed to engrave upon the inside of his watches, and in Turkish characters, his name, and the word "Pesendede," which signifies "warranted"

[70] We admit that when a party makes a new invention, and does not obtain the protection of a patent, any other person who can discover the process of the invention, may both make and sell the article; but what is complained of here is, that the Defendant not having discovered the ingredients of the Plaintiff's invention, sells a spurious article quite different from that manufactured by the Plaintiff under the name appropriated by the Plaintiff to his invention. He sells a composition of sand and olive oil, as the composition of the Plaintiff, which contains no animal fat. He sells an inferior article, and the trade and reputation of the Plaintiff is thereby injured. There is also evidence that the Defendant has represented the two articles as being the same, and that his own is the original. It could not be by accident that the Defendant adopted the peculiar name, his object could only have been to obtain himself the benefit of the character and celebrity of the article invented by the Plaintiff. The prefixing his own name does not remove the objection. The Defendant is committing a fraud on the Plaintiff, and an imposition on the public. This Court ought to restrain him from fraudulently using the words, adopted by the Plaintiff to distinguish his manufacture, for the purpose of attracting custom, which, but for such improper conduct on the part of the Defendant, would have gone to the Plaintiff; see v. Morgan (2 Keen, 213; and see Day v. Benning, 1 C. P. Cooper, 489).

[71] Mr. G. Turner and Mr. James Parker, contra. A party cannot acquire an exclusive property in a name; Blanchard v. Hill (2 Atk. 484), Canham v. Jones (2 Ves. 218); if there be any right, it is a legal right, which ought to be ascertained by proceedings at law, before this Court interferes by injunction. If the Plaintiff could establish such a right as that which he contends for, he would be in a better situation as a patentee after the expiration of his patent, who cannot prevent other persons from using themselves of his invention, or from selling the article by the same name. There appears also to be a usage amongst the trade to adopt any fanciful name invented by another party, if he merely prefixes his own name; and the Plaintiff, as appears from the affidavits, has adopted that practice in several instances, to the prejudice of the Defendant.

The Defendant has never pretended to sell his own manufacture as that of the Plaintiff, but a similar article merely; this he had a right to do. In every instance he carefully prefixed his own name to the article he sold, and sold it as "Truefitt's Medicated Mexican Balm," and not as "Perry's Medicated Mexican Balm." This is like the cases of Sykes v. Sykes (3 B. & Cr. 541), Blofeld v. Payne (4 Barn. & Ad. 1), where the Defendants had used the marks on the shot belts and the wrappers the bones in order to pass off their own manufacture as the Plaintiff's; so in Kingdon v. Fox, the mark used was the name of the Plaintiffs, and naturally designated them as the manufacturers of the steel made by the Defendant.

The false statements made by the Plaintiff to the public as to the invention, is approved." There was also R.G. and a crescent put in relief, and a sprig and acorn.

In 1831 the Defendant applied to the Plaintiff to undertake an order for the manufacture of watches to be consigned to Constantinople, but conceiving he might be his agent there, the Plaintiff refused to execute such order.

The Defendant afterwards got Messrs. Parkinson to manufacture watches for him, which there were engraved, in Turkish characters, the words "Ralph Gout" and "Pessendede" on the same part of the watch as those of the Plaintiff, and which the Defendant Aleploglu consigned to Constantinople, and sold there to the prejudice of the Plaintiff's trade.

Mr. Knight and Mr. Koe moved for an injunction.

Mr. Spence, contra.

The Vice-Chancellor granted an injunction in the terms of the notice of motion, restraining Aleploglu from sending or permitting to go to Constantinople and Turkey, or any other place, and from selling and disposing of any watches with the name of the Plaintiff thereon in Turkish characters, or the word "Pessendede" thereon in Turkish characters, or any watches in imitation of the Plaintiff's watches; and also restraining Aleploglu and Messrs. Parkinson from manufacturing or vending such watches. Reg. Lib. 1832, A. 1247.

fatal to his application for [72] an injunction. Though the invention is stated and proved to have been made by Leathart, the Plaintiff has represented to the public that "this admirable composition is made from an original recipe of the learned J. F. Von Blumenbach, and recently presented to the proprietor by a very near relation of that illustrious physiologist." It is also represented to be "a concentrated extract from vegetable balsamic productions of Mexico;" but that does not in any way appear to be the case. Now, in Pidding v. How (8 Sim. 477), the injunction was refused on the ground of the public misrepresentations of the Plaintiff as to the composition of a tea called "Howqua's Mixture." The Vice-Chancellor there says, "it is a clear rule laid down by Courts of Equity not to extend their protection to persons whose case is not founded in truth. And as the Plaintiff in this case has thought fit to mix up that which may be true with that which is false, in introducing the tea to the public, my opinion is, that unless he establish his title at law, the Court cannot interfere on his behalf."

Motley v. Downman (3 Myl. & Cr. 1. And see Singleton v. Bolton, 3 Doug. 239, and Morison v. Salmon (2 Man. & G. 385) were also cited.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question in cases of this kind is, whether the Court should grant an injunction in the first instance, or should withhold its interference until the matter has been tried in a Court of law, to which jurisdiction the determination of the legal right properly belongs.

[73] I think that the principle on which both the Courts of law and of Equity proceed, in granting relief and protection in cases of this sort, is very well-understood. A man is not to sell his own goods under the pretence that they are the goods of another man; he cannot be permitted to practise such a deception, nor to use the means which contribute to that end. He cannot therefore be allowed to use names, marks, letters, or other indicia, by which he may induce purchasers to believe, that the goods which he is selling are the manufacture of another person. I own it does not seem to me that a man can acquire a property merely in a name or mark; but whether he has or not a property in the name or the mark, I have no doubt that another person has not a right to use that name or mark for the purposes of deception, and in order to attract to himself that course of trade, or that custom, which, without that improper act, would have flowed to the person who first used, or was alone in the habit of using the particular name or mark.

The case of Millington v. Fox (3 M. & Cr. 338) seems to have gone this length, that the deception need not be intentional, and that a man, though not intending any injury to another, shall not be allowed to adopt the marks by which the goods of another are designated, if the effect of adopting them would be to prejudice the trade of such other person. I am not aware that any previous case carried the principle to that extent.

In the present case the material facts do not appear to me to be in dispute. Some years ago the Plaintiff, Mr. Perry, became possessed of a recipe which he calls the secret for making a certain composition to encourage the growth of hair. To that composition he has given the name of "Perry's Medicated Mexican Balm." He says [74] that the term "Medicated Mexican Balm," to which he has prefixed his name, has acquired a character and reputation in commerce, by which his particular composition is distinguished, and that whenever the particular name of "Medicated Mexican Balm" has been used, it has been understood to mean the Medicated Mexican Balm of Mr. Perry, of which he has the sole secret. He says also, that nobody could well suppose there was any such composition other than that to which his name was attached. It is certainly is not very easy to see how that could be so, because all the words that are used in the phrase "Medicated Mexican Balm," are perfectly capable of being applied to a very different composition. It may be a balm, but not his balm; it may be medicated, but not medicated in his way; it may be Mexican, and yet not Mexican of the same sort or material as that which he uses. It is therefore difficult to suppose there could not be any other "Medicated Mexican Balm" than that to which the Plaintiff has given the name of "Perry's Medicated Mexican Balm." However, there is evidence, and evidence of considerable strength and importance to that effect, which is not denied.

The Plaintiff having sold this composition for several years, and derived considerable profit therefrom, the Defendant, Mr. Truefitt, a very few months ago, set up as manufacturer of "Medicated Mexican Balm." He is not, however, and does not pretend to be, the manufacturer or vendor of Perry's Medicated Mexican Balm, but the article which he makes and sells is by him designated as "Truefitt's Medicated Mexican Balm."

It is in no way denied that he has adopted the term "Medicated Mexican Balm" as the Plaintiff, or that he intended to derive some benefit from adopting the name, which, to the extent I have referred to, belonged [75] to the Plaintiff; but he says, he is, in the trade of perfumers to which he belongs, a general custom, that if any man invents a fanciful name for any article which he manufactures and sells for the trade, he never thinks, nor do the trade think that he has a property in that name, and that any other manufacturer has a right to adopt the same name, provided he only prefixes his own name to it as the manufacturer of the article so named. I should be very much surprised if it could be established that there was a custom of trade by which one man's property or rights could be transferred from him to another. In the case as this, if Mr. Perry alone had the peculiar right to this name, I should be surprised to find any custom of trade by which his right could be infringed upon: but however is the ground on which Mr. Truefitt says he acted; he says, "I have sold it in my own name."

There is, however, an imputation, that Mr. Truefitt sold his composition, alleging to be the manufacture of Mr. Perry. I believe, from the evidence, he intended seriously to guard against this: he seems to have thought that by prefixing the name of Truefitt to every article he sold, he prevented any imputation on him that he was selling Perry's article, and the care taken in that respect is remarkable. Even in the cases where the bottles of Perry were taken to be filled or refilled, as the cases state, Mr. Truefitt never allowed the bottles to go out of the shop with the name "Perry" on them, or otherwise than with his own name of "Truefitt" attached to them. The question is, whether in a case where there has not been, on the part of the Defendant, an intention to sell the article as the article manufactured by the Plaintiff, it is enough to induce the Court to grant the injunction? I think it is as the Plaintiff's [76] counsel stated, Truefitt is not accused of having sold the article as Perry manufactured, but of selling another article of a different kind, as and the article of Mr. Perry, distinguishing it by the name of "Truefitt's Medicated Mexican Balm," and without attaching the name of Perry to it, and that seems to be the point on which this case turns. Now it is a legal question to be determined at whether Mr. Truefitt had a right to do so or not; and I think, if the case rested on the merits alone, I should say that this motion ought to stand over, in order that the action might be brought to try the right; but when we see the representations made by Mr. Perry, I think they are conclusive against him on this application.

I entirely agree with the observation made by the Vice-Chancellor of England, in the case of Pidding v. How (8 Sim. 477) relative to Howqua's mixture of tea; I do think it is a favourable case for the interposition of this Court, to say the least when a party, having bought a secret invented by a Mr. Leathart, represents to customers and the world, that his "admirable composition is made from an exact recipe of the learned Von Blumenbach, and was recently presented to the Emperor by a very near relation of that illustrious physiologist."

The Plaintiff states also a circumstance, not in the least degree supported by evidence, that the composition is formed of vegetable balsamic production from Peru. There are other things, which I do not think it necessary to observe upon, but which make me think this is not a favourable case for a person to come in the first place and claim the assistance of a Court of Equity, in aid of a legal right, which I do not deny he may have.

[77] I think this case must stand over with liberty to Mr. Perry to bring an action, and either party must have liberty to apply.

NOTE.—The Plaintiff having taken no steps to try the action, the Defendant, on the 14th day of July 1843, applied for the costs of the motion, which were granted. The bill was then (with the consent of the Plaintiff) dismissed with costs.

[77] STRICKLAND v. STRICKLAND. April 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 29, August 4, 1842.

[A note in the Addenda to 9 Beav. states that this case was affirmed by Lord Cottenham, January 27, 1848.]

In cases where there are outstanding terms, which may be set up in defence to the action, and prevent a trial of the real merits of the case, or where the facts are such, and of a nature so complicated that complete and effectual relief can only be given in equity, this Court will afford its assistance, and will, if the circumstances require it, first see that the legal requisites to the Plaintiff's title are established, and then give the necessary relief; but this must be upon a bill framed for the purpose, stating the difficulties, and praying the assistance of the Court to remove them. The cases of dower and partition are, however, exceptions to the rule.

Where a party sought in this Court to recover a real estate on the ground of his interest being equitable, but did not ask relief against any impediment to a trial at law, and it turned out at the hearing that his title was a legal title, the Court refused to retain the suit to enable the Plaintiff to establish his right at law by an action or issue, and dismissed the bill.

This case was argued by Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Bethell, and Mr. Heathfield, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Shadwell, for the principal Defendant.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Koe, for other parties.

August 4. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill prays, that the will and codicil of Sir George Strickland, who died in 1808, may be established; and the trusts thereof carried into execution under the decree of this Court: and that it may be declared, that the Plaintiff, on the death of Walter Strickland, became [78] entitled, for his life, to all the estates (including the estates at Winteringham, East Haslerton, and Knapton), which are expressed by the will to be devised to George Strickland, Charles Strickland, and Walter Strickland respectively, but exclusively of the estates by the will devised to Charles Strickland, immediately or expectant on the death of Dame Elizabeth Letitia Strickland; and that the Defendant Sir George Strickland may be decreed to convey the same to the Plaintiff accordingly, and to account to the Plaintiff for the rents and profits thereof, received by him since the death of Walter Strickland, after deducting all payments made in respect of charges created by the will, and also to deliver to the Plaintiff the deeds and evidences of title of and relating to the same estates respectively; and that in the meantime, a receiver may be appointed of the same estates; and that it may be declared that the Plaintiff is entitled to cut down any timber, or to open and work any mines upon the estates to which he so became entitled for life; and that it may be declared that, under the circumstances in the bill mentioned, the Defendant Sir George Strickland is bound to settle and convey all the estates, lands, and hereditaments, in which the testator had any estate or interest (other than the estates which passed by his will), of or to which the Defendant Sir George Strickland became seized, or possessed, or entitled, under or by virtue of any will or settlement made previous to the date of the will of the testator Sir George Strickland, either directly or through Sir William Strickland, in such manner, that upon failure of issue male of Sir William, the same might remain to the other sons of the testator and their issue male (including the Plaintiff and his issue male) in succession, and on failure of such issue, in the same manner as the testator has, by his will, limited the rest of his estates in failure of issue male from him.

[79] Upon the hearing of this cause, it appeared to me that the title of the Plaintiff depended entirely upon the legal validity and effect of the will and codicil of the testator, and that he could not be entitled to any relief in this Court, until he had first established the validity of the devises by a proceeding at law.

It was then contended on the part of the Defendant Sir George Strickland, that the Plaintiff was not entitled to any relief whatever in this Court, and that, at all events, all proceedings in the cause should be suspended, till the Plaintiff had made out his title in an action; whilst, on the other hand, the Plaintiff contended, that his title to the estates in question was an equitable title—that the circumstances of the case entitled him to relief here—and that, if it were necessary for him to establish the validity of the devise at law, it would be more convenient to do so on the trial of an issue, than on the trial of an action.

The question is, whether the bill is to be retained, and if so, whether it shall be retained for a year, with liberty for the Plaintiff to bring an action, or whether an order should be made for the trial of an issue.

Upon the facts which are in issue and proved in this case, I am of opinion, that the Plaintiff's title, such as it is, is a legal title, a title which may be made available at law in the ordinary course of legal proceeding, unless there be some obstacle, making it necessary and proper to ask for the assistance of this Court, and the bill be so framed as to entitle the Plaintiff to that assistance.

In cases where there are outstanding terms, which may be set up in defence to the action, and prevent a [80] trial of the real merits of the case, or where the facts are such, and of a nature so complicated, that complete and effectual relief can only be given here, this Court will afford its assistance, and will, if circumstances require, first see that the legal requisites to the Plaintiff's title are established, and then give the necessary relief; but this must be upon a bill framed for the purpose, stating the difficulties, and praying the assistance of the Court to remove them.

This is not the case in this suit. The bill states the Plaintiff's title, and that notwithstanding the devise under which he is entitled, the Defendant Sir George Strickland has taken, and holds possession of the estates in question, claims a right to receive the rents and apply them to his own use, and has possessed himself of the deeds. The bill does not allege, that the deeds are wanting to enable the Plaintiff to make out his title at law, or the seisin of the testator under whom he claims; but stating that the Defendant Sir George Strickland has refused to comply with the Plaintiff's request to give up possession of the estates and of the deeds, and to account for the rents, the bill proceeds to charge several circumstances, from which it is meant to be deduced, that the devise under which the Plaintiff claims, is to be deemed a valid devise; and, in effect, the Plaintiff seeks to recover possession of the estate, in this cause, by the strength of his own title here, not asking the assistance of this Court to relieve him from difficulties, which he may be unable to overcome at law without the aid of this Court.

It was argued, that if difficulties are shewn to exist, and if, from the nature of the case, it appears to be in the power of the Defendant to raise those difficulties, this Court will not only restrain the Defendant from [81] raising the difficulties, but will assume the whole jurisdiction over the case; and if this were so, the Plaintiff might be entitled to relief on this bill. But there is no such general rule; there are, indeed, some particular cases of legal right, such as dower and partition, in which the Court has assumed a general jurisdiction, probably in consequence of the difficulties which the Plaintiff would be subjected in seeking to obtain complete justice at law; but in other cases, the Plaintiff is to shew what the difficulties are, and how they impede him in a manner contrary to equity, and his bill ought to pray to be relieved from them.

In this case the bill does not contemplate any proceeding at law; it asks for no assistance in any trial, neither by the production of any deeds, nor by injunction from setting up outstanding terms, nor in any other way; and I am of opinion, that the Plaintiff has not shewn an equitable title—as it appears that the title by which he claims is a legal title—as he asks relief in this Court on the foundation of the equitable title which he alleges but has not shewn, and does not ask for the assistance of this Court in aid of any proceeding at law to recover upon a legal title, he is not, upon this bill, entitled to any relief here, and that therefore the bill must be dismissed.

Generally, in such a case the bill should be dismissed with costs; but having read the plea and the answer of Sir George Strickland to the original bill, and his plea and answer to the amended bill, and observing the mode in which his defence has been conducted in the pleadings and the allegations made in the answers, I think that, as against Sir George Strickland, the bill must be dismissed without costs. The other defendants are entitled to their costs.

[82] The cross-bill of Sir George Strickland must be dismissed without costs.

[82] BARKER v. COCKS. Feb. 23, 1843.

[See Dean v. Handley, 1865, 2 H. & M. 639.]

A testator gave a fund, subject to the life interest of his wife, to A., B., and C., equally to be divided between them, "but in case of the decease of C. without leaving lawful issue," he gave her one-third between A. and B. Held, that upon the decease of the wife, C., who was then living, became absolutely entitled to one-third of the fund.

Upon the marriage of James Nicoll Morris and Margaretta Sarah Cocks a settlement was made, whereby a sum of £17,000 3 per cent. Imperial annuities were settled on the husband for life, with remainder to the wife for life, with remainder to the issue, and, in default, as the husband should appoint.

There was no child of the marriage.

James Nicoll Morris, by his will dated in 1823, amongst other things, expressed himself as follows:—"And as to the sum of £17,000 3 per cent. Imperial annuities now subject to the trusts of my marriage settlement, and any monies which I may die possessed of in the Bank stock of this kingdom, I do hereby give and bequeath the same, from and after the decease of my said wife, unto my cousins John Bowden Morris and Margaret Penelope Morris and my sister-in-law Eliza Jane Cocks, equally to be divided between them, share and share alike; but in case of the decease of my said sister-in-law Eliza Jane Cocks, without leaving lawful issue, I do hereby give and bequeath her third part of the said stocks, funds, and securities equally between my said two cousins John Bowden Morris and Margaret Penelope Morris, and to their respective executors and administrators."

[83] The testator died in 1830. His widow, Margaretta Sarah Morris, died in February 1842.

By this bill, Eliza Jane Cocks (now Eliza Jane Barker) claimed to have one-third of the fund paid over to her.

Mr. Plunkett and Mr. Wickens, for the Plaintiffs, cited Home v. Pillans (2 Myl. & K. 15), Galland v. Leonard (1 Swan. 161), Monteith v. Nicholson (2 Keen, 719), Griffith v. Smith (1 Ves. jun. 97), Bell v. Phyn (7 Ves. 452), and see Davenport v. Bishop (2 Y. & Col. (C. C.), 463).

Mr. Glasse, for J. B. Morris and M. P. Morris; Tilson v. Jones (1 R. & M. 553); Smart v. Clark (3 Russ. 365).

Mr. Bates, for the trustee.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think that the Plaintiffs are entitled. The first object of the testator was that the three legatees should enjoy the property, share and share alike; each was to have an equal advantage with the others; but as to the one-third part of Eliza Jane Cocks, there is a gift over to the other two in case of her decease without leaving lawful issue. The question is, to what period of time does this event relate. If you make the dying without leaving lawful issue refer to the period anterior to the death of the tenant for life, you carry into effect the primary intention of the testator to divide the fund amongst the three, share and share alike.

[84] BONSER v. COX. August 1, 1842.

A creditor against two estates for the same debt, is entitled to receive dividends on the full amount from both estates, until he has been satisfied his debt.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This suit was instituted for the administration of the estate of John Cox deceased, for the benefit of his creditors.

Sir Joseph Lock, who had been partner with Thomas Richard Walker, was a creditor of John Cox to the amount of £3200, for the payment of which he claimed a lien on a sum of £2982 stock, standing in the name of the Accountant-General of this Court, to the account of the testator's leasehold estate.

He had also a claim on a bill of exchange to which John Cox and others were parties.

And he had a collateral security from Ferdinando Cox and his wife, who transferred £30 long annuities into the names of Lock and Walker, as a guarantee for any which they might incur in and about the transactions with John Cox.

Sir Joseph Lock established his lien on the fund in this Court. The fund was ordered to be sold, and the money to be applied in reduction of the debt; and it was ordered, that Sir Joseph Lock should stand as a creditor on the general assets of John Cox for the balance and for his costs. The balance and costs having been ascertained, Sir Joseph Lock was, under the order, admitted a creditor for £50, 19s. 4d.

[35] Since his being admitted creditor for this sum, he has sold the long annuities assigned to him as a guarantee, and incurred some costs on account thereof; and he received, as a dividend on the estate of a bankrupt who was party to the bill of exchange on which John Cox was liable, the sum of £22, 12s.

This petition prays that the money received in respect of the long annuities may be applied in payment of any costs which Sir Joseph Lock may be entitled to be paid thereout; and that the residue thereof, together with the sum of £22, 12s., may be applied in satisfaction or reduction of the £459, 19s. 4d., for which he has admitted a creditor against the estate of John Cox.

I am of opinion that the Petitioner is not entitled to this relief. The £30 long annuities were a collateral security, and the produce is to be applied in payment of Sir Joseph Lock shall lose in respect of the transactions in question and certain. It is not to be applied in exoneration of the estate of John Cox. Whatever he received by Sir Joseph Lock, and applied otherwise than according to the order, he will be answerable for to Ferdinando Cox and wife, or those claiming for them.

And as to the £22, 12s., if it be obtained, as was stated at the Bar, from the estate of a person who was party to a bill of exchange to which John Cox was also a party, Sir Joseph Lock is entitled to payment of dividends out of both estates till his whole is satisfied; he is not to receive more than one satisfaction; but, until he is paid, he may stand as a creditor against the estate of John Cox, and also against the estate of Richard William Johnson, and receive dividends from both.

Dismiss the petition with costs. (See Ex parte Wildman, 1 Atk. 109, and In re Bower, 1 Phillips, 56.)

[36] CHOLMONDELEY v. LORD ASHBURTON. March 1, 2, 1843.

Now, as such, cannot take under a limitation to the next of kin of her husband according to the Statute of Distributions.

On marriage settlement, the ultimate limitation of a fund was to such persons "as should, at the decease of the husband, be entitled to his personal estate, as his next of kin, according to the statute for the distribution of personal estate of persons dying intestate, if the husband had died intestate without having been married to his wife. The wife died, and the husband married again and died. Held, that the widow took nothing under this limitation.

On the marriage of George James Cholmondeley with Catherine Francis, his wife, a sum of £10,000 belonging to the former was settled upon the husband, and the children of the marriage; and in case of there being no children (which indeed) the fund was to be held on the trust following:—"In trust for such persons as would, at the decease of the said George James Cholmondeley, be entitled to his personal estate, as his next of kin according to the statutes for the distribution of personal estate of persons dying intestate, if the said George James Cholmondeley had died intestate without having been married to the said Catherine Francis."

There were no children of the marriage. George James Cholmondeley survived

Catherine his wife, and contracted a third marriage with the Defendant Mary Elizabeth Townsend (now Countess of Romney). He died in 1830, leaving two children as next of kin, viz, the Plaintiff, the only surviving issue of his first marriage, and the Defendant Frances Sophia Cholmondeley, the only issue of his third marriage.

The question in the cause was, whether, under the ultimate limitation, the widow of George James Cholmondeley was entitled to participate in the £10,000, or whether it belonged exclusively to his children, as his sole next of kin.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Tripp, for the Plaintiff; and [87] Mr. Kindersley and Sir Walter Riddell, in the same interest, contended that the wife was not of the blood or kindred of her husband, and could not therefore take under a limitation to his next of kin.

They cited Wilby v. Mangles (4 Beavan, 358), Watt v. Watt (3 Ves. 244), Gore v. Lord Camden (14 Ves. 372), Elmsley v. Young (2 Myl. & Keen, 82, 780). 21 B. 8, c. 5, s. 3, and 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Stinton, contra, argued that the widow of the third marriage was entitled to share in the fund. They cited Hardwick v. Thurston (4 Rum. 3) and Bailey v. Wright (18 Ves. 49).

Mr. Williams, for an executor.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Cases of this kind are never satisfactory, in consequence of the popular meaning which in common parlance is attached to the words "next of kin according to the statute."

If the words "next of kin" had been omitted, I should have no doubt that the widow would be then entitled; but, having been inserted, I must give them full effect, and look for the persons whom the law designates by that expression. It is that the wife is not one of the next of kin. The whole is given amongst the next of kin, and the two children are therefore entitled if it be the fact that there were no children of the second marriage, and no appointment. Those facts must be ascertained.

[88] THE EARL OF LICHFIELD v. BOND. March 15, 16, 1843.

Where a Plaintiff, by his bill, seeks a discovery of matters which might subject the Defendant to a criminal prosecution, and also seeks other legitimate discovery, it is his duty to separate the two; for if they be so mixed up or connected, that a discovery by inference or exclusion they may lead to a disclosure which might subject the Defendant to prosecution, he is not bound to answer any portion of it.

The bill in this cause prayed the delivery up of two bills of exchange, alleged to have been given for gambling, and for an injunction to restrain an action to be brought by the Defendant thereon.

The bill was filed in November 1842 and stated, "that the Defendant James Bond of No. 54 St. James Street, in the county of Middlesex, for some time previously to and on the 26th day of July 1841 kept a gambling-house for playing illegal games of chance and hazard at No. 54 St. James Street aforesaid."

That the Plaintiff lost £800 "at play and gambling in such illegal games of chance and hazard, at the said gambling-house;" that "in consideration of the money so lost, and of money alleged to have been lent to him for payment of such losses," the Plaintiff accepted and delivered to the Defendant the bills in question; and that the Defendant had commenced an action at law against the Plaintiff on such bills of exchange.

The bill further stated, that the Defendant pretended that the bills had been given for good and valuable consideration, whereas the Plaintiff charged the costs and it charged that the Defendant "ought, by his answer, to set forth in particular what consideration, and whether in money or money's worth, and if in money's worth, stating the dates, numbers, amounts, and particulars of all such bills, notes, or other orders or securities for money; and if in money's worth, stating in particular the pro-[89]-perty, articles, and things, with their respective descriptions, values, and amounts, and from whom obtained by him, and gave for the said bills respectively, and to whom, and on what day, and time of lay, and in what places, and in whose house, and in whose presence respectively, stating the names, places of residence, and description of every person there present when he gave such consideration." It charged, that if the said Joseph Bond gave any consideration for the bills or either of them, it was but a nominal and inadequate consideration, and given colourably; and that if any considerable amount was paid, or the greater or some part thereof was paid back again, or in some manner returned, satisfied, accounted for, or secured, or an equivalent or nearly an equivalent hereof was returned to Joseph Bond, or some person or persons connected with him, or the same was lent for, and applied with the knowledge of Joseph Bond, in payment of losses by gambling, and for the purpose of unlawful gambling; and that a portion thereof was advanced, or in any manner applied for the lawful purposes of the Plaintiff.

That the Defendant was not in the habit of receiving bills of exchange in his trade, and that he ought to set forth what was and is the course and nature of his business and transactions, but that he was engaged in bill transactions for the accommodation of persons gambling and playing at games at hazard and chance, and in bills, notes, and securities for money lost and won at play, and for money lent or advanced for payment of money lost at play, and to be used for gambling, and other such purposes. The bill also charged, that the Defendant kept books in which were entries relating to the winnings and losses in his house.

[90] These and other similar statements and charges were interrogated in the usual manner, and the Defendant was required to answer them.

The Defendant, by his answer, merely stated that the Plaintiff had accepted the bills in question, and delivered them to the Defendant, who had commenced an action thereon; and with the exception of the bills and the proceedings in the action, he denied the possession of any documents "in the bill mentioned, and in his answer answered unto;" and "without admitting the truth of any of such matters, he declined to answer any of the other matters in the said bill mentioned, and inquired after and not thereinbefore answered unto, the Plaintiff, as the Defendant was advised and submitted and humbly insisted, not being entitled to any answer thereto from the Defendant."

The Defendant having wholly omitted to answer the other parts of the bill, the Plaintiff took twenty-two exceptions for insufficiency, which the Master however allowed; and the cause now came on upon exceptions taken by the Plaintiff to the Master's report.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Willcock, for the Plaintiff, in support of the exceptions, is clearly settled that this Court has jurisdiction to order securities given for money lost at play to be delivered up; Rawden v. Shadwell (Ambler, 269), Wynne v. Alexander (1 Russ. 293); and it has the power of compelling a discovery necessary for proving the Plaintiff's case; Andrews v. Berry (3 Anstruther, 634).

[91] The reason the Defendant objects to answer is, because he may be subject to penalties, but where the time limited for suing for the penalties has expired, a Defendant is bound to answer, and can no longer claim any protection; Parkhurst v. Owen (1 Mer. 400), The Corporation of Trinity House v. Burge (2 Sim. 411). In this case the time has expired, 31 Eliz. c. 5, s. 5.

The Statute of Ann (9 Ann. c. 14, s. 3) enacts, that persons liable to be sued shall be compellable to answer on oath, and this Act has been extended by the Act of George the Second (18 G. 2, c. 34), which enables a party to have relief as well as recovery in equity.

The statement of the Defendant's keeping a gaming-house is merely descriptive, and forms no part of the equity relied upon as the foundation for the relief claimed by the Plaintiff. The principal part of the matter which is unanswered has no relation whatever to that fact. The Defendant is bound to set forth the consideration given for the bills, &c.

Lastly, the objection to answer is not properly taken. The Defendant does not state that the discovery will render him liable to any penalty.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Toller, contra. The keeping of a gaming-house is an offence at common law, for which the Defendant might be indicted, The King v. Rogier (1 Bar. & C. 272). The answer of the Defendant to these interrogatories, would all tend to lead a jury to the conclusion that the Defendant was guilty of that [92] offence. Where an answer would render, or tend to render a party liable upon a criminal matter, he is not bound to answer the facts, or any link in the chain of proof; Padon v. Douglas (16 Ves. 239, and 19 Ves. 225), Maccallum v. Turton (3 Y. & Jer. 183), Southall v. — (Younge, 308), Glynn v. Houston (1 Keen, 329), The Earl of Suffolk v. Green (1 Atk. 450).

This is not a proceeding under the Statute of Ann, brought within the three months, and that statute does not relieve the Defendant from the penalties attached to the common law offence for keeping a gaming-house.

If any of the interrogatories, taken alone, might be safely answered; yet in this case they are so connected with the imputed offence, that it would be impossible to answer them with safety. They exhaust all lawful consideration for the bill, and leave, by inference, that connected with the gaming-house. It was the duty of the Plaintiff so to have framed his pleadings as to keep the two separate.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Having regard to the particular relief sought, and disregarding some of the objectionable allegations contained in the bill, it appears to me that several of the questions comprised in the interrogating part are such as the Defendant might lawfully be required to answer, but that is not the question here. The question to be determined is, whether, upon this bill, framed as it is, [93] and containing the allegations which it does contain, the Defendant is bound to answer all or any of these questions.

I cannot conjecture what reason induced the Plaintiff to insert some of the allegations contained in this record. The fact that the Defendant kept a gambling-house at No. 54 St. James's Street, is certainly not the foundation for the relief prayed, yet the first thing positively stated in the bill is, that this Defendant for some time previously to, and on the 26th of July 1841, kept a gambling-house for playing at illegal games, at No. 54 St. James's Street. This is not a mere description of the Defendant's house, or of where he is to be found, but a distinct and positive allegation, that at the time stated the Defendant kept a gambling-house for playing at illegal games. This undoubtedly is an indictable offence, and is one most pernicious to society. There is scarcely any offence which leads to greater mischief, yet by this bill the Defendant is charged with having committed it. The next allegation in the bill is, that the Plaintiff lost £800 by playing and gambling at such illegal games at the said gambling-house, and these bills of exchange are then connected with the illegal transactions which took place at this house. The bill goes on to charge a great variety of circumstances relating to the bills, which are calculated to obtain from the Defendant the discovery, either that this was a gambling-house kept by the Defendant, or to exhaust all other means by which the Defendant might have obtained the bills, and all other valid considerations for them, and so leave the necessary inference (everything else being excluded), that this was a gambling transaction, and as the Plaintiff says, committed at this house.

[94] It is perfectly true, as has been argued that this, in reality, is not the foundation for the relief. It is impossible to conjecture why it was inserted; but there is the statement standing upon this record in connection with a great variety of others, and a discovery required of these matters which more or less directly tend to shew that this was a gambling transaction committed in this very gambling-house. Now I cannot help thinking, that in a case of this sort there may be just and legitimate grounds for seeking relief and discovery and yet there are circumstances in respect of which discovery ought not to be sought, and which the Defendant is not bound to give.

It is the duty of the Plaintiff in framing his record, and in asking for discovery, to separate the matters to which he is entitled to an answer, from those which he cannot legally call upon the Defendant to discover. My attention has not specifically been called to all the interrogatories, and pending an argument, it is impossible to read them through with that attention which a case of this kind requires; but my impression is, that the subjects in respect of which discovery might have been legitimately asked for, and which the Defendant was bound to give, are more or less mixed up with interrogatories and questions, which the Defendant is not bound to answer.

if answered, they might lead to discovery tending to subject him to prosecution or penalties. I think that this ought not to have been done. If upon looking at the interrogatories, and the statements on which they are founded, I find interrogatories quite distinct and independent from the criminal matter, it may be right to call upon the Defendant to answer them; but if they are not distinct and independent, which I think is the case with regard to those to which my attention has been particularly called, but are mixed up with other matters, or so connected with them, either by way of inference, or by way of exclusion, that they might lead to a disclosure of circumstances which would subject this Defendant to be prosecuted for the offence in which he is charged, then I think the doctrine of this Court would induce me to say that these exceptions to the Master's report must be overruled.

I will look over the bill. If I find any interrogatories distinct and unconnected with the criminal matter, I will mention it to-morrow; if not, the exceptions to the Master's report will be overruled.

March 16. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have read over the bill in this case, and I find that the charge of the offence is more intimately connected with all the discovery sought, than I collected during the argument. The exceptions must therefore, be overruled. (See Lee v. Read, 5 Beavan, 381, and The Attorney-General v. Lucas, 2 Hare, 566.)

[96] COTTON v. COTTON. Dec. 22, 1842.

In the instance of the mortgagee of the reversion, the Court declined making a stop order on deeds brought into the Master's office under a decree.

This was a petition for the common stop order on funds in Court, and that the same might not be delivered out of the Master's office without notice to the petitioner.

Under a will, A. M. Cotton was entitled to the rents of a property durante viduitate, under the decree in this cause requiring the production of all deeds, &c., before the Master, the deeds in question had been produced under a warrant of the Master. The Petitioner was a mortgagee of the reversion of the fund and of the estate, the only question was, as to his right to a stop order on the deeds.

Mr. Stratton argued, that as the deeds had been brought into Court "for the settling of all perils, and the indifferent custody of them," Dixies v. Hillary (Cary, 26), the encumbrancer on the reversion was entitled to have them secured for his benefit, at least to an order that they should not be parted with without notice to him.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that the deeds had been brought into Court under the decree, and merely for the purposes of the suit. That would produce great complication to make such an order, and that as there seemed no authority for it, he must decline making one.

[97] CALVERT v. GODFREY. Dec. 23, 1842; Jan. 12, 13, 14, March 13, 1843.

C. 12 L. J. Ch. 305. See Lachlan v. Reynolds, 1853, Kay, 56; In re Howarth, 1873, L. R. 8 Ch. 417, n.; In re De Teissier's Settled Estates [1893], 1 Ch. 163.]

Court has no authority to sell the real estate of an infant, or to convert it, upon the notion that it would be beneficial.

When property is sold under a decree, and there is jurisdiction to sell, mere irregularities and errors in the proceedings will not invalidate the sale, or prevent a good title from being made under the decree.

A purchaser under a decree, to whom a good title could not be made, discharged from the purchase, with his costs, charges, and expences, including the costs of his petition to be discharged.

A person who had freehold, copyhold, and personal estate, died in September 1832, leaving an infant heir. His estate was insufficient to pay his debts and charges.

His partners, however, by deed, took upon themselves to pay all the debts, and secured the principal part of his property for his family. A suit was instituted for carrying the deed into execution, and the Master found that it would be for the benefit of the infant heir, that the real estate should be sold and applied in the manner mentioned in the deed. A decree was made for sale, and the infant was declared a trustee within the 1 W. 4, c. 60. Held, that a sale under the decree could not be enforced; that the Court had no jurisdiction to order the sale; that the infant was not a trustee within the Act; that the purchaser was not bound to wait till the error was corrected, and the Court therefore discharged him with his costs, charges, and expenses.

In this case, Miss Watson, the purchaser of a copyhold estate under the decree of the Court, by petition, prayed to be discharged from her purchase, on the ground that there was no jurisdiction to order the estate to be sold, and of certain alleged defects of title.

The estate belonged to Mr. Charles Calvert, who died intestate in the month of September 1832. At the time of his death, he was a trader subject to the bankruptcy laws, and was entitled to certain freehold and copyhold estates, and to a large personal estate.

He was also largely indebted, and was liable to the performance of covenants, the performance of which might, after his death, have been enforced as against his copyhold estates.

For the purpose of this application, and under the circumstances, the Court thought that it ought to assume that the intestate's freehold, copyhold, and personal estates were, in the aggregate, insufficient for the [98] payment of all his debts and liabilities, and consequently, that if the estate had been administered under the strict rules of law and equity, the whole would have been sold and disposed of, the debts and liabilities would have been but in part satisfied, and nothing would have been left for the intestate's heirs and next of kin, and that this would have been the result of a regular proceeding to sell and marshal the assets for payment as far as they would extend, of all the debts and liabilities.

In this state of things, and soon after the intestate's death his surviving partners proposed an arrangement for the full payment of all his debts, and for securing a provision for his family, and for the purpose of carrying this arrangement into effect a deed, dated the 15th day of May 1833, was executed.

By this deed, after reciting that the whole real and personal estate would fall very short of answering the debts and liabilities, it was further recited, that the surviving partners, out of regard to the memory of the intestate, and the interest of his family, proposed, that such measures should be taken, that the whole of the real and personal property (exclusive of his share in the partnership effects and property, and exclusive of a life-estate which belonged to his widow), should be secured and applied for the benefit of his family, and that the whole of his debts should be paid in full out of the capital and property of the partnership, or by the surviving partners; and after further reciting, that the freehold estates were liable to the payment of the simple contract, as well as the specialty debts, and that by marshalling the assets, the copyhold estates might be applied towards satisfaction of an annuity of £1700, which the intestate had covenanted to pay to his widow; and that such provision as therein mentioned was made for payment of all [99] the debts, it was agreed, that the freehold, copyhold, and personal estate of the intestate (with such exception as therein mentioned), so far as by law might be done, should be sold under the direction of a Court of Equity, and that the money to arise from the sale should be invested in the purchase of stock, and the dividends applied towards payment of the annuity, according to the intestate's covenant; and that after the widow's death, the capital should be divided equally among the children. The surviving partners were to apply the amount of the intestate's interest in the partnership assets, as far as it would extend, in satisfaction of all his debts, and they engaged, personally, to pay all the debts which could not be so satisfied; and they further engaged, personally, to satisfy so much of the widow's annuity as the other means contemplated by the deed were insufficient to pay, and that, whether the states could be sold or not; and they also, by way of free gift, made a further revision of £12,000 for the children; and it was arranged, that a suit in equity should be instituted for the purpose of carrying the arrangement into effect.

A bill was accordingly filed, on the 7th of June 1833, by the widow and two of the children of the intestate, alleging that it would be beneficial to the children and all persons interested in the estate that the arrangement should be carried into effect. It was prayed, that an account might be taken of the intestate's personal estate: that a proper fund might be set apart to answer the annuity of £1700 due to the widow: that, if necessary, the real estate might be sold, for the purpose of raising such fund: that the debts of the intestate might be paid out of the personal estate, as far as was consistent with the deed of arrangement, in a due course of administration: that it might be ascertained, whether it was for the benefit of the children that the deed should [100] be carried into effect, and in that case, that the surviving partners of the intestate might be ordered specifically to perform the stipulations in the deed: that it might be declared, that the freehold and copyhold estates of the intestate were, under the settlement made on his marriage, charged with and subject to the payment of the annuity of £1700, thereby provided for his widow or her jointure: that it might be inquired of what freehold and copyhold estate the intestate died seised or entitled, and to which of his children the same had descended: that proper directions might be given for the sale of the freehold and copyhold estates of the intestate, or such part thereof as the Court should direct, and for the payment of his debts, and the marshalling and application of his assets and real and personal estates, for the benefit of his creditors and the other parties interested therein, and for other and consequential relief.

By the decree, dated the 24th of July 1833, it was ordered that an account should be taken of the intestate's personal estate, debts, and legacies; and that the Master should inquire, whether the surviving partners had paid any of the intestate's debts; and if they had, it was declared that they were entitled to stand in the place of the creditors whose debts they had paid, without prejudice to the deed of arrangement, and as to the partnership debts, not to a greater extent than the intestate's estate, as between them and the intestate, was liable. And the Master was to inquire of what freehold, copyhold, and leasehold estates the intestate was seised, possessed of, or entitled at the time of his death, and which were subject to any encumbrances, and who had received the rents. And it was declared, that the jointure or rent charge of £1700 to the widow, was a good charge on the freehold, copyhold, and per-[101]sonal estates of the intestate. The freehold estate was ordered to be sold, and the Master was to inquire, whether it would be for the benefit of the children, that the indenture of arrangement should be carried into effect, supposing the copyhold estate to be sold under the deed, or supposing that the same should not be so sold, whether it would be more for their benefit that the copyhold estate should or should not be sold, pursuant to that arrangement.

On the 20th of February 1839 the Master made his report upon the several matters referred to him; and, amongst other things, he stated his opinion to be, that it would be for the benefit of the children of the intestate that the deed of arrangement should be carried into effect, whether the copyhold estates should be sold under the arrangement or not, but that it would be more for their benefit, that the copyholds should be sold pursuant to the arrangement, than that the same should not be sold; and it appeared that no creditors remained unsatisfied, the debts having been paid by the widow or the surviving partners acting for her.

By the decree on further directions, dated the 28th of March 1839, it was declared, that it would be for the benefit of the infants that the deed of arrangement should be carried into effect; and after directing the freeholds to be sold pursuant to the former decree, it was declared, that it would be for the benefit of the infant that the copyholds should be sold, with the approbation of the Master, to the best purchaser, and that all proper parties should join in the sale, and that the money arising from the sale should be paid into the bank to the credit of the cause; and it was declared, that after the sale and payment of the purchase-money arising from the copyholds into Court, the infant De-[102]-fendant, Charles Calvert, as the customary heir of the intestate's copyholds, held of the Manors of Isleworth Syon Isleworth Rectory and Twickenham, would be a trustee for the purchaser under the Act 1 W. 4, c. 60; and he was ordered to execute such surrender and assurance as should be proper and approved by the Master.

Under this order, and another order dated the 11th of June 1841, a manor house and lands at Whitton, being part of the intestate's estates, and partly freehold and partly copyhold of three several manors, was put up to sale, and was purchased by the Petitioner for £9450. She was let into possession, but being nevertheless allowed to object to the title, she stated several objections by her petition, and prayed to be discharged from the contract.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Selwyn, in support of the petition. Where a person purchases property under a decree of the Court, and it can be shewn that there is a material error in the decree, he will not be held to his purchase, but the Court will discharge him, Lechmere v. Brasier (2 Jac. & W. 287). The same authority shews that the purchaser is not bound to wait until the error has been corrected.

In the present case, the Court had no authority to sell the estate of the infant. The sale was not directed at the instance of the creditors, but for the purpose of carrying out an arrangement which it was conceived would be beneficial to the family. But an infant's inheritance is never bound by any discretionary act of the Court, Taylor v. Philips (2 Ves. sen, 23). In Simson v. Jones (2 Russ. & M. 3 [103]) it was held that the settlement by the Court, of an infant's leasehold was binding. Sir John Leach said, "This Court has no authority to give an infant a power of alienation even for her own benefit." (And see Russel v. Russel, 1 Molloy, 525.)

Though the intestate was a trader, still his copyhold estates were not renderable to his debts, either by the 47 G. 3, c. 74, or by the 1 W. 4, c. 47, which subjected to debts, the real estate of a trader, "which would be assets for the payment of his specialty debts," which copyholds were not. The Act of the 3 & 4 W. 4, c. 104, does not apply, as it passed subsequently, and the only way of reaching copyholds would be by marshalling the assets, as it appears that the annuity of the wife was a charge on the copyholds. The decree is erroneous in not declaring the intestate to be a trader within the Acts, in not directing the proper accounts, and in declaring the infant a trustee within the 1 W. 4, c. 60, which he evidently was not: besides this, the Court proceeded on the notion that the eldest son was the customary heir, whereas, as to some part of the property, the youngest filed his claim.

They also contended that the mode of taking the accounts before the Master appeared to be erroneous.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Sidebottom, contra. No fraud or collusion is suggested in this case; and, therefore, the very important question is, what are the rules of the Court in cases of purchases under its decrees, and how far has a purchaser the right to enter into the correctness of the proceedings, and object to the orders and decrees.

[104] The rule is this, that a purchaser is not bound by any irregularity in the proceedings, provided the proper parties are before the Court. All he has to do is that the decree is made in the presence of all proper parties, and then, whether they be infants or adults, they are all bound by the decree of the Court. Lloyd v. Jones (9 Ves. 37), Curtis v. Price (12 Ves. 89), and Bennett v. Hamill (2 Sch. & Lef. 100), in which Lord Redesdale says (page 576), "The principal question in this case is one of considerable importance, whether a sale, under a decree of a Court of Equity is to be impeached on the grounds on which this is sought to be impeached. Of all it is stated, that this is a case in which the heir of the debtor, as not being of age, ought to have had a day to shew cause against the decree, and for that reason, that the decree necessarily required his joining in the conveyance of the estate. I incline to think that that was so, that the decree in that respect was erroneous, and that there ought to have been a day to shew cause. And the objection is, that there was no sufficient account of the personal estate, and that the proceedings before the Master were a fraudulent contrivance between the Master and Johnson." Lord Redesdale, after saying that the latter was a trustee, which would require investigation, proceeded:—"But as to Hart's representation and Hamill, the question is, whether they are persons who can be affected, supposing the circumstances to be clearly true as stated, namely, that there was error in the judgment of the Court in not giving a day to shew cause, and error also in directing sale under the circumstances. Now, on that subject I must confess, after considering this a good deal, I think it would be too much to say, that a [105] purchaser under a decree of that description can be bound to look into all these circumstances; if he is, he must go through all the proceedings from the beginning to the end, and save the opinion of the Court that the decree is right in all its parts, and that it would be impossible to alter it in any respect. The cases warrant no such opinion. On the contrary, as far as I can find, the general impression they give is, that a purchaser has a right to presume that the Court has taken the steps necessary to investigate the rights of the parties, and that it has, on that investigation, properly decreed a sale; then he is to see that this is a decree binding the parties claiming the estate, that is, to see that all proper parties to be bound are before the Court; and he has further to see, that taking the conveyance, he takes a title that cannot be impeached aliunde."

It would be absurd after the Court has pronounced its decision, to allow a mere purchaser to reargue the case by way of appeal.

In this case it is not necessary to decide on the abstract power of the Court over the real estates of infants, for if the rights of the parties had been worked out, the estate would have appeared insolvent, and a sale would be inevitable. The intestate covenanted to secure the £1700 a year out of his real and personal estate, the covenant constituted a lien on his copyholds, and the other creditors would have been entitled to have the assets marshalled.

The Court, in various instances, has bound the rights of infants in respect of their real estate. In Wall v. Bushby (1 Bro. C. C. 484) it was held, that an infant was bound by a [106] decree taken by consent, though there was no reference to the father; and in cases of election the Court will elect for an infant, and sell the real estate for that purpose.

If an error exists it can be removed within a reasonable time, and an opportunity ought to be given for that purpose.

They also cited Lutwyche v. Winford (2 Bro. C. C. 248), Lightburne v. Swift (2 Ball. & B. 207).

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Willcock, in the same interest, cited Mallack v. Galton (3 P. Wms. 352).

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

March 13. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. There are three objections to the decree or order on further directions. First, that the sale of the copyholds is directed merely because it was deemed to be beneficial to the infant, and that the Court has no authority to do. Secondly, that this is a case not within the statute of 1 W. 4, c. 60, and, consequently, that the decree is erroneous in declaring the infant Charles Calvert to be a trustee within the true intent of that Act. Thirdly, that in fact Charles Calvert was not customary heir of so much of the land as was sold of the manor of Isleworth Rectory and Twickenham.

The first objection depends upon the jurisdiction of the Court. The Court may order real estates vested in [107] infants to be sold to satisfy the demands of creditors, or to give to cestuis que trust the benefit to which they are entitled, but it has no authority to convert the real estate of infants into personalty, or to sell the real estate vested in an infant upon the notion that the conversion or sale would be beneficial to the infant himself, or to himself and others.

In this case it appears to me, that creditors, unfettered by any contrary obligation of their own, might have been aided by the authority of this Court in the sale of this estate, and that in a proceeding adapted to the purpose, a good title might have been made under a decree.

But the widow and the surviving partners are the only persons having legal claims upon the estate, and they have entered into the deed of arrangement, according to the provisions of which, all the creditors were to be paid, and the annuity of the widow was to be fully satisfied, whether the copyholds were to be sold or not.

From the authorities which were referred to in the argument, it is apparent, that if there be jurisdiction to sell, mere irregularities and errors in the proceedings will not invalidate the sale or prevent a good title from being made under the decree; and in this case I have not thought it necessary to consider several alleged errors in the mode of taking the accounts, and calculating the claims on the estate. Such errors, even if proved, would not have availed the Petitioner.

But if there was no person who had a right to call upon the Court to sell the estate for the satisfaction of a claim, then it is clear, that in substance as well as in words and form, the sale was ordered only on the ground [108] of its being beneficial to the infant to sell, and I think that this is not within the jurisdiction of the Court.

Now, by the deed of arrangement, the surviving partners were to apply the amount of the intestate's interest in the partnership assets, as far as it would extend, in satisfaction of all his debts, and they engaged, personally, to pay all the debts which could not be so satisfied, and they further engaged personally to satisfy as much of the widow's annuity as the other means contemplated by the deed was insufficient to pay, and in this manner, they provided that neither the creditors (by marshalling), nor the widow, under the covenant, should resort to the real estate intended to be saved for the children, and if this were all, there could be no question but that the sale was asked for and ordered only for the benefit of the children.

But then it was part of the argument, that in order to affect the copyhold premises, and to obtain a sale thereof, or the application in manner aforesaid of the rents, and for all the purposes consistent with the arrangement, and more especially as far as might be necessary to effectuate such arrangement, the debts which should be paid by the surviving partners were to be considered, not as discharged, but as kept on foot for their benefit subject to the arrangement, and that they should stand in the place of the creditors whose debts they had paid, or in place of the widow who, as administratrix, had paid the same, and also in the place of the widow in respect of monies paid to her on account of her annuity under her marriage settlement.

The object of this part of the agreement was not to enforce a legal or equitable right for the payment of the [109] debt, but, if practicable, to take advantage of the right (which without the agreement would have existed), merely for the purpose of effecting the arrangement, for the benefit of the children which the agreement was intended to secure to them, and even under this clause, the only foundation for an order to sell was, that the sale would be beneficial to the infant.

I do not think that this is a case of election, in which the Court having the duty of electing for the infant, can, as the result of the election, direct the real estate to be sold. It was I think justly argued, that if an infant entitled by descent to real estate could have a case of election raised by a proposal to do something for his benefit, no case could arise in which means might not be found to give the Court jurisdiction to sell the estate of an infant.

And on the whole, after a consideration of the deed of arrangement, of the facts and scope of the pleadings, of the decree and of the report, I think, that the order for the sale of the copyholds was founded solely upon the Master's finding, in conformity with the plain intention of the parties and the real facts of the case, that it would be beneficial to the children that the sale should be made; and looking at the whole arrangement, I think there can be no doubt that the sale would be beneficial to the customary heirs individually. But it appearing that the Court has not jurisdiction to sell the real estates of infants, on the ground that the sale is beneficial to them, I think that the order ought not to have been made, and that a sale under it cannot be enforced.

This being my opinion, it is the less material to consider the other objections, but I think I ought to state, that it does not appear to me that the case comes within [110] the provisions of the statute 1 W. 4, c. 60, and if it did, I think that the purchaser could not have been compelled to wait till an error so material as the declaration of a wrong person being trustee for the purchaser was corrected.

On the whole, therefore, and without entering into the particular objections as to the title, I think that the Petitioner is entitled to be discharged from her purchase, and to have the stock arising from the investment of the purchase-money paid into Court transferred to her.

And it must be referred to the Taxing Master to tax her costs, charges, and expenses incurred in respect of the purchase, including the costs of this petition, the money retained by the auctioneer must be repaid to her, and she must give up possession and account for any rent she has received.

[S. C. 4 Beav. 379; 49 E. R. 385; 10 L. J. Ch. 395; on appeal, 13 L. J. Ch. 260; 8 Jur. 387.]

... became surety for B. to C. for a sum "for value received by a draft at three months' date." C. (without the concurrence of A.), at once paid the amount to B., instead of giving the draft at three months. Held, that the agreement had been varied, and that the surety was therefore discharged.

This case is reported (4 Beavan, 379), and the Lord Chancellor having referred the matter back to the Master, it now came on upon exceptions to his second report.

Mr. Anderdon, for Messrs. Morrell.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Dixon, for the Plaintiff.

[111] Mr. Shebbeare, for the executors.

March 13. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Davies and Richard Cox were partners in the iron trade, Richard Cox and the Morrells were partners as bankers.

In October 1831 four bills of exchange for £500 each, drawn by Davies on Richard Cox, and accepted by him, payable in three months, were nearly due, and another bill of exchange for £750, on which Davies and Richard Cox were liable, was also nearly due.

John Cox, in order to enable Richard Cox to obtain from Cox and Morrells money herewith to meet two of the £500 bills, and to enable Davies and Richard Cox to provide for the £750 bill, joined Richard Cox in signing two promissory notes, one for £999 and the other for £750, to Cox and Morrells, and each of these notes was expressed to be given "for value received by a draft at three months' date."

When this case was first before me (4 Beavan, 379), it was admitted, First, that John Cox was a mere surety. Secondly, That the notes of John and Richard Cox were given for the purpose of enabling Richard Cox and Davies, respectively, to meet two of the £500 bills, and provide for the £750 bill. Thirdly, That the money was to be raised by discounting the drafts, which were intended to be the consideration of the promissory notes; and 4thly, That in point of fact the drafts were not given.

[112] Messrs. Morrell alleged, that although the drafts were not given, they advanced money to satisfy the bills which were outstanding against Davies and Richard Cox, and thus accomplished the purpose which was intended by the whole transaction, and gave to the principal debtor the benefit and accommodation which the surety intended to procure for him.

The executors of John Cox, on the other hand, insisted 1st, That it was not proved that Cox and Morrell had made any advance to pay the bills which were intended to be satisfied, and 2dly, That if it were proved that they had advanced money to pay those bills, the advance had not been made in such a way as to give to the principal creditor the three months' credit, which it appeared upon the face of the promissory note the surety had contracted for.

Messrs. Morrell did not contend that their alleged advance was made any other way than by direct payments on account of Davies and Richard Cox, to the full amount of both the sums for which John Cox had become surety. They said, that they had applied the money in paying the bills which John Cox intended to have satisfied. They did not allege that their payments were made subject to any deduction or discount, or were made on any special contract as to the repayment.

And on the other hand, the executors of John Cox did not allege that Messrs. Morrell had so paid the money as to get the bills which were intended to be satisfied into their own hands, with an immediate right of suing upon them.

In this state of circumstances, I overruled the exceptions, on the ground that the advance if made by the [113] Messrs. Morrell, was not made in a manner to give the principal debtor any credit whatever. The outstanding bills which the surety intended to have paid, were in fact paid and satisfied, and as Messrs. Morrell alleged, were paid and satisfied by them; but the money wherewith such payment was made instead of being raised by the discount of a draft which had three months to run and in respect of which the principal debtor could not have been sued till the time had expired, was immediately advanced, by a direct payment, to the full amount of the account of Davies and Cox, in such a way as to give Cox and Morrell an immediate right to charge Davies and Cox in account with the full amount of the advance, and this being contrary to the apparent intention of the surety, he appeared to me to be released from his liability. The only question upon the facts stated by Messrs. Morrell was whether a surety, who makes himself liable for a loan to the principal debtor to be made in such a way as to secure to the principal debtor the months' credit, is to be held liable, when the loan is so made as not to give that credit.

The case went before the late Lord Chancellor, but unfortunately was so pressed upon him as not to obtain a decision upon that which was then the only question.

His Lordship was led to suppose, that it had been alleged here, that an equivalent for the drafts mentioned in the promissory notes had been given, by an advance deducting discount, that nothing had been omitted but the mere ceremony of giving the drafts and discounting them, Messrs. Morrell having in fact advanced the money less the discount, in such a way as to give to all parties the precise benefit for which they stipulated, and to preclude themselves from making any immediate [114] demand till the time of the intended credit had expired; and upon that supposition, His Lordship expressed his dissent to an opinion which he understood to have been stated here, though in fact no such opinion had been expressed, and though the facts upon which such opinion was supposed to have been formed, had never been stated or alleged.

On the other hand, his Lordship was led to suppose that it had been contended by the executors of John Cox, that the money advanced by Messrs. Morrell was advanced for the purpose of getting possession of the bills and obtaining an immediate right to sue upon them.

So that before his Lordship it appeared to be a question of fact; 1st, Whether Messrs. Morrell had advanced a sum of money deducting discount in such a way as to preclude themselves from the right of demanding or suing till the time of credit had expired; or, 2dly, Whether they had so advanced the money as thereby to obtain possession of the bills intended to be satisfied, with an immediate right to sue upon them.

I do not think it necessary to make any remark upon the singular notion that the money was anywhere considered to be immaterial what answers were given to these questions. With the impression made upon the mind of the Lord Chancellor, it was necessary to refer the exceptions back to the Master.

And at present, when the Master has made his further report and exceptions have again been taken, we are substantially in the same situation as before.

The executors of John Cox did not before, and do not now contend, that Messrs. Morrell so advanced the [115] money as to obtain an immediate right of suing upon the bills which were intended to be satisfied.

And Messrs. Morrell did not before, and do not now contend, that the money was advanced less the discount, or after deducting the discount, or on any special agreement or arrangement.

But they contend, as before, though on an altered state of facts, that they advanced the full money in satisfaction of the bills intended to be satisfied, and argue that in doing so, they did not release the surety.

And the executors of John Cox contend, as before, 1st, That there is no proof that the money was advanced in satisfaction of the bills; and, 2dly, That if the money was advanced in the manner alleged by Messrs. Morrell, it was not so advanced as to secure the principal debtor the credit which the surety intended for him, and that the surety is therefore released.

The Master has by his report, dated the 28th of June 1842, allowed the sum of £750 and interest as a debt due from the estate of John Cox to James and Edward Morrell, and has disallowed the claim of Messrs. Morrell to the sum of £999.

The Messrs. Morrell have taken exceptions to the Master's disallowance of their claim of £999, and the Plaintiffs have excepted to the Master's allowance of the debt of £750.

This case comes on upon exceptions to the Master's report. One exception taken by Messrs. Morrell on the ground that the Master has disallowed the claim made by them against the estate of John Cox deceased to the [116] amount of £999, and another exception taken by the Plaintiffs, on the ground that the Master has allowed claim made by Messrs. Morrell against the estate of John Cox to the amount of £750.

With respect to the exception of the Messrs. Morrell, it appears, that they agreed to advance the sum of £999 or £1000 on having a joint and several promissory note of John and Richard Cox deposited with them as a security, that in this transaction, John Cox was a mere surety for Richard Cox or for Davies and Cox, and that the advance was not to be made by a direct payment in money, but was to be obtained by the discount of a bill which had three months to run, and that this being the agreement upon which John Cox assumed his liability and became surety, the arrangement was varied without his authority, and the advance was made directly, and in such a way as to create no credit at all as between the bank and Davies and Cox. It was so made, as not to give to Richard Cox or to Davies and Cox any free and sure credit for any time whatever. Three months had been stipulated for, and the advance was so made as to create a debt of which payment might have been immediately demanded. This matter is stated in the affidavits of Mr. Robert Morrell, sworn on the 14th of November 1838, of James Robert Morrell, sworn on the 6th, and of Robert, sworn on the 8th of December 1841. It is not alleged that John Cox was a party to the arrangement said to be afterwards made; and I think that his position and his interest was or might be materially affected by it. A man may have reason to believe, that a person in pecuniary difficulty may effectually redeem his name if allowed time, and may be willing, on the assurance of the required time being allowed, to become surety for the payment of a particular debt at the end of that time, and yet would not become surety, unless such time were fully assured to the principal debtor. These are circumstances, which a person advancing money on the security and claiming the benefit of the suretyship does not appear to be to have any right to alter. It is not enough that he voluntarily forbears to demand payment during the time for which the surety had stipulated; the surety did not intend to rely on his forbearance, but rested on an agreement or condition that the principal debtor should have the time assured to him, and should thereby have assured and not a precarious freedom during that time. His conduct for his own protection might be materially affected by the difference, and if that stipulated time was not given, and no agreement of the surety to waive it is shewn, it appears to me that the situation of the surety is improperly altered and that he is released. Bacon v. Chesney (1 Stark. 192).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS next examined the evidence as to the £750, from which he concluded that John Cox was a surety for Richard Cox and proceeded:—It is clear that Richard Cox did not receive a draft at three months, which was intended for John Cox. The money was so taken, as, upon the acquiescence of the Messrs. Morrell, an immediate and direct advance of the whole sum, and therefore in this case, as well as in the case of the note for £999, I think that John Cox the surety was released.

The question is of considerable importance, and I think it very much to be regretted, that the parties did not avail themselves of the opportunity which they had, of obtaining the opinion of the late Lord Chancellor upon the subject. I should have been anxious to be guided by his judgment. They pursued a course, which has brought the subject back to me without that assist-[118]-ance, and seeing no sufficient reason to alter the opinion I before expressed, I must adhere to it.

The exception of Messrs. Morrell is overruled and the exception of the Plaintiffs is allowed.

NOTE.—The case afterwards came before the Lord Chancellor upon appeal, who affirmed the decision on the 9th of March 1844.

[118] EVANS v. WILLIAMS. May 2, June 7, 14, 1842.

The Plaintiff filed a traversing order. The Defendant afterwards made default in appearing at the hearing. Held, first, that the Plaintiff was not entitled to take as of course, such decree as he could abide by, but must go through his case and take such decree as to the Court might appear just; and secondly, that service of the traversing order must be proved by affidavit.

The Plaintiff obtained an order to file the traversing note (4 Beav. 485) under the 21st General Order of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 170.)

The cause came on for hearing, when the Defendant made default in appearing, and the Plaintiff, on the 2d of May, took such decree as he could abide by, which, under the 44th General Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 177), is absolute in the first instance.

Some doubt having, however, been raised as to the regularity of this decree, the cause was mentioned again on the 7th of June, when the first question was, whether it was necessary to prove the service of a copy of the traversing order, and, secondly, whether under the General Orders, the Plaintiff was entitled, upon the Defendant making default in appearing, to take such decree as he could abide by, or whether it was necessary [119] to go through the case, in order that the Court might make such order as might be just, as in the case of a bill taken pro confesso. (See Gentry v. Sheridan, 8 Ves. 191. Molesworth v. Lord Verney, 2 Dick. 667. London v. Reed, 1 Sim. & St. 44. Collins v. Collyer, 3 Beav. 600.)

Mr. W. M. James argued that it was not usual to produce an affidavit, at the hearing of a cause, as to any proceedings which had been taken therein. That the Court, where it was necessary, had always depended on the certificate of the St. Clerk that all the previous proceedings were regular; and, further, that the evidence alone taken in the cause and no affidavit, could properly be inserted in the decree.

He submitted, secondly, that as the traversing order had the same effect, "as if the Defendant had filed an answer traversing the whole of the bill, and the Plaintiff had filed a replication to such answer, and served a subpoena to rejoin," the Plaintiff was entitled, as in other cases, where the Defendant made default, to such decree as he could abide by.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. This is quite a new proceeding, and the cause had therefore better be put in the paper on Tuesday next.

June 14. The cause was again mentioned, when

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held, that it was necessary to prove by affidavit, the service of a copy of the traversing note, and that the Plaintiff was not entitled [120] to take such decree as he could abide by, but must open and prove his case.

Mr. W. M. James then went through the Plaintiff's case, and the Court made such decree as it thought just.

[120] JEWIN v. TAYLOR. July 7, 1842.

A bill containing offensive statements ordered, by consent, to be taken off the file.

Mr. Bacon moved to take a bill off the file with the consent of all parties. He stated that this was a family suit; that the bill contained offensive statements and allegations; and that the parties having compromised were all desirous that the bill should be removed from the records of the Court. He cited Tremaine v. Tremaine (1 Vern. 189), in which "the cause was between father and son, and there having been great heat and indecent reflections on both sides in bill and answer, and the matter being ended by compromise, upon motion made in Court by Mr. Porter, the bill and answer were taken off the file, by consent."

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] made the order.

[121] CARTWRIGHT v. SMITH. Jan. 11, 1843.

The Plaintiff submitted to a demurrer by omitting to set it down within twelve days, and the V.C. ordered him to pay the costs of suit. The Plaintiff afterwards obtained at the Rolls an order of course to amend, suppressing in his petition the order of the Vice-Chancellor. It was discharged for irregularity on the ground of the suppression.

On the 6th of August 1842 one of the Defendants, Smith, filed a demurrer to the bill.

The Plaintiff did not set it down for argument within twelve days, in consequence of which, under the 34th Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 174), it was "held to be silent, and the Plaintiff was held to have submitted thereto."

On the 15th of November the Vice-Chancellor, to whose Court the suit was removed, made the usual order for the taxation of Smith's costs of the suit, and for payment thereof by the Plaintiff.

On the 25th of November the Plaintiff obtained, upon petition at the Rolls, an order of course to amend the bill as against all the Defendants.

This order was obtained on the simple allegation, as to the Defendant Smith, that he had appeared and filed a demurrer on the 6th of August. The petition wholly omitted any mention of the order of the Vice-Chancellor.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Piggott, for the Plaintiff, moved to discharge the order to amend. They cited Mackenzie v. Claridge (see 6 Beav. 123).

Mr. Torriano, contrâ. There is a distinction between a demurrer being allowed, and a demurrer being submitted to. Where a demurrer is submitted to, the Plaintiff is at liberty to amend his bill on payment of [122] costs.⁽¹⁾ The order of the Vice-Chancellor is erroneous, as it is only upon the "allowance of a demurrer," that the Plaintiff is entitled to his full costs under the 31st Order of April 1828. (Ord. 17.)

If the Plaintiff has acted wrong, it has been in consequence of a slip of the solicitor, and is not considered that the Long Vacation was not to be reckoned.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think that this order is irregular, as it was obtained, as of course, on an imperfect statement of facts, suppressing which was most material, viz., the order of the Vice-Chancellor.

The order was made here on the suggestion, that a demurrer had been filed, and not been set down, there being at the time an order of the Vice-Chancellor, which exists, directing the costs of the demurrer and suit to be paid by the Plaintiff. The fact was wholly suppressed.

I cannot say that the order of the Vice-Chancellor was irregular, I am bound to treat it as a valid order until it has been discharged.

As to the right of a Plaintiff to amend his bill and prosecute his suit against a Defendant, where it has been terminated by a slip in not setting down the demurrer, and by no means prepared to say that he may not be allowed to do so, upon setting opposite party right as to costs; but the real facts and circumstances of the [123] must be brought forward and stated to the Court, in order that it may be enabled to exercise its judgment on them.

This motion must be granted.

NOTE.—The rule is different in the case of a plea. If the plea be allowed or submitted to, the parties may nevertheless go into evidence to prove and disprove facts relied on by the plea. See Robert v. Jones, post, M.R. 21st December 1843. (May. 57, 266.)

[123] MACKENZIE v. CLARIDGE. July 7, 1842.

Where a Plaintiff neglects to set down a demurrer within the twelve days, the Defendant is entitled to his costs of suit and demurrer, and an order for them will be made ex parte.

In this case the Defendant filed a demurrer. The Plaintiff neglected to set it down within twelve days, and, therefore, under the 34th Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 174), it was deemed to have been submitted to.

Mr. Bacon moved, ex parte, that the Plaintiff should pay to the Defendant his costs of the demurrer, and also his further costs of this suit.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] made the order. (Reg. Lib. 1841, B. 1400.)

[124] KING v. WILSON. Feb. 20, 1843.

[See Manson v. Thacker, 1878, 7 Ch. D. 624; Green v. Sevin, 1879, 13 Ch. D. 599.]

A tenant in possession purchased the property, which was represented to be forty-six feet in depth; it turned out to be thirty-three only. Held, that he was entitled to an abatement.

Though time be not of the essence of a contract, it may be made so by notice, when there has been great and improper delay on one side in completing. It may however be waived by proceeding in the purchase after the expiration of the time fixed by the notice.

On the 20th of July 1841 the Defendant, who was the tenant and occupier of a certain freehold house and premises at Islington, agreed to purchase the same from the Plaintiff, and by the terms of the contract, the purchase was to be completed on the 23d of August 1841.

The particulars stated the property to be forty-six feet in depth, when, in fact, the depth was only thirty-three feet.

The abstract was delivered on the 31st of July, and was returned with requisitions and objections on the 10th of August. One of these required proof of the vendor's descent. To meet this, the certificate of the marriage of the vendor's parents was furnished, which shewed that they were married on the 21st of March 1794, and this was accompanied by the certificate of the vendor's baptism on the 1st of June 1794, but which stated that he was born on the 17th of April 1794. The draft of a solemn declaration under the Act (5 & 6 W. 4, c. 62), as to this matter, was also sent. The evidence was not satisfactory to the purchaser, who required either the next brother of the vendor to join in the conveyance, or the bond of indemnity of some responsible person.

On the 1st of September the vendor stated that he had no better evidence to offer, nor any corroborative proof, for both the medical man and nurse were dead. He declined the proposal of the purchaser and threatened to file a bill.

[125] Some further correspondence, which is not material, took place between the parties, and ultimately, on the 18th of September, the purchaser wrote to say, that if the objection as to the insufficiency of the proof of the descent was not removed within a week, he should consider himself no longer bound, and of this he thereby gave formal notice.

The vendor afterwards offered to give an indemnity, which proposal the purchaser entertained, but, on the 28th of September, objected to the person proposed, and insisted that he was no longer bound by the contract. On the 15th of November the vendor furnished the solemn declaration of a party present at the marriage, but the purchaser refused to renew the subject, and this bill for the specific performance was in consequence filed on the 27th of November 1841.

The cause now came on for hearing. The Plaintiff entered into no evidence in the cause as to his descent, and the Defendant insisted that the contract had been put an end to, and also that the abstract furnished did not go back far enough.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. S. P. White, for the Plaintiff, asked for a reference to the Master as to the title, and as the Defendant had raised an untenable defence that the contract had been rescinded, they argued that the Defendant should, at once, be ordered to pay the costs up to the hearing.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Dunn, contra, contended that as the Plaintiff had failed to comply with the reasonable requisition of the purchaser, within the time limited by the contract and by the notice, the contract had been put an end to.

[126] Secondly, that the conduct, default, and laches of the Plaintiff had been such as to disentitle him to any relief in this Court.

Thirdly, that if the purchase was to proceed, then, that there having been a great representation as to the quantity of the land sold, the purchaser was entitled to compensation for the deficiency in quantity.

Fourthly, that no special order ought to be made as to the costs up to the hearing, especially as the suit had originated from the default of the Plaintiff in furnishing satisfactory evidence as to his descent.

Mr. S. P. White, in reply. The Defendant is not entitled to any compensation for the erroneous description. He was tenant and in possession of the premises, and he knew what the property was which it was the intention of the Plaintiff to sell, which he intended to purchase.

Taylor v. Brown (2 Beav. 180), and Hyde v. Dallaway (4 Beav. 606), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The first question in this case is, whether the contract has been put an end to. Now, I am clearly of opinion that much time may not be of the essence of a contract, yet where there is great and proper delay on one side, the other party has a right to fix a reasonable time in which the contract is to be completed; that time will then be considered by the Court as having become of the essence of the contract; and in case the party in default in doing what is right and [127] proper on his part, within the time fixed, it will be a reason why this Court will not afterwards interfere in his favour to compel the execution of the contract.

The question is whether those circumstances occur in the present case. I cannot think that the conduct of the vendor in this case was not satisfactory with respect to the proof required of his legitimacy. The first certificate stated the date to have taken place in March, and the certificate of the baptism (which is evidence whatever of the birth), shews the baptism to have taken place in April following. It therefore seems to have been necessary to inquire very minutely into the circumstances, and when the birth really took place. The correspondence is not material, until we come to the 1st of September 1841. There was then a real objection, and the only mode proposed for removing it, was by tendering the declaration of the mother. I do not think it material that the declaration was sent without signature, and without having gone through the usual formalities, though it is a very good reason for returning it in order that it might be perfected. The parties did not agree upon the mode of removing the objection; the purchaser's agent on the 18th of September says, "If this objection is not removed within a week, I shall consider my client no longer bound, and of this I beg to give you notice." Now I must say, that under the circumstances, this was rather too strict a time, it was not reasonable to require everything to be done within a week. However that might be, I think that under the circumstances of this case, the contract was not put an end to; for we find these gentlemen (meaning, I daresay, the parties to the correspondence should be continued without any prejudice) afterwards proceeding in the matter, and considering whether a satisfactory indemnity could not be given; in which [128] event, it is not disputed, the contract might be completed with regard to the letter fixing the time within which it was to be done; so that there was something which might have been done, after the expiration of the time fixed, by means of which the contract would have been completed. It appears to me that under the circumstances that the contract is not put an end to.

The next consideration here is, whether the conduct of the Plaintiff has been such, that the Court in its discretion will refuse to grant a specific performance. Now really the whole question under discussion between the parties, and in issue in the cause, or nearly so (for although other objections have been spoken of, yet they have not been stated in a way to make me attach any weight to them), was as to the legitimacy of the Plaintiff. When the Plaintiff was called upon to prove it, I think it would have been better to have procured the necessary proof at once, but I do not think that the circumstance of not having done so is a reason why this bill should be dismissed, especially when the Defendant, by his answer, insists that the contract was put an end to, and not on the default in procuring the requisite evidence. Seeing that there is an existing contract, I think there is no reason why it should not be specifically performed.

The next question is as to the compensation, and I am of opinion that compensation ought to be given. The depth sold is forty-six feet, whereas the vendor had only thirty-three. It is said that no deception could have been practised, because the Defendant was in possession of the premises, and, being in possession, he must have known that it was a mistake, and that there were only thirty-three feet. Now I don't know that [129] persons in the occupation of premises are in the habit of measuring them; I think you would find very few persons who know the exact depth and frontage of their premises. The purchaser had it stated to him that the property was forty-six feet in depth, and it is a remarkable circumstance, that the particular having stated forty-six feet in depth, the abstract of title describes the premises as thirty-three feet. That was objected to immediately. It is said you have described it as forty-six feet when in point of fact there are only thirty-three. What was the answer made by the solicitor of the vendor? In substance it is this, recently there has been an admeasurement and by the admeasurement it appears that there are forty-six feet. Was the Defendant then to blame in not going to ascertain and measure it? I cannot say he was. The representation was in perfect conformity with the particulars, and I see no reason at all why he was to test the reiterated representation by an actual admeasurement. Further, I see no reason for thinking that the purchaser might not have formed his plans as to the property, with reference to the notion that there were forty-six feet in depth.

It has been urged, with great ingenuity, that the excess of representation being very great (thirteen out of forty-six), ought to have attracted the attention of the purchaser, but why did not the vendor, who ought to have known something about the matter, and who had caused a recent admeasurement to be made, communicate to the other side that it had been ascertained to be thirty-three, and not forty-six feet? I think on the whole that there is a right to compensation.

The other question is with respect to the costs of the cause up to the hearing; some things have occurred in [130] this case, from which I think that the Plaintiff is not entitled to those costs. There must be a reference to the Master as to the title, and to ascertain the amount of compensation, and the costs must be reserved.

[130] NEEDHAM v. SMITH. Dec. 22, 1842; Jan. 19, 20, 1843.

Where a guardian ad litem of a person of unsound mind, though not so found by inquisition dies, a special application is necessary to obtain the appointment of a new guardian, and an appointment by an order of course is irregular.

In 1839 the Defendant, John Needham, was of unsound mind, though he had not been found lunatic by inquisition, and the Court in that year appointed Mr. Hunt to be his guardian, to defend the suit. (1)

In August 1842, Hunt having died, an order was obtained, as of course, whereby, on the humble petition of John Needham, a person of unsound mind, Thomas Fainwright was assigned guardian of the Petitioner in the room of Hunt, deceased. His order was obtained, as of course, and without any evidence as to the present capacity of John Needham.

A motion was made to discharge the order, on the ground of the irregularity. Affidavits were filed as to the present mental competency of the Defendant.

Mr. Turner, in support of the motion.

[131] Mr. Koe and Mr. Terrell, contra.

Mr. Pemberton, for the Plaintiff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] was of opinion that it was regular to obtain the order as of course. He said, that where a party was found insane by inquisition, he was presumed to remain so during the existence of the commission; but where the lunacy had not been so found, and the Court took on itself to appoint a guardian ad litem, then the Court presumed that the same state of mind continued so long as the guardian retained the authority committed to him; then, however, that authority ceased, even by the death of the guardian, the resumption in favour of sanity revived. That as the present order ought not to have been obtained except upon a special application, it ought therefore to be discharged.

His Lordship also adverted to the evidence of present sanity, and said, that if it had been brought to the notice of the Court, the order complained of would not have been made.

[131] BASSFORD V. BLAKESLEY. Jan. 27, 1842.

[See Republic of Costa Rica v. Erlanger, 1874, L. R. 19 Eq. 45.]

Where deeds are impeached for fraud, the mere allegation of fraud by the bill will not entitle the Plaintiff to an order for their production; on the other hand, in order to obtain a production, it is not necessary that the fraud should be admitted by the answer, the Court must look at the circumstances of each case. An order made for the production of a deed impeached for fraud, though the fraud was denied by the answer, the case on the whole being such as to render an inspection proper.

This suit was instituted for the purpose of setting aside a series of conveyances early voluntary obtained by a nephew from his aged uncle.

[132] In 1837 the Plaintiff lost his only daughter, in consequence of which (as was alleged), he became overwhelmed with grief. The Plaintiff at this time was nearly seventy years of age, and possessed estates of considerable value; and, in April 1838, he conveyed one of those estates to the Defendant, his nephew, reserving thereout a life-estate only, and an annuity of £100 a year for any wife he might marry.

In June 1838 the Plaintiff conveyed a second estate to the Defendant, reserving thereout a life interest; and in June 1839 he granted to the Defendant a lease of the property during the Plaintiff's life at an inadequate rent.

In August 1840 the Plaintiff being on the point of marrying again, released to the Defendant the annuity of £100 a year; and, in December following, he also conveyed to the Defendant his life-estate. In these different transactions a small and mere colourable consideration was purported to be given; but, in the result, the Plaintiff completely denuded himself of the whole of his property, worth more than £14,000 in favour of the Defendant.

The Plaintiff alleged that these deeds had been obtained by fraud, deception, and undue influence, and that the Defendant had procured them by practising on the fears and weakness of the Plaintiff.

The Defendant by his answer, which was of considerable length, though he denied these allegations, stated that the Plaintiff had long entertained a great regard for the Defendant, who was his heir apparent, and had long determined to provide for him; but the conveyances had been made by his uncle of his own free will out of regard to the Defendant, and for some other [133] consideration, with the assistance of a separate solicitor on each several occasion. The case, however, made by the Defendant himself was one of great suspicion. The answer set out the conveyances at some length, and admitted them and the title-deeds to be in the Defendant's possession.

Mr. Moore, in support of the motion.

Mr. G. Turner, contrà, resisted the production of the conveyances, which were the Defendant's title-deeds. He argued that the mere allegation of fraud was not sufficient to entitle the Plaintiff to the production; that as the fraud had been denied by the answer, and as the deeds in question would not prove the Plaintiff's case, he was not entitled to see them. He cited Tyler v. Drayton (2 Sim. & St. 309), Kennedy v. Green (5 Sim. 6. And see Balch v. Symes, Turn. & Russ. 87. Neale v. Latimer, 2 You. & C. (Exch.) 257; 11 Bli. 112, and 4 Cl. & Fin. 570).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I perfectly agree, that where a Plaintiff alleges that deeds have been obtained by fraud, and the answer entirely denies the fraud and states the deeds, the Plaintiff is not, in that situation of things, entitled to an order for their production.

On the other hand, it is not necessary, in order to entitle the Plaintiff to the production of the deeds, that the Defendant should admit that there has been fraud.

The Court must look to the circumstances of each case, and looking to the circumstances under which these deeds have been obtained, I think it is quite reasonable that the deeds should be produced. Here [134] are conveyances from an old man under very extraordinary circumstances and almost without consideration. It is said these are the Defendant's title-deeds, but, according to his own statement, he has no title except what he derived by gift from the Plaintiff. I think that the Plaintiff should be at liberty to see what he has done, and that the Defendant should produce these deeds.

I agree with the rule stated by the Defendant's counsel, that a Plaintiff is not, upon a mere allegation of fraud, entitled to the production of deeds which have been impeached; but here is not only the allegation of fraud, but circumstances which shew me that the Plaintiff is fairly entitled to have the matter inquired into.

NOTE.—The cause afterwards came on for hearing on the 30th of April 1842, when upon concessions being offered by the Defendant, the case was compromised.

[134] TARBUCK v. TARBUCK. Dec. 16, 22, 1842.

A petition was presented in the names of A. and B., but without the authority of C. Held, that having regard to the rights of the Respondents, the petition could not be ordered to be taken off the file on the application of A.

Mr. Ward, a solicitor, presented a petition in the names of Hannah Tarbuck and Francis Tarbuck.

A motion was made on behalf of Hannah Tarbuck, that the petition might be taken off the file, or that her name might be struck out, and that all proceedings might be stayed. The ground upon which the application was made, was, that Mr. Ward had no authority to act for Hannah Tarbuck.

Mr. Rolt, in support of the motion.

[135] Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers, contrà.

Wiggins v. Peppin (2 Beav. 403), Lord v. Kellett (2 Myl. & K. 1), were cited.

A similar motion was made on behalf of Francis Tarbuck.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am of opinion upon the affidavits that Francis Tarbuck never withdrew his authority to Mr. Ward until after the petition was in the paper, but I think that Hannah Tarbuck had withdrawn her authority. Hannah Tarbuck asks that the petition may be taken off the file, having regard to the interest of the Respondents who are entitled to have some order made on it, I think that this cannot be done, and that the only order that I can make is, that Hannah Tarbuck's name ought not to be used.

[135] LORD MOSTYN v. SPENCER. Jan. 26, Feb. 22, 1843.

depositions suppressed after publication, on the ground that one of the Commissioners was the nephew and agent of the Plaintiff.

The fact of publication having passed, or the death of the witness, will not prevent the suppression of the depositions, when the Commissioner is disqualified by interest, provided the application be made within a reasonable time after the discovery of the objection.

This was a motion on behalf of the Defendant, that the depositions of a witness examined under a commission on behalf of the Plaintiff, might be suppressed for irregularity.

By the decree made in the cause, certain inquiries were directed, and a commission being become necessary to examine witnesses on behalf of the Plaintiff, an order for such commission was made in January 1841, but the Defendant did not join therein.

One of the Commissioners named by the Plaintiff was Cymric Lloyd, who was the nephew and agent of the Plaintiff. The nature of his agency did not appear on these proceedings, and the relationship between the Plaintiff and Lloyd was not known to the Defendant till some time after.

On the 5th of March 1841 the commission was executed by Lloyd and another Commissioner at Caen, and Pugh was examined thereunder. Publication having been made, the depositions were delivered out in December 1841. In January 1842 the Defendant objected to the evidence of Pugh, on account of his interest. The case proceeded in the Master's office, and on the 15th of December 1842, upon the return of the Master's warrant to settle his report, the name of Cymric Lloyd being observed by the Defendant's solicitor, an inquiry was made, when it appeared that Cymric Lloyd was the nephew and agent of Lord Mostyn. Notice of this motion was then given.

The witness Pugh had since died.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Teed, in support of the motion.

"No person can take part in the execution of a commission who is not wholly indifferent." Cooke v. Wilson (4 Mad. 380), and where depositions are taken by Commissioners who are disqualified by their connection with the parties to the cause, the Court, even after publication, will suppress them.

[137] It is stated in the Practical Register (page 121), that "the common exceptions to Commissioners are these: that he is of kindred, allied to the party for whom he is named," &c., "or any other apparent cause of partiality, or siding with either party."

So in Hinde (page 304), it is said, "Commissioners ought to be indifferent persons; and after Commissioners are struck, if it be discovered that one or more of the Commissioners is or are nearly allied, of counsel, solicitor, master, or partner with the Plaintiff or Defendant, or any apparent cause of partiality, or siding with either party, it may be shewn, the Court, upon motion, or the Master of the Rolls upon petition, will set aside the depositions, and name Commissioners de novo."

Here, the Commissioners stood in the relation both of nephew and agent to the Plaintiff. The depositions have been irregularly taken, and the Defendant having made his objection immediately upon the discovery of it, they ought now to be suppressed.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Craig, contra, contended, that the objection was made too late; that the Commissioners having been named in January 1841, the Defendant and his agents then knew of the appointment of Cymric Lloyd as a Commissioner, and that from the facts proved, he must have known of his relationship to the Plaintiff; that he had proceeded on the evidence, and had waived the objection, and as the Court had a discretion, it ought not to exercise it, so as to prejudice the Plaintiff, now that he was deprived, by the death of the witness, of the opportunity of re-examining him ; the more especially as there was no suggestion of any un-^[138] fairness having been practised, and as the Master had prepared his report founded on this very evidence. Gordon v. Gordon (1 Swans. 166, and 1 Wils. C. C. 155), was cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This motion is of so much importance, both as regards the practice of the Court, and the interest of the parties, that I shall not dispose of it without further consideration. The only question seems to be whether the party making this application is precluded, by the length of time or from the circumstances of the case, from making this application. A question has, to my great surprise, been raised, whether depositions can be suppressed, on the ground of a Commissioner being a person engaged in the interest of one of the parties to the cause. There is nothing more clear, and if it had now to be decided for the first time I should not have the least hesitation in so deciding. Persons appointed by the Court to take depositions must be impartial, and if they are appointed in such a way as to secure that important object, it is the duty of the Court to suppress the deposition of this, I conceive, there cannot be a doubt.

But if a party is cunning enough to get a person interested appointed Commissioner, and the objection is not observed, is the Court to receive evidence tainted by partiality? The doctrine is too important to be passed over without observation. Commissioners are the officers of the Court, though they are nominated and proposed to the Court by the parties ; the Court entrusts the parties with their nomination, subject to their being struck off by the opposite party, and to this ^[139] sanction that if it turns out that the persons are improper, the evidence shall not be available.

The argument used at the Bar with reference to what ought to be done by the Court in such a case, is most important. Suppose that a person is appointed a Commissioner whom the Court would not knowingly have appointed, he not being likely to deal impartially between the parties. If the objection be known to the opposite party, and with such knowledge he permits the proceeding to go on, running the chance of having the evidence in his favour, but resolved to take advantage of the point of form, if the evidence should turn out to be against him, can the party so in such a manner be allowed, after publication, to come to this Court for the suppression of the depositions? This argument is most material, and I must carefully examine these affidavits with this view. It is the duty of a person desirous of obtaining the regularity of proceedings, to make the objection as early as possible. The point is this, was the Defendant aware of this objection, or were the circumstances such that he ought to have known it? He cannot avail himself of any irregularity there has been negligence on his own part ; but if he really did not know of the objection, and came forward at the earliest period he could, is it now too late? I said that he ought to have applied to the Court before the depositions had been taken in the Master's office, and that it is now too late to bring forward the objection. I find it difficult to believe that Lord Eldon expressed any such opinion in Gordon v. Gordon : his observation applied to the case before him : he never intended to say that if one party concealed the objection, and the other brought it forward at the earliest moment after he discovered it, he cannot avail himself of it, after the deposition has been once read.

[140] Feb. 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This motion made by the Defendant for an order to suppress the depositions of William Pugh as being irregularly taken.

The depositions were taken on behalf of the Plaintiff, under a commission in which the Defendant did not join ; and the Plaintiff having named his own Commissioner the objection is, that one of the Commissioners, whom he named and who acted in the execution of the commission, was his nephew and agent.

I am of opinion that it was clearly wrong to insert the name of the Plaintiff's nephew and agent as a Commissioner. The Court would not, knowingly, have appointed as its minister for the execution of a commission to examine witnesses a person whose connection and employment rendered him so liable to be biassed. The nomination of Commissioners is intrusted to the parties, subject to all the consequences of improper nomination, and it would lead to the most dangerous consequences if parties were allowed to avail themselves of the evidence taken under commission.

pon which they had placed their own agents; and accordingly, the Court has suppressed the depositions, when taken under a commission, in which a solicitor (1) in the cause, or the clerk of a solicitor (2) in the cause has been named as a Commissioner. conceive that a person who is acting for the party as his agent, though he may not be his solicitor, is not less objectionable than if he were so; not being a solicitor, he may perhaps [141] be considered as less likely to be aware of the duty of being strictly impartial on such an occasion. It is not a valid objection to an application of this sort, that publication, has passed, if the party complaining comes within a reasonable time after he has discovered the objection; and the real question upon this motion is, whether the Defendant has come in a reasonable time.

It appears that Mr. Burdekin, who was then a Defendant to the cause, was introduced to Mr. Cymric Lloyd on the 9th December 1839, and was then informed that Mr. Cymric Lloyd was a relation of the Plaintiff. This was after the decree was made, but a full year before the time when the Plaintiff obtained the order to examine witnesses; and I am of opinion, that the knowledge then imparted to Burdekin that the Plaintiff had a relation called Cymric Lloyd, does not justify the supposition, that Burdekin must have known that Mr. Cymric Lloyd named in the commission which issued more than a year afterwards, was the same Mr. Cymric Lloyd, a relation of the Plaintiff, and also his agent.

In February 1841 it was first known that Cymric Lloyd was named as a Commissioner; there was not, at that time, any knowledge that he was the Plaintiff's agent, and does not appear that the Defendant then knew that he was the Plaintiff's relation; the cause and the execution of the commission proceeded, on the supposition that the Commissioners had been duly nominated. After publication, an objection was taken to the evidence of William Pugh who had been examined under the commission, on entirely different grounds, and it failed. The taking of and relying on this objection long, appears to me to be wholly inconsistent with the notion that the Defendant knew the objection now made.

[142] It was not till October 1842 that the Defendant's agent knew that a Mr. Cymric Lloyd was the agent of the Plaintiff, and not till December 1842 that the Plaintiff's agent, was known to be the Plaintiff's near relation and a Commissioner who acted in the execution of the commission.

The nature of the agency has not been explained; no evidence on the subject has been given on the part of the Plaintiff, and I have therefore no reason for inferring, that the agency was not of a nature to give the bias which it is so necessary to avoid. It is not without reluctance that I make the order. The witness is dead, there was a charge of partiality of conduct, and the Plaintiff may be deprived of evidence very important to his case. But it cannot be permitted to parties to name their own agents and relations to be Commissioners for the examination of witnesses, and if there be no fraud, neglect, or default on the part of those who complain, it does not appear to me that the Court would be justified in refusing the ordinary remedy, on the ground that the wrong had been long unknown, or because the party committing the wrong had been successful in concealing his malpractice for a long time. I must therefore order the depositions to be suppressed.

NOTE.—The Plaintiff appealed to the Lord Chancellor.

[143] STARTEN v. BARTHOLOMEW. Jan. 16, 1843.

Two suits were instituted on behalf of infants, but it was found that it was most for their benefit to prosecute the second. The first suit was properly instituted; but there being some impropriety of conduct on the part of the solicitor, who instituted it on his own authority, and nominated his brother as next friend, the first bill was, upon an interlocutory application, dismissed without costs.

Two suits were instituted on behalf of infants. The Court having referred it to the Master to ascertain which of the two suits was most for the benefit of the infants (5 Beav. 372), the Master reported in favour of the second.

A petition was now presented to confirm the Master's report, and to dismiss the first suit with costs to be paid by the next friend or his solicitor.

The first suit was instituted by Mr. R., a solicitor, without any authority whatever. He nominated his brother as next friend. Mr. R. was intimate with the father of the infants, and had been concerned for their deceased mother, but his brother was a stranger to the family.

It is not necessary to go into the details of the circumstances of the case, further than to state, that the Court, upon this application, was of opinion, that under the circumstances of the case, and having regard to the adverse claims of the father as insolvent debtor, it was proper to have instituted a suit on behalf of the infants. Mr. R., the solicitor, had stated his intention, by means of the suit, to procure payment of a sum which he claimed to be due from the mother of the infants. It also appeared, that the next friend was a mere nominee of the solicitor, and the bill being filed on the 18th of July 1842, the subpoenas were not served, and no notice given to the Defendants. The second [144] suit was instituted on the 28th of July, without notice of the existence of the first suit, and no intimation of the existence of the first suit was given till after the filing of the second bill.

Mr. Parsons, in support of the application.

Mr. Bayley, for the trustees.

Mr. Wood, contra.

Mr. Parsons, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In cases of this kind, the Court exercises a very careful discretion, on the one hand, in order to facilitate the proper exercise of the right which is given to all persons to file a bill on behalf of infants, and on the other to prevent any abuse of that right, and any wanton expense to the prejudice of the infants.

There are great complaints in this suit of the bill being filed by a stranger. I must, however, say, that if it is proper for the protection of the infants to institute a suit, such suit is not, on that ground alone, to be found fault with, nor is a party on that account to be charged with the costs, if it should turn out, upon inquiry, that the suit is for the benefit of the infants. On the other hand, if a bill be filed by the nearest relative of an infant, and it turns out that it was filed not for their benefit, but for the private interest or purposes of the next friend, such a party would be charged with the costs of the suit.

The question is, not whether there was authority from the father of the infant to file this bill, but whether a mere stranger has filed this bill, without regard to the interests of the infants, and for his own purposes.

[145] I have had several of these cases before me, in which I have had to determine whether the bill was filed improperly, and to make orders adapted to the circumstances of each particular case; it has been my duty not to discourage the filing of proper bills on behalf of infants for the protection of their estates, but at the same time to prevent improper bills being filed on their behalf.

This is a case in which ex concessis it was clearly proper to file a bill; the interest of the infants in this case being such that it was impossible for the trustees to act without the direction of the Court.

On the reference, the Master has found that the second suit is the most proper to be prosecuted. The consequence is, that there is one bill filed which will be beneficial to the infants to prosecute, and a subsequent bill filed, which will be more beneficial to be prosecuted. What, according to the ordinary practice of the Court, is next to be done? If no fault is to be found with the first suit, the ordinary course is to stop it, and to give costs to the next friend, although the first suit may not be as beneficial to the infants as the second.

It is said such an order will not meet the justice of the case, because the bill was improperly filed. I think that Mr. R. was wrong in two or three things. He was wrong in saying he would use the suit as the means for obtaining payment of his debt. Again, he ought not to have nominated a next friend of his own authority; I certainly do not think it right for a solicitor who may consider it right to institute a suit for infants, nominally to put forward the name of another person, but in reality to prosecute it himself.

[146] In the third place, I think that after filing the bill, he ought, without delay, to have served the subpoena, and have given notice to the trustees who were to answer. He did not do that for ten days, and in the meantime another bill was filed, and this created a very useless expense.

Under all these circumstances, I think I must dismiss the first bill without costs, and the costs of all other persons must be costs in the second suit.

NOTE.—See Sale v. Sale, 1 Beav. 586; Fox v. Suverkrop, Ibid. 583; Guy v. Guy, Beav. 460; Mortimer v. West, 1 Wil. C. C. 159.

[146] DRYDEN v. FOSTER. DANSON v. FOSTER. Jan. 19, 1843.

A creditor's bill was filed, which also prayed other relief. Soon after a purely creditor's suit was instituted by another party, and a decree obtained therein within seven days. The Court stayed the first suit so far only as it prayed an administration of the assets.

The first of these suits was instituted on the 2d of November 1842, on behalf of creditors of the intestate, and prayed for the administration of the estate, and that certain partnership accounts should be taken. No answer had been put in.

The second was a simple creditor's suit, instituted on the 6th of December 1842, seven days afterwards, and on the 13th of December, a decree was obtained.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Bayley moved, in the second suit, to stay the proceedings in the first.

Mr. Renshaw, contra, objected that the two suits were not precisely for the same act; that the first suit asked that certain accounts might be taken with respect to a partnership business, and also for an injunction and receiver, and an action might arise in which it might be proper to grant them. He urged also, that a second decree had been obtained by collusion.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] ordered, that all further proceedings in the first suit, so far as administration of the assets of the intestate was thereby sought, should be stayed; and he gave to the Plaintiff in the first suit liberty to go on in the second, and prove for what he might eventually establish in the first cause. (Reg. Lib. A. 1842, fo. 497.)

[147] ROBINSON v. BRUTTON. Feb. 11, March 20, 1843.

Surety given to sue on a bond given to the late Six Clerks, as a security for costs, upon a proper indemnity.

On the 22d of May 1841 the next friend of the Plaintiff was ordered to give surety for costs, and he accordingly executed the usual bond to the Six Clerks, May and Allen.

On the 22d of November 1842 the bill was dismissed with costs; and the next day being abroad, "the Defendant applied to the officer who had the custody of the bond to deliver it over to him, in order to proceed against the surety, on his giving an indemnity for the costs of any proceedings which might have to be taken in the name of the Six Clerks, but it was refused, on the ground that there were no more Six Clerks in existence (5 & 6 Vict. c. 103), and, consequently, they could not consent to [148] the use of their names, nor could they authorise the handing of the bond to the Defendant's solicitor.

Mr. Simpson moved that the Defendant might be at liberty to put the bond in suit, and use the names of the obligees.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would make inquiry before he made an order.

March 20. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] now ordered, that the Defendant should be at liberty to put the bond in suit, and for that purpose ordered the bond to be delivered by the proper officer to the Defendant; and further ordered that the Defendant should be at liberty to make use of the names Vesey and Allen, and should first give proper indemnity, to be settled by the Master in case the parties differed. (Reg. Lib. 1842, B. 562.)

[148] ALLAN v. HOULDEN. Jan. 18, 1843.

One of two sureties who had joined the principal debtor in a bond, filed a bill to set aside the transaction on the ground of fraud, and prayed an account of the payments of the bond. Held, that the principal debtor and the co-surety were necessary parties, notwithstanding the 32d Order of August 1841.

A demurrer for want of equity and want of parties, succeeded only on the last ground. No costs were given.

This case came on upon general demurrer, and the general outline of the case was as follows.

In 1838 the Defendant Houlden agreed to sell to Sherman his business as upholsterer and stock to the [149] value of £2000, the valuation to be made by indifferent persons.

The Plaintiff William Allan together with George Allan agreed to become sureties and they joined Sherman in a bond to Houlden for securing the £2000.

The bill alleged various frauds on the part of Houlden in this transaction; that Houlden had greatly misrepresented the amount of the profits of his business which was the inducement to purchase the stock. That the valuation of the stock had been improperly and fraudulently made by a friend of Houlden alone, and that Houlden had not performed the stipulations on his part. The bill stated, that payments had been made in discharge of the bond exceeding the value of the stock; that an action had been commenced thereon against the Plaintiff, and it prayed that an account might be taken of the sums paid on account of the bond, and that the bond might be delivered up to be cancelled, and for an injunction.

Neither George Allan the co-surety nor Sherman were made parties to this bill. The Defendant filed a demurrer for want of equity, and for want of parties.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Heathfield, in support of the demurrer, proceeded first to argue the demurrer for want of equity; but the Master of the Rolls, without hearing the other side, intimated his clear opinion, that it could not be sustained.

They then argued that the suit was defective for want of parties. That the transaction could not be partially [150] set aside; Myddleton v. Lord Kenyon (2 V. & J. 391); and if it was to be totally set aside, then Sherman, the principal, and George Allan the co-surety ought to be before the Court. That the bill also prayed an account, which could only be effectually taken in the presence of all parties interested, otherwise a succession of bills might be filed for the same object, and accounts be repeatedly taken; besides this, Sherman had possession of the goods which, upon setting aside the whole transaction, ought to be restored.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. S. Miller, contra, on the point of parties, argued, that the Plaintiff was relieved by the Thirty-second General Order of August 1841 (Ord. C. 174), from making the co-obligors parties to the suit. The account prayed is merely ancillary to the principal relief.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] held that the bill was defective for want of the parties pointed out, and he allowed the demurrer on that ground alone; but as the principal objection had failed, he gave no costs of the demurrer. (Benson v. Hadfield, 5 Beav. 546.)

[150] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. PARGETER. Jan. 23, 24, Feb. 1, 1843.

A husbandry lease of charity lands for 200 years at a fixed rent, cannot, unless there be some special reason, be supported in equity. Such a lease of charity lands cannot be supported upon any custom of the country in which the lands are situate. The purchaser of a charity lease takes with notice of the facts appearing thereon shewing its equitable invalidity.

This was an information filed for the purpose of setting aside a lease of charity lands, which had been granted by the trustees for a term of 200 years at a fixed rent of £14, 3s.

[151] It appeared that Thomas Foley had in his lifetime built a school for sixty boys. By his will, he devised the house and various real estates in fee to the persons named in his will, and gave to the same persons a sum of money to be expended in the purchase of other real estates, to be conveyed to them; and he directed the lands to be employed for the purposes of the charity. He afterwards in his will, speaking of his devisees, termed them "Feoffees."

The testator died in 1677, and new trustees were afterwards appointed. On the 28th of September 1695 the trustees demised part of the charity lands to William Parker for 200 years, at a rent of £14, 3s. The lease contained an exception of the mines and quarries, coal, ironstone mines and minerals, with liberty to search for and get the same, and also an exception of the hares and other game, with liberty for three of the trustees, &c., to sport, to hawk upon the premises, and a covenant by the lessee to preserve the game. The lessee did not subject himself to any obligation to build or to expend any money, but he covenanted to pay the reserved rent, to keep the buildings and fences belonging to the premises in good and tenantable repair, to use upon the premises the hay, straw, and fodder, and the dung, soil, and compost arising thereon, and to manure the premises in a good and husbandly manner.

The Defendant stood in the situation of a purchaser of this lease.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Spurrier, in support of the information. This is a purely husbandry lease for 200 years, at a small, inadequate and fixed rent; practically this is an alienation of the charity property, and according to the authorities this is a breach of trust, and the lease is in equity void.

The lease on the face of it shews that it was a demise of charity lands for too long a period, at a fixed rent, and it carries, on the face of it, notice of the breach of trust; the Defendant, therefore, cannot say that he is a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Harwood, contrà, contended first, that this was not a husbandry lease, and that the reasoning did not apply; secondly, that the will was not the original instrument of the foundation of the charity, and if that instrument were produced by the trustees, it might shew that there was a power of granting such a lease. The will shewed that the school had been completed in 1670, and both the will and the inscription on the picture of the testator (which was produced in evidence), shewed that the trustees were "feoffees," and therefore implied that the property had been conveyed to them by some instrument other than the will. Thirdly, that the evidence shewed that the custom of the country warranted such a lease, and there were instances in which the testator himself had granted such leases, and lastly that when, at a great distance of time, the Attorney-General sought to set aside a lease as against a purchaser, he must shew inadequacy of consideration at the time it was granted, and notice in the purchaser. That here the Defendant was purchaser for valuable consideration and without notice. In Attorney-General v. Backhouse (17 Ves. 283, 293), such a lease was supported in favour of a purchaser, and Lord Eldon observed, "These parties must be understood at least to have notice that the lessors were trustees for a charity: but I [153] cannot go the length that the purchasers had notice that this was a bad lease; that depending upon a number of circumstances dehors the lease."

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

The following cases were cited, Attorney-General v. Green (6 Ves. 452), Attorney-General v. Owen (10 Ves. 555), Attorney-General v. Griffith (13 Ves. 565), Attorney-General v. Kerr (2 Beav. 420), In re The Berkhamstead Free School (2 Ves. & B. 13), Attorney-General v. Hungerford (2 Cl. & Fin. 357; 8 Bl. 437), Attorney-General v. C. (3 Mer. 524), Attorney-General v. Warren (2 Swan. 291; and see Attorney-General v. Brettingham, 3 Beav. 91, and Attorney-General v. The South Sea Company, 4 Beav. 45), Attorney-General v. Backhouse (17 Ves. p. 293).

Feb. 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is an information a bill filed to set aside a lease dated the 28th of September 1695, whereby certain charity lands were demised to William Parker for 200 years, at the stationary rent of £14, 3s.

It does not appear that any consideration, other than the rent, was paid or agreed to be paid for the lease. There was no surrender of any former lease; the lessee did not subject himself to any obligation to build or to expend any money, but covenanted to pay the reserved rent, to keep the buildings and fences belonging to the premises in good and tenantable repair, to use upon the premises the hay, straw and fodder, and the dung, soil, and compost arising thereon, and to manure the premises in a good and husbandly manner.

[154] I think that this is a husbandry lease, and not the less so, because there is an exception in the grant, of the mines and quarries, coal, ironstone, mines and minerals, with liberty to search for and get the same; and also an exception of hares, partridges, pheasants, and other beasts and birds of warren, with liberty to three of the trustees, their servants and followers, to hawk and hunt upon the premises, at their wills and pleasures, and a covenant by the lessee to preserve game for the same persons.

This being a husbandry lease of charity lands granted for 200 years at a fixed rent, it cannot stand, unless there be some special reason to support it.

I am of opinion, that the length of the term is not justified or excused by the reservation of the mines, and the right to get coal and minerals.

It is argued, that there are in this case circumstances, to shew that the foundation of the charity is not forthcoming—that there must have been some deed of covenant—and that if such deed of settlement were produced, it would or it might be thereby shewn, that there was authority to grant this long lease.

It does not appear to me that the facts of the case afford any foundation for the argument, that there was any deed or instrument other than the will, whereby the estate was vested in the trustees.

The testator, having built a schoolhouse in which sixty boys were placed, devised the house and various real estates to the persons named in his will in fee, and gave to the same persons a sum of money to be expended in the purchase of other real estates, to be conveyed to them in fee: he directed the lands to be employed for the purposes of the charity, and in afterwards speaking of the persons to whom he had made the devise, he calls them "feoffees," instead of "devisees" or "trustees," and from this it is argued, that it should be inferred that there must have been some feoffment besides the devise; but I own that it appears to me, from the context of the will, that in using the word "feoffees," the testator means only to designate, in other words, the several persons to whom he had devised the estate in fee. I cannot suppose that he made a devise of the lands to the same uses, to persons to whom he had previously conveyed the same lands by feoffment; and I do not think that the inscription on the picture adds any probability to the argument. It does not appear what was the date of the inscription, and I think that by "feoffees," was meant the persons, who, as trustees, were possessed of the fee or inheritance of the estate, and that the will of the founder was the instrument by which the estate was settled.

In the lease in question, the devisees are described as trustees or feoffees; the description perhaps intended to reconcile their real character as trustees with the slightly erroneous description of them in the will, and on the testator's picture, if such inscription was existing at the date of the lease, which does not appear.

It is next argued, that this lease was granted according to the custom of the country, and according to the usual mode of letting, adopted and acted upon by the trustees themselves. It appears, indeed, that the trustees had granted some other leases of the same kind, and an attempt was made to prove the alleged custom of the country. I think that the attempt was unnecessary, for if any number of such leases had been proved, they [156] could not have established a custom which would have justified trustees in alienating the charity lands in this way, but the proof failed, and some leases for twenty-one years were produced.

It is lastly argued, that the Defendant's father was a purchaser of the estate for a valuable consideration, and that he was not bound by an equity to set aside the lease founded on extrinsic circumstances, but the purchaser must be held to have had notice of the lease which he purchased.(1) The equity of this case is not founded on extrinsic circumstances, but on the facts appearing on the lease itself, shewing it to be such, that if due consideration had been given to the subject, neither lessors nor lessees could have thought the lease beneficial to the charity, or anything less than a breach of trust.

[157] GURDEN v. BADCOCK. Nov. 5, 6, 16, 1841; Dec. 6, 7, 1842.

In 1812 the executors of a receiver applied to pass his accounts and pay in the balance, this was ordered, but payment was not made. In 1841 they were ordered to pay in the balance without interest, and it was held that they could not object the want of assets.

A was appointed receiver, but the solicitor in the cause alone acted and paid over the rents to the tenant for life. An incumbrancer compelled the receiver to pay the same amount into Court, and after payment of his claim, there remained a surplus, which was paid to the tenant for life. Held, that A. could not, on petition, obtain repayment by the tenant for life or out of the estates.

Under the will of the testator, Mr. Price was tenant for life of an estate, subject to certain incumbrances thereon, and to an annuity of £100 a year payable thereout to Mary Sanders.

In 1805 a bill was instituted by Price and another for the purpose of paying the charges and carrying the trusts of the will into execution.

In 1806 Mr. Drayson was appointed receiver of the estates, in the usual manner. The receiver was continued by the decree made in 1808, and he was ordered to keep down the incumbrances.

Mr. Drayson, the receiver, did not, however, in fact, act, but a Mr. Kirby who as trustee was a Defendant in the cause, and was also the solicitor of the Plaintiff and Defendants, received the rents, and took upon himself the management of the matters. Mr. Drayson died in 1809, and in 1812 his executors, by the direction and suggestion of Kirby, applied for and obtained leave to pass the receiver's accounts and to pay the balance into Court. The Master found a sum of £992 to be due from the receiver; this sum however was, in fact, in the hands of Kirby, and was never paid into Court. The tenant for life was let into possession in 1809, and was directed to keep down the annuity and incumbrances.

The cause was heard on further directions in 1814 when certain declarations were made.

[158] The suit remained in a state of inactivity for some years, but in 1830 the conduct of the cause was taken from the Plaintiffs and given to the representatives of Mrs. Sanders the annuitant, to whom an arrear of annuity was due. They some years after, discovering that the receiver's balance had not been paid into Court, presented a petition, praying that his surviving executor might pay into Court the sum of £992 and interest. The incumbrancers having priority over the life-estate had not been paid off.

It was alleged that Mr. Kirby in his lifetime, had paid over a portion of the £300 to Mr. Price, the tenant for life, and that after his decease his executor had, in 1828, paid over £437, 19s., the balance, to Mr. Lovell, Mr. Price's solicitor in the cause, who gave the following receipt for the same:—

“In Chancery.

“July 26, 1836.—Gurden v. Badcock and Others.—Received of Mr. Henry Ellison surviving executor of the will of the late J. M. Kirby, Esq., the sum of £437, 19s., money retained by him out of the rents resulting from the Westbury and Mixtun estates, towards the costs of his bill which have been otherwise discharged.

“For Mr. B. Price,

“JOHN LOVELL.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Lloyd, in support of the petition, asked, that the executor of the receiver might be ordered to pay the fund into Court with 5 per cent. interest.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Dixon, for Mr. Price, the tenant for life.

[159] Mr. Russell and Mr. Romilly, for Mr. Deacon, the executor of the receiver, contended that there was no case for charging the executor personally; and that he had no assets in hand to discharge the claim. That the laches of the parties had been such, as to disentitle them to the assistance of the Court. That the balance, never, in fact, came to the hands of the receiver, and by arrangement between the parties it had been paid by Kirby to the tenant for life. That the relief now asked could not be granted on petition.

Mr. Ellison and Mr. Smythe, for other parties.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said that the executors, having three years after the testator's death, and with perfect knowledge of the state of his assets and the circumstances of the case, presented their petition for passing the accounts and payment of the balance, could not now be heard to say that they had no assets.

That as to the delay, the parties had existing duties to perform, and had had the matter brought to their attention both in 1828, and again in 1836, when they entered into arrangements not with the parties having the first charges, but with the tenant for life. That as there were existing claims, prior to the estate of the tenant for life, towards the liquidation of which this fund was liable, his impression was that the money must be paid into Court, but whether or not with interest required consideration. His Lordship said he would read the documents before deciding.

[160] Nov. 16. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that the Respondent must pay into Court the amount of principal money, and the costs of application; but considering the length of time which had elapsed, and the laches of the parties, he ought not to direct the payment of interest: that the case was an unfortunate one, the parties having implicitly relied on the solicitor, but everything tended to shew the responsibility of the representative of the receiver.

On the 16th of December 1841 the executor of the receiver paid into Court the amount as directed, and which sum, together with another sum in Court, was in 1842 applied in payment of the incumbrances and costs, and the residue of the fund after such payment, was directed to be paid to Pugh, the assignee of Price, the tenant for life. The claims of the parties having preference to the tenant for life, became satisfied, and they gave up possession of the estates.

The executor of the receiver having first learned of this order in July 1842 presented a petition praying that an account might be taken of the monies paid by Kirby, the agent of the receiver, and by the executors of the receiver to the tenant for life; and that the tenant for life might repay the amount to the Petitioner, and that it might be declared that in default the rents of the estate might be applied to the discharge thereof.

The affidavit of Price stated, that he had never received any accounts from Kirby. That in 1836 when negotiations were pending as to the payment of the balance the executor of Kirby to him, Price, he had insisted on the representatives of Kirby paying interest on the balance. That Lovell, in 1837, rendered him [161] an account, in which he was credited with the £437, 19s. received from the executor of Kirby, and which was the first time he was acquainted with the arrangement made. That no account had ever been received by him, Price, and that the £437, 19s. had been applied in liquidating the balance of Lovell's account against Price.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Romilly, in support of the petition. The ground on which the £992 was ordered to be paid into Court, on the former occasion, was, that it was wanted for the incumbrancers. It has turned out that it was not required for that purpose. If the Court had been aware of the state of the funds, no order would have been made for payment by the executor of the receiver. The surplus of the fund paid in, after paying the incumbrancers, belonged, in equity, to the representatives of the receiver, and if the fund had remained in Court, it would, on application, have been repaid to the executor of the receiver. Price and his incumbrancer have obtained it out of Court, behind the back of the parties interested, so that Price has, in effect, twice received payment of the same sum from the receiver. The jurisdiction of the Court cannot be destroyed by the irregular payment out of Court, besides which the nature of the suit is such, that the Court has still jurisdiction and control over the rents of the property, and, by their proper application, the Petitioner may be indemnified.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lloyd, for Price. The Court has no jurisdiction, upon petition, to fix a lien on the real estate of the tenant for life, at the instance of a stranger to the cause.

Before the Petitioner can have the relief he asks, the accounts must be taken as between Price and the [162] estate of Kirby, and all the equities between them determined.

Both the receiver and Kirby who represents him, ought also to be charged with interest on their balances, and the poundage ought to be disallowed. All this involves a series of proceedings which cannot be taken on petition.

If the Petitioner had wished to establish any equity on the fund, he should have obtained a stop order.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. If this were the simple case supposed, there would be no great difficulty in dealing with it. If the receiver had paid to the tenant for life, money which he ought to have paid into Court for the benefit of a creditor, and at a subsequent period had been compelled by the creditor to pay the same amount into Court, and if, after full payment to the creditor, a surplus remained in Court which the tenant for life applied to have paid to him, the Court would have no difficulty in stopping payment, until the claim of the receiver had been investigated; and no difficulty in exercising its jurisdiction in ordering the remaining fund in Court to be paid back to the receiver.

That is not this case. Here there has been an irregularity from the beginning. In July 1806 the receiver was appointed: it seems he never acted as such, except for the purpose of rendering the accounts under the dictation of Mr. Kirby, who received the rents of the estate. He, it seems, was solicitor for the next friend of the infant Plaintiff, and was executor and trustee of the will under which the estate was to be administered, [163] and in that character was a party to the cause. In 1807 an account was rendered down to Michaelmas. In 1809, at Michaelmas, two years' further accounts were to be rendered, and shortly after that time the receiver died.

In 1812 the executors of the receiver, again at the dictation or suggestion of Kirby, applied for leave to pass the account, and the accounts were passed on the 6th and 7th of November 1812, and £992 was found due on this account. This amount, though appearing due from the receiver, was, in fact, in the hands of Kirby, and continued in his hands for very many years. In 1836 an account seems to have been settled; it appears, though the evidence is not very distinct, that there had been several previous payments to Price, the tenant for life, and in July 1836, upon the settlement of the account, the balance was paid by the representative of Kirby to Lovell, the solicitor of Price.

Supposing no account to have been settled, what would be the right of the receiver who has been thus called on to pay the money into Court? He claims the benefit of the payments made to Price by Kirby. Can he have them without subjecting himself to all the liabilities of Kirby to Price? It appears to me that he cannot. The receiver who appointed Kirby to act as his agent, claims the benefit of the payments made by Kirby to Price. In order to have the benefit, he must place himself in the situation of Kirby, and if Kirby was liable to Price, I apprehend, that subject to those liabilities only, can the receiver work out his claim. If no account was settled, what was the relation between Kirby and Price? Drayson was appointed receiver, but Kirby assumed to act as such; and I am inclined to think [164] that as between Price and Kirby, Kirby was subject to all the liability to which the receiver was subject. If there was no account settled, no settlement between the parties, what were the liabilities of Kirby or his estate? In 1836 was he not liable to pay interest for all that time, and liable to be deprived of his poundage?

On the other hand, suppose the account was settled as between Kirby and Price, can the present Petitioner, the receiver, claim the benefit of the payments made by Kirby to Price, without opening the account; and can a right to open the account be established in any such proceeding as this? It is possible that the account may be opened, but I cannot, on a petition of this description, consider it to be opened.

This case comes on upon petition, after an order for the distribution of the funds in Court, not asking that an anticipated payment to the tenant for life may be stayed, or that the sum improperly paid may be brought back; but it asks a general account of what was paid, and seeks the benefit of a lien on the estate, for what shall appear due on the account. I do not think that the relief can be granted on petition in a case like this. There are many cases where liberty is given to apply, in which an application may be made by persons not parties to the record, but they are persons having a direct interest in the execution of the decree. There is nothing in this decree that gives an interest to the Petitioner, and what is asked is not the result of any decree or direction in the cause, but is founded on something not appearing at all in the record. If I considered it a case in which money had been got out of Court by fraud or improper concealment, it would be subject to other considerations.

[165] It appears that the accounts between Kirby and Price have been such, that you must overturn what has taken place between them before you can get at the account. Under these circumstances, I cannot grant the relief which is sought. There is a grievous hardship if what is alleged is true, that Price had some of the money in his hands, which the receiver was ordered to pay into Court.

I do not determine that the Petitioner has not the right he claims; all I can say is, that he has not such a right as he can make available upon petition.

The petition must be dismissed without costs, and without prejudice to any further proceedings.

[165] DARTHEZ v. CLEMENS. Dec. 22, 1842.

Where a bill for an account which relies on certain items as the ground for transferring the matter from the jurisdiction of a Court of law to that of equity, also contains a general vague charge of there being voluminous and intricate accounts between the parties; then, if the Plaintiff fails in supporting his equity upon the particular items, he cannot maintain the bill against a demurrer upon the latter vague charge. Upon a bill for a general account between A. and B., a question arose as to these items, whether they ought to be charged against A. or against C., with whom A. and B. had had some mutual dealings. Held, that C. was not a necessary party to the suit.

The Plaintiffs Messrs. Darthez & Co. were merchants residing in London, and the Defendant Clemens was a merchant at Malaga. The Defendant and one Ritchie of New York, were the Plaintiffs' correspondents in trade, and had made consignments of goods and merchandise to them, and the Plaintiffs, from time to time, advanced money on the credit of the consignments. The Defendant having commenced an action at law against the Plaintiffs for the recovery of [166] £1705, the alleged amount of the balance due from the Plaintiffs to the Defendant, the Plaintiffs filed his bill, to have between them the accounts taken, and to restrain the proceedings at law.

The greatest portion of the allegations of the bill related to three particular sums of £1000, £1000, and £700, which the bill insisted ought to be brought into the account between the Plaintiffs and the Defendant, and for which it alleged credit ought to be given by the Defendant, by means of which the balance would be turned in favour of the Plaintiffs. It stated, as the foundation for this, certain transactions between the three parties, in the course of which these three sums had become due; and it appeared in dispute between the Plaintiffs and the Defendant, whether from the nature of the dealings and the effect of the correspondence between the three parties, these sums ought to be charged in account against the Defendant, or against Ritchie alone, who was alleged to be insolvent.

After stating these matters, the bill, as the foundation for a general account, stated as follows: "That various other dealings and transactions were, from time to time made, and did take place by and between the Plaintiffs and the said Defendant hereto, in the way of their respective trades or businesses as merchants, and divers remittances and consignments of monies, bills of exchange, goods, and merchandise were, from time to time, made, by and from the said Defendant to the Plaintiffs; and divers sums of money were, from time to time, paid by the Plaintiffs by the direction, and to and for the use and on account, of the said Defendant hereto, exclusive of the particular sums hereinbefore in that behalf mentioned, and divers goods and merchandise were, from time to time, shipped and sent by [167] the Plaintiffs by the direction and to and for the use of the said Defendant hereto; and the monies and goods so remitted and paid, on each side, by and between the Plaintiffs and the said Defendant hereto, amount to a very large and considerable sum in the whole; and a considerable balance of sum of money hath become and is now justly due and owing from the said Defendant hereto to the Plaintiffs on the foot of the said account; and by the means aforesaid, an account hath arisen, and is still open, subsisting and unsettled between the said Defendant and the Plaintiffs, in respect of the matters aforesaid.

"That the said accounts between the Plaintiffs and the said Defendant, and more especially having regard to the transactions between the said Defendant hereto, and the said John Ritchie herein appearing, are of a very voluminous nature, and consist of several hundreds of items on both sides of the account, including a daily interest account; and such account between the Plaintiffs and the said Defendant could not, without manifest inconvenience and injustice to the Plaintiffs, be taken in a Court of Common Law, and such account cannot, in fact, be justly or properly taken except in a Court of Equity, where such matters are properly cognizable and relievable."

The bill charged that a balance was due to the Plaintiffs; it required the Defendant to set forth all the dealings and transactions, and prayed a general account of all the dealings and transactions between the Plaintiffs and the Defendant.

To this bill Clemens alone was made a Defendant, and he demurred to this bill, first, for want of equity, and, secondly, for want of parties.

[168] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Colvile, in support of the demurrer, contended that it appeared from the statement in the bill (which they commented on) that the Plaintiffs were not entitled to set off the three sums in question, which alone formed the subject of dispute between the parties; and that a Court of law was perfectly competent to decide such a question. [Mr. Pemberton. We do not rely on these three items, but insist on the Plaintiffs' right to the general account.] The Plaintiffs then must shew, on the face of their bill, that the account between them and the Defendant can only be taken in this Court, otherwise they will not be allowed to withdraw the case from the Court of law which already has jurisdiction. Mere general allegations of the intricacy of the accounts are insufficient for the purpose: they will be disregarded by this Court, and will be considered as struck out. Davidson v. Bailey (6 Ves. 136), Frietas v. Dos Santos (1 You. & Jer. 574), King v. Rossett (2 You. & Jer. 33), Bowles v. Orr (1 You. & Col. 464).

Secondly, Ritchie is a necessary party to this suit, for if these three items are to be brought into the account between the Plaintiffs and Defendant, the balance between Ritchie and the Defendant will be altered. Ritchie has an interest in the matters; the Plaintiffs, asking to have the benefit of the set-off as against the Defendant, have improperly omitted making Ritchie, the person principally interested, a party to the suit.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rogers were not heard by

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], who said—I do not think that this demurrer can be sustained. The Plaintiffs say they are entitled to a general account, [169] and to have credit for the three particular sums; but they concede, for the purpose of this demurrer, that they are not entitled to relief in respect of the three sums, and rest on their right to the general account.

The Defendant states, what I believe is perfectly true in point of law, that if there be a bill for an account in respect of particular items, or any number of particular items, and the Plaintiff fails in sustaining the demand upon those particular items, and the bill happens to contain a general vague charge that there are voluminous and intricate accounts between the parties, and which charge is inserted merely as a pretext for the purpose of bringing the case within the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity, the Court, in so vague and uncertain a case, will disregard that general allegation, will consider it as struck out of the bill, and not allow it to protect the bill against a demurrer for want of equity. That is the utmost extent to which the cases have gone.

It therefore comes to this, does this bill contain such vague and general statements, statements put in merely as a pretext for transferring the jurisdiction from the Court of law to this Court? If the account can be fairly taken in a Court of Common Law, this Court will not interfere, even in the case of merchants' accounts consisting of mutual dealings; but in this case I am persuaded not only that the accounts between these parties could not be advantageously taken in a Court of law, but that they could not be taken at all there. Everybody knows how an action upon such an account would necessarily end; it would end in the account being taken in this Court, or by a reference.

It is said that the bill is defective for want of parties. If the three items should ever come into question, the [170] Plaintiffs must make out their case by proof; but it does not follow that Ritchie is a necessary party to the taking of the accounts between the Plaintiffs and the Defendant. I think also that the demurrer cannot be sustained on this ground.

Demurrer overruled.

[170] GARDNER v. JAMES. Jan. 24, 27, 1843.

Bequest of residue, in trust, after payment of an annuity of £50 to A. for life, to apply the residue of the interest towards the maintenance of the children of B. until twenty-one, and in case of the death of A. during their minority, to apply the whole or so much as was necessary in the same way, and after the death of A., when such children attained twenty-one, to transfer the principal to them. There was a gift over in case there should be no children of B. living at the death of A. The fund was more than sufficient to provide for the annuity. Held, that the gift to the children was not confined to those living at the death of the testatrix.

The testator, by his will, bequeathed his residuary personal estate to his executor, upon trust to "invest the whole residue thereof at interest, and pay £50 per annum, part of such interest, unto Susannah Brunton, and her assigns for life; and after payment of the said sum of £50 per annum, upon trust, to apply the residue of the interest of the said trust money, for and towards the maintenance, education, and support of any child or children of Henry Holland Gardner lawfully begotten, until he, she, or they should, respectively, attain his, her, or their age or ages of twenty-one years; and also, in case of the death of the said Susannah Brunton during the minority of such child or children of Henry Holland Gardner, then, in trust to apply the whole of the interest of such trust money, or so much thereof as in the discretion of his said trustee should be considered necessary for that purpose, for the maintenance, education, and support of such child or children; and after the death of the said Susannah Brunton, and when such child or children of Henry Holland Gardner [71] should have attained such age or respective ages of twenty-one years as aforesaid, then, upon trust, to transfer such trust money to such child, if there should be only one, or if there should be more than one, to all such children, share and share alike; but if there should be no such child of Henry Holland Gardner living at the death of the said Susannah Brunton, or in case of the death of such child or children before they should attain the said age of twenty-one years as aforesaid, then, after the death of Susannah Brunton, the testator gave and bequeathed the whole of the said trust money, and all accumulations thereof, to John James, his executors, administrators, and assigns absolutely."

A bill was, in 1828, filed by the children then in esse of Henry Holland Gardner, in which the accounts were taken, and the residue was found to consist of £2700 per cent.; of this sum £1677, 13s. 4d. was set apart to answer the annuity of £50, and the dividends on the remainder were ordered to be applied towards the maintenance of the Plaintiffs in the suit, who were infants.

Henry Holland Gardner had afterwards four children born, who claimed to be interested in the residue. The Plaintiffs in the first suit then instituted the present suit, praying a declaration that the children living at the death of the testator were one entitled under the will.

Mr. Hallett, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Blower, contra.

Mr. Hallett, in reply.

[172] The following authorities were referred to:—Sprackling v. Ranier (1 Dick. 14), Ringrose v. Bramham (2 Cox, 384), Hill v. Chapman (1 Ves. jun. 405), Davidson Dallas (14 Ves. 576), Butler v. Lowe (10 Sim. 317), Defflis v. Goldschmidt (1 Mer. 17), Balm v. Balm (3 Sim. 492), *Scott v. Jan. 27. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, he was of opinion that the gift to the children was not confined to those living at the death of the testator, that after-born children were let in, but he could make no further declaration at the present time.

[173] HOOPER v. PAVER. Feb. 11, 1843.

In the Vice-Chancellor's cause, the Plaintiffs described themselves as resident abroad. The Defendants obtained ex parte at the Rolls, an order for security for costs. An application to the Master of the Rolls to discharge it, on the ground that the Defendants had in their hands funds belonging to the Plaintiffs sufficient to indemnify them, was refused, because there was no irregularity in the order, and the cause being attached to the Vice-Chancellor's Court, the Master of the Rolls could not enter into the merits.

The Plaintiffs in this cause having described themselves as resident abroad, the Defendants obtained, as of course, at the Rolls, an order that the Plaintiff should give security for costs.

The cause was attached to the Vice-Chancellor's Court.

A motion was now made to discharge the order for irregularity.

Mr. Smyth, in support of the motion. The bill in this case is filed by the children, and the administration of a fund to which they are entitled under the settlement of their parents; and it appears that the Defendants have a fund of £6000 in hand which belongs to the Plaintiffs. If Defendants have in their hands a fund belonging to the Plaintiff, sufficient to indemnify them against the costs of the suit, they have a right to demand a further security for those costs.

The order having been made here, the application for its discharge must necessarily be made to the Master of the Rolls, as the Vice-Chancellor has no jurisdiction to alter or discharge the orders of the Master of the Rolls. Whitehouse v. Hickman (1 S. & L. 104), Earl of Glengall v. Bland (1 Hare, 624).

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Rolt were not called on by having described themselves as resident abroad, it was quite of course to obtain an order for security for costs. The order complained of was therefore perfectly regular, and if the Plaintiffs sought to discharge it on other grounds they must apply to another jurisdiction.

[174] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] who said, that the Plaintiffs

The motion must be refused with costs.

[174] PINNER v. KNIGHTS. Feb. 11, 1843.

A bill being filed without the written authority of one of several Co-plaintiffs, and the evidence being unsatisfactory as to the retainer, his name was struck out as Co-plaintiff with costs to be paid by the solicitor.

Where a solicitor files a bill without a written authority, the onus of proof is cast on him. If there be any doubt on the matter, the Court will hold him liable.

Mr. G., a solicitor, had filed this bill in the name of Mr. Thomas Knights and others. It appeared, however, that he had had no communication with Thomas Knights, and had received no authority from him personally to institute the suit, but had acted by the directions of Mr. Knights' brothers, who said that they had communicated with him, and that he had authorized the step.

It was now moved, that Mr. Knights' name might be struck out as Co-plaintiff with costs to be paid by Mr. G. the solicitor.

Affidavits were filed in support and in opposition to the motion by Mr. T. Knights and by his brothers, but [175] which it is not necessary to state further than that they appeared to the Court to leave the fact of the Plaintiff's authority to his brothers, in considerable doubt.

Mr. George Turner, in support of the motion, asked for a similar order to that made in the cause of Hood v. Phillips. (See next case.)

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Dixon, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have of late had several of these cases before me (Tabbemor v. Tabbemor, 2 Keen, 679; Wiggins v. Peppin, 2 Beav. 403; Allen v. Bone, 4 Beav. 493), which I exceedingly regret.

Nothing surprises me more than that solicitors should so frequently take upon themselves to file bills in the names of persons who have not given them authority in writing. The general rule of the Court is, that a solicitor should obtain a written authority from his client; I have often had occasion to observe, that the interest of the client does, very often, induce a solicitor to file a bill before he has had an opportunity of obtaining an authority in writing; I cannot consider a solicitor is to be blamed in cases of that kind, but, as I have said before, he acts most imprudently if he does not take the very first opportunity to obtain the sanction of the client for what he has done. The law of the Court is perfectly clear, that if the authority afterwards comes into question, ay or no, whether there is an authority from the client or not, and there is no writing, it will go against the solicitor unless he can prove distinct authority or implied authority by acquiescence or some other means.

[176] Now, in this case, there does not appear to have been any personal communication between Mr. G. and Mr. Thomas Knights; Mr. G. trusted to the representations of the brothers, who said they had communicated with Mr. Thomas Knights, and that he had authorized them to instruct him. The consequence is, that Mr. G. must prove satisfactorily, that the brothers were empowered to authorize him. When we come to examine the evidence, it is impossible for the Court to make up its mind on which side the truth lies, and upon that ground, and upon that ground alone, I am under the necessity of saying that the solicitor, on whom the burthen of proof is cast, has not, in the midst of this conflicting and contradictory evidence, made out his case.

The authority not having been proved, this motion must be granted.

[176] HOOD v. PHILLIPS. July 21, 22, 1842.

[See Nurse v. Durnford, 1879, 13 Ch. D. 767.]

bill filed without the authority of the Plaintiff, was dismissed with costs, and the Plaintiff was taken under an attachment for non-payment of costs. The Court, on motion, ordered the solicitor to indemnify A., but refused to release A. as against the claim of the Defendants. Held, also, that A. was not, on such an application, to be deprived of his right against the solicitor to damages for his imprisonment.

In this case, a suit had been instituted in the names of Hood and of Sanders and the cause coming on for hearing, it was dismissed with costs.

In this proceeding Mr. Phillips, who acted as solicitor for the Plaintiffs, took his actions entirely from Hood, and, as it appeared, never communicated with Sanders, or obtained from him any authority for instituting or prosecuting the suit.

[177] Upon the dismissal of the bill, a subpoena for costs issued; the Plaintiff was taken under an attachment for their non-payment, and was lodged in gaol.

Mr. G. Turner now moved that the name of Sanders and Mary his wife might be struck out of the record of the Plaintiff's bill in this cause:—that the Plaintiff might be discharged out of custody as to his contempt for not paying £63, 4s. costs to the Defendants, and that Phillips might be ordered to pay the costs of this application, together with the costs which Sanders had become liable to pay, by reason of his having been made a party to this suit.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Freeling, for the Defendants.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lewis, for Phillips.

Wilson v. Wilson (1 Jac. & W. 457), Wade v. Stanley (Ibid. 674), Tabernor v. Prior (2 Keen, 679), were cited. (And see Wiggins v. Peppin, 2 Beav. 403; Allen v. Allen, 4 Beav. 493; Hall v. Bennett, 2 Sim. & St. 78.)

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Before filing a bill, it is the duty of the solicitor to obtain distinct authority; the general rule is that he ought to have it in writing, but though this is the proper course, still it is not necessary, if it be proved that the Plaintiff has afterwards acquiesced in the proceedings, and that the circumstances are such that the Court can infer an authority. Whenever the question is, whether the [178] authority has been given or not, and it becomes the subject of doubt and argument, the onus of proving it lies on the solicitor. In this case there is the least circumstance from which I can infer that any authority was given by Sanders: no express authority is proved; no communication with him, and no circumstance from which my mind can be led to the conclusion that any authority was at all given. Then it is said that the subject of this suit was one proper for the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity; I am informed, that such was the opinion of a man of the Bar, and that, in consequence of that opinion, this suit was instituted. Authority seems to have been given by one of the Plaintiffs, and, without doubt, the solicitor thought that the best mode of conducting the suit was to make all these parties Co-plaintiffs. It was very unfortunate that he did not recollect that with the authority of one he could not proceed in the name of both. In consequence of his having proceeded without that authority, he has become subject to consequences which follow on this present motion.

It is said, that not only did Sanders not authorise the suit, but that he expressly dissented from it, not indeed to Phillips, but to the Co-plaintiff. Having dissented, knowing nothing of the matter, he was not further informed of it till the bill was filed with costs; then he was told that he had not only lost the £500 for which he had sued, but also the costs incurred in consequence of the suit. I should have been glad to have heard that the solicitor had made some communication to Sanders, saying, "I have made a mistake and will protect you." Instead of that, it does not appear that he took any step whatever. The consequence, as might have been expected, was, that a subpoena for costs followed, and shortly after an attachment was issued, under [179] which Sanders was lodged in gaol, where he now remains, for non-payment of the costs to which he was subjected by Phillips, who thinks proper to contend that he is not bound to indemnify him at all. It is clear, however, that he has a right to be relieved from these costs at the expense of Phillips.

I am afraid that the forms and rules of this Court do not enable me to exonerate him from the claims of the Defendants. It seems to have been considered necessary that the declared rights of parties in a cause should be preserved, the similar claims of a party to the cause has, upon different occasions, been made effectual; and, notwithstanding this unfortunate person has been brought into the present situation without any authority given by himself, I fear I cannot relieve him from the demands of the Defendant, except by arrangement.

I have no doubt whatever, that he ought to be exonerated by Phillips from the demand, and the order to be made ought to be like that in Wade v. Stanley (1 L. W. 674). I cannot but hope that he will immediately take proceedings not only to release the Plaintiff from his present situation, but also from the further imprisonment which is impending over him, if the costs due from him to other parties are not paid.

It is asked, that I should make it a condition for giving relief, that the Plaintiff should be precluded from demanding any damages. I think that no authority can be produced to this effect. If there were, I would follow it; if not, I am disposed to make a precedent. The only thing that can be done on the present application is, to exonerate the unfortunate man [180] at the expense of Phillips, by these means to exempt him from future imprisonment.

I cannot give him compensation for having been taken away from work and kept in prison, the effect of which may be his entire ruin. Such a state of things as here brought about cannot be contemplated without the greatest regret.

The delay is not such as to deprive him of any right whatever.

NOTE.—By consent of the Defendants, the Plaintiff was discharged out of custody. Reg. Lib. 1840, A. fol. 1055.

[180] PRICE v. LOCKLEY. Feb. 17, 1843.

Bequest to A. for life, and after her decease to the testator's "four children, survivor or survivors of them equally, or to their heirs lawfully begotten." Of the four children died in the life of A. Held, that his children took one-third by way of substitution.

The testator, by his will dated in 1805, after giving certain legacies, proceeds as follows:—"All the residue and remainder of my money, and book debts, after payment of my just debts and funeral expenses, I will and order that the same shall be collected and placed in the public funds, for the use and behoof of my said wife and two said children Eliza and Joseph, during the term of my said wife's natural life so long as she shall remain my widow; and at the decease of my said wife, I will and bequeath the same to my said four children, the survivor or survivors of them, or to their heirs lawfully begotten. All the rest of my personal estate and effects of what nature or kind soever, I likewise give and bequeath to my said [181] wife during the term of her natural life, or so long as she shall remain my widow; and after her decease or second marriage, in either case, I will and order that the same shall be disposed of by sale, and money equally divided among my said four children or the survivor of them or their heirs as aforesaid. I likewise order that the sum of £30 hereinbefore mentioned for placing my son Joseph in apprenticeship shall be deducted from his share at the decease of my said wife."

The testator died in 1805.

The testator's son Joseph, afterwards assigned his share to Oliver James, and died in 1837, leaving five children. The testator's widow afterwards died in 1843.

The contest in this suit was whether Oliver James, or the five children of Joseph, were entitled to the one-fourth.

Mr. Rogers, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Koe, for Oliver James, contended that Joseph Price, upon surviving the testator, took a vested interest in one-fourth of the residue, and that it had passed by his assignment.

Mr. T. Parker, for the children of Joseph, contended that the true construction of the will was this: that, if the testator's four children survived the tenant for life, they would have taken absolutely between them, and that, on the death of any of the four children in the lifetime of the widow without children, the survivors would have taken, but if they left children, such children would take the share of their parent by substitution. That Joseph, therefore, had no interest which he could pass over to Oliver James.

[182] Mr. Parker, junior, for the administratrix of Joseph Price.

Mr. Stinton, for other parties.

Mr. Koe, in reply.

[183] BEARE v. PRIOR. (Ex relatione.) March 9, 1843.

Estate was conveyed by A. to B., upon trust, for ten years, to apply the rents in payment to B. of the interest and capital of £1000 lent by B. to A., and then to B. to pay off the residue of the £1000, and hold the remainder in trust for the life and children of A. The rents exceeded the interest. B. permitted A. to retain possession, and the interest was not applied as directed. Upon a bill by B. against A. and his wife and children for a sale: Held, that B. could not, until he took possession, be made liable for what, without his wilful default, he might have received, except upon a cross-bill raising that question.

On the marriage of the Defendant Henry Prior in 1819, an indenture was made, whereby, after reciting the intended marriage, and that Prater had agreed to lend Prior a sum of £1000, Prior covenanted to surrender certain copyholds to Prater, upon trust to apply the rents in payment, in the first instance, of the interest on the sum of £1000 and then to apply the surplus of the rents in reduction of the principal sum of £1000 till February 1829; and then, upon trust to sell and pay off the residue (if any) of the debt due on the mortgage, and invest the remainder of the proceeds in trust for the wife for life for her separate use, with remainder for the issue of the issue of the marriage.

The rents were more than sufficient to pay the interest. Prater was, in 1819, entitled to the copyholds.

On the 27th of February 1829 a memorandum was indorsed on the indenture of and signed by Henry Prior, stating that it was agreed that the sum of £1000 should continue upon mortgage for ten years longer.

Prater died, and, in 1840, his representatives filed this bill against Mr. and Mrs. Prior and their children, alleging that the whole sum of £1000 was still due with an interest, and praying for an account and for a sale of the mortgaged copyholds, and that the surplus might be invested upon the trusts of the indenture of February 1819.

[184] The Defendant Prior alleged, by his answer, that he had continued to pay the rents of the mortgaged hereditaments from 1819 until April 1840, when the representatives of Prater took possession; that, by the end of 1826, a sum of £300 part of the £1000 had been paid off out of the surplus rents, but that in 1819 Prater returned that sum to Prior, upon an agreement made between them, as expressed in the memorandum of 1829, that the whole £1000 should continue to be secured upon the mortgaged hereditaments.

Mr. Bacon appeared for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Twells, for the Defendants, contended that Prater, by accepting the trust deed of February 1819, had become bound to receive the rents of the hereditaments, and apply them in reduction of the £1000, and that if he had pursued that course, the whole, or nearly the whole, of the debt would now have been paid; and that, as the omission of Prater to do this amounted to a breach of trust, the representatives were not entitled to have the accounts taken in a more favourable manner than if such a breach of trust had never been committed. He then insisted that the Plaintiffs ought to account not only for what they or Prater actually received, but also for that which without his or their wilful default would have been received.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that from the time when the representatives entered into possession, they must account, in the usual manner, as mortgagees in possession, for the rents and profits which they had received, or which, without their wilful default, they might have received, but that the Court could not make the Plaintiffs responsible for the rents which might have been received by Prater while he was not in possession [185] of the mortgaged estates, unless upon a cross-bill to have the benefit of the trusts of the indenture of February 1819. As the case now stood, the Plaintiffs could only be made to account for what they actually received prior to their taking possession in 1840, and for what might have been received by them since that period.

[185] RICHARDSON v. HORTON. March 10, 13, 17, 1843.

A. and B. were obligors in a joint bond: A., who was alleged to be the principal, died. Held, that his assets were not in equity liable upon the bond, but that the liability survived to B.

On the 8th of May 1810 Sir Watts Horton and Thomas Horton executed a bond for £6000 to Messrs. Griffen & Leathes, subject to a condition for making the same void, if they, their heirs, executors, or administrators, or any of them should not pay Messrs. Griffen & Leathes the sum of £3000 and interest on the 6th of January 1811.

It was said by the Defendants, that Thomas Horton was only surety for Sir Watts Horton, but this did not appear by the bond.

Sir Watts Horton died in November 1811, leaving his co-obligor Thomas Horton surviving him.

By the decree made in January 1832 the Master was directed to take an account of the debts of Sir Watts Horton. By a separate report, dated the 27th of February 1842, the Master found that a sum of £3513, 4s. 1d. was due to the representatives of the obligees, for principal and interest on the said bond debt, and for their costs.

[186] Both parties took exceptions to the Master's report, which now came on for argument.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Walpole, for the representatives of Messrs. Griffen & Leathes.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Koe, for Defendants interested in the estate of Sir Watts Horton.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Rogers, for the Plaintiff.

Copis v. Middleton (Turner & R. 224) was cited.

March 17. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is objected to the Master's finding, that where two are jointly bound and one dies, the obligation survives to the surviving obligor; that no action can be maintained against the estate of the obligor who died first; and that, as an action cannot be maintained against the executors upon the bond, the bond cannot be the foundation of a claim to a specialty debt in equity.

In answer to this argument, it is not alleged, that there was any antecedent joint liability of Sir Watts Horton and Thomas Horton, or that there was any agreement for a joint and several bond, or any mistake in preparing the bond; but it said, that it could not have been intended to release Sir Watts who was the principal debtor, and his estate, if he happened to die first, and that therefore the bond ought to be considered as joint and several.

[187] I do not think that this argument can prevail. If the bond had been made joint and several, Thomas Horton might have been sued upon it alone in the lifetime of Sir Watts; and there seems to be no reason, even for conjecturing, that he would have consented to this, or to do more than make himself jointly liable; and if joint liability was the intention of the parties, nothing is now to be rectified or altered, and the legal consequences must follow. The obligation, by virtue of the joint bond, survived to the surviving obligor, and there was no legal remedy upon the assets of the deceased obligor. There may be a legal debt arising out of the contract against the assets of Sir Watts Horton, but if so, it will not be a debt upon the bond, and must be established by means other than the mere production of the bond. trustees are directed to invest trust money on Government or real securities, and they do neither, they are answerable, at the option of the cestuis que trust, either for the money or the stock which might have been purchased therewith. Husband and wife had a power to sell real estates, with the consent of the trustees; the monies were, with all convenient speed, to be laid out in the purchase of other lands; and until a convenient purchase could be effected, it was made lawful for the trustees, with the consent of the husband and wife, to invest the money in Government or real securities. A sale took place in 1811, and in 1816 the produce was lent by the trustees on personal security. Held, that the trustees were liable for the stock which the money would have produced in 1816. Held, also, that the trustees ought not to have consented to a sale without first providing the means of investing the purchase-money.

In this case land was vested in the trustees of a marriage settlement. The husband and wife, with the consent of the trustees, had power to sell the land, the money arising from the sale was, with all convenient speed, to be laid out in the purchase of other lands to be settled to the same uses, and, until a convenient purchase could be effected, it was made lawful for the trustees, with the consent of the husband and wife, to invest the money on Government or real securities.

The land was sold in the year 1811 for the sum of £2200, which was not laid out in the purchase of other land, or invested either upon Government or real securities, but, in the month of July 1816, it was lent to the husband on merely personal security.

The husband was unable to repay the money, but the full amount had now been paid by his sureties, and to this extent, the trustees had been relieved from their liability.

This bill was filed by the children of the marriage, and sought to charge the trustees with a breach of trust, and to make them responsible for the stock, which the money produced by the sale of the estate would have purchased at the time when it was received by the trustees.

[189] Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Hubback, for the Plaintiffs, the cestuis que trust, contended, that they were entitled to have made good so much Bank three per cent. annuities, as might have been purchased with the money at the time when it was received by the trustees, or at the time when they lent it to the husband on personal security.

Hockley v. Bantock (1 Russ. 141), Bateman v. Davis (3 Mad. 98), Cocker v. Quin (1 Russ. & M. 535), Dimes v. Scott (4 Russ. 195), Clough v. Bond (3 Myl. & Cr. 496).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. C. Bellamy, for the representatives of one of the trusts. Where trustees may invest in stock or on real security, and they lend on personal security, they shall be answerable for the principal money only, and not for the value of the stock which might have been purchased; Marsh v. Hunter (6 Mad. 295). The husband and wife had the power of electing whether the securities should be fluctuating, as the public funds, or invariable, as a mortgage. They have chosen the latter, and therefore the trustees are only liable for the fixed sum.

The trust for investment was not imperative; the trustees had no power to invest at all, except with the consent of the husband and wife, which they withheld; at all events, there was no breach of duty until 1816.

Mr. Drewry and Mr. Austen, for other parties.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. The object of the parties was to reinvest the money in land; the investment in the funds, or on real security, [190] was merely temporary and until the money could be invested in land. It seems obvious that the trustees ought not to have risked a conversion of land into money, without providing themselves with an authority which would enable them to invest and produce. That alone would make them responsible for the purchase-money arising from the sale, though it might not, perhaps, make them liable for the stock.

The trustees having placed themselves in a position in which their option could be exercised, it may be a question if they were not bound to make the investment in such a way as the Court would have directed.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Whether the trustees are to be charged with the money or stock is a question of great importance, and I will consider it.

No sale could have taken place without the consent of the trustees; and I do say that it was a proper exercise of the discretion of the trustees, to consent to a sale of the real estate, without knowing beforehand what was to be done with the purchase-money. By not making a provision for the reinvestment, the whole control was left in the hands of the tenant for life, who might exercise his power in such a way as to induce the trustees to commit a breach of trust.

MARCH 20. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. If trustees are directed to invest trust money on Government or real securities, and they do neither, I do conceive that they are answerable, at the option of the cestuis que trust, either for the sum which was to be invested, or for such amount of Bank three per cent. annuities as might have been purchased with the sum at the time when it ought to have been invested according to the trust.

In the present case, I think that, in a prudent execution of the trust, the cestuis que trust ought not to have consented to a sale, until they had first obtained the consent of the husband and wife, either to the purchase of other land, or to the investment of the purchase-money until other land could be conveniently purchased. The settlement, however, did not contain a plain direction for that purpose; the consent of the husband and wife not appearing to have been given, the trustees may have been under difficulties respecting the investment; and some time may have been improperly employed in endeavouring to obtain a proper real security. The circumstances are not explained; and during the time which elapsed between the receipt of the money and the loan to Mr. Watts, I do not think that there were sufficient grounds on which to charge the trustees with more than the amount of the money which they had received; but in lending the money to the husband without real security, they acted in direct violation of their duty, and committed a breach of trust; and for that breach of trust I think that they are answerable in the manner most beneficial to the cestuis que trust; upon that principle it appears that the Plaintiffs are entitled to have so much Bank three per cent. annuities as the sum of £2200 would have purchased on the 16th day of July 1816, when the money was lent to the husband.

[192] SELBY v. JACKSON. Jan. 24, 25, 28, 1843.

The Court, under the circumstances of the case, refused to set aside deeds executed by one under restraint in a lunatic asylum, under medical certificates.

Then a party, without authority, but bona fide, assumes the management of the property of one mentally incompetent, this Court will not, on his recovery, restore to him his property without making an equitable allowance for the expenses and liabilities.

In a bill seeking to set aside deeds in toto and praying no alternative relief, the Court will not, adversely, grant an account on the footing of their vitality.

The object of this bill was to set aside as void two deeds executed by the Plaintiff, on the ground that they were executed by the Plaintiff at a time when he was under confinement as a lunatic under the circumstances after stated.

No replication had been filed, and the cause came on upon bill and answer. The answer being thus admitted to be true in all points, it appeared that, in 1822, the Plaintiff commenced business as a wine and spirit merchant, and that in 1831 he introduced into this country a wine called Masdeu, which he imported to a great extent. The speculation did not succeed, and in 1839 the Plaintiff having a very large stock of this wine on hand, found himself embarrassed in his circumstances. He appeared about this time to have contemplated submitting to a bankruptcy, but was dissuaded therefrom by the Defendants, the brothers of his wife.

The difficulties under which the Plaintiff was suffering preyed upon his mind, and, towards the end of 1839, this, together with mental and bodily exertion, brought on a mental disorder, attended with delusions, and occasional paroxysms of violence. In this state of things the Defendants, the father and brothers of the Plaintiff's wife, out of kindness and regard, came forward to the assistance of the Plaintiff and his wife's family. The Plaintiff's state of mind at that time did not appear to be such as to totally disqualify him from attending to his concerns. In January 1840 meetings [193] of his creditors took place, with the view of making some arrangement of composition; but before their completion it became necessary to place the Plaintiff in a lunatic asylum under the care of Dr. Allen. The Plaintiff's malady, to some extent, yielded to the medical treatment and quietude, and in February Dr. Allen thought he might return to London for a short time, by way of trial, and he was accordingly brought to town by one of the Defendants, and resided with him about a month, and, during part of this time, he was perfectly rational and collected, and during those periods was consulted on the affairs of his business.

The improvement in the Plaintiff's state of health unfortunately was not lasting, and it became necessary, on the 7th of March, to replace him under the care of Dr. Allen, where he continued till July 1841.

The Defendants in the meantime proceeded to complete the arrangements with the Plaintiff's creditors, and, from time to time, communicated to the Plaintiff the progress of their arrangements. The creditors ultimately agreed to release their claims, on receiving portions of the wine stock, and upon the Defendants entering into their own personal liability to secure certain payments. On the 14th of May, before the arrangements had been completed, a statement of the Plaintiff's affairs, and a proposition of what was intended to be done were given to Dr. Allen, in order to be communicated to the Plaintiff.

On the 14th of May deeds were prepared for the purpose of carrying into effect the proposed arrangement with the Plaintiff's creditors, and, on the 1st of July 1840, notice of their intended execution was given to Dr. Allen.

[194] On the 4th of July the Defendants attended the Plaintiff, who was still in the lunatic asylum, with the deeds for his execution, and the Defendants, being assured by Dr. Allen that the Plaintiff was, in fact, during the transaction, in a rational and competent state of mind to execute the deeds, carefully read over the deeds to him in the presence of Dr. Allen and his medical assistant, and some alterations were made therein at the suggestion of the Plaintiff. The answer stated, that the Plaintiff fully understood the nature and effect of the said deeds, that he was fully competent to execute them, and was perfectly willing to do so. That he accordingly did execute the same, and in the presence of the two Defendants, his brothers-in-law, and of Dr. Allen and his assistant, who attested the execution thereof, and subscribed a certificate as follows, viz. :—"We hereby certify that the deed of assignment, bearing date the 20th day of May last was read over to Mr. Selby in our presence, he, at the same time, inspecting the deed of release of the same date. And we further certify that he fully understood the nature and effect of both instruments, and was perfectly willing and competent to execute them, and did so in our presence. As witness our hands this 4th day of July 1840."

The first of these deeds was a deed of composition between the Plaintiff and his creditors, whereby the latter accepted stock and promissory notes of the Defendant by way of composition for their debts.

By the second deed, the Plaintiff assigned the whole of his property to the Defendant, on trust to deliver to the creditors the stock agreed upon, and then to indemnify the Defendants from all liability under the composition deed, and pay the residue to the Plaintiff.

[195] The Defendants, the brothers-in-law, proceeded to carry the arrangement into execution, and they made the necessary advances to satisfy the creditors, and in this respect and in respect of their own debts a considerable sum became due, and was still owing to them.

On the 29th of July 1841 the Plaintiff was discharged from the lunatic asylum and a disagreement having taken place between him and the Defendants in consequence of the latter refusing for the present to permit the Plaintiff to interfere with the business until the matters had been more settled, the Plaintiff filed this bill insisting on the total invalidity of the deeds in question, and praying a declaration that the deeds so executed by the Plaintiff whilst under confinement for unsoundness of mind, were void and invalid, and that they might be set aside, and that the Defendants might account and answer for their wilful default.

The bill did not allege any fraud or contrivance on the part of the Defendants or that they were in any way actuated by considerations of personal benefit, and the bill contained no allegation that the arrangement was injurious to the Plaintiff.

The bill alleged, "that at the time of the execution of the deeds, the Plaintiff had his arms confined, and so fettered as to be unable to do any injury to himself or others, and just before being taken into the room where the Defendants were, his right arm was unfettered, but one or more keepers were, at the time aforesaid, in attendance; that in this condition he was requested to read the said deeds, which he accordingly read, but he had no certain recollection of the effect thereof, except that he understood that the object of the said deeds was to enable the said Defendants Andrew Jackson and John [196] Reid Jackson to manage the Plaintiff's affairs and to carry on his business of a wine and spirit merchant during the continuance of his malady, or if thought requisite, to wind up the said business, and to satisfy all claims and demands in respect of the same upon or against the Plaintiff. That the Plaintiff read over the said deeds in the presence of the said Defendants and Dr. Allen and Thomas Appleton Nowell Preston, and suggested some alterations therein, and that the same were, or was, altered according to his said suggestion, and that as so altered he was requested to execute the same (but what the nature of such alterations was, the Plaintiff was wholly unable to recollect). That the Plaintiff, being under the impression and understanding that the said deeds were intended only for the object and purposes last thereinbefore in that behalf mentioned, consented to execute the said deeds, and he accordingly did execute the same on or about the said 30th day of June 1848, and that immediately after the said deeds were executed by him, and on his removal to his own apartment, the restraints or fetters were replaced upon his right hand." On these allegations, and upon the allegation of mismanagement of the business by the Defendants, which, however, was denied, the Plaintiff seemed to rest his case.

With regard to the fetters, the answer stated, that the Plaintiff during his confinement in Dr. Allen's establishment had been subject to violent paroxysms, and vinced a tendency to self-injury and violence, and that the Defendants had been informed and verily believed, that the Plaintiff, at his intervals of reason, had the impression of such affliction, and did occasionally, fearing a sudden return thereof, request his arms or hands to be secured. The Defendants also said, they believed that at the time they visited him with the deeds, "the Plaintiff, under [197] the circumstances thereinbefore appearing had, as the Defendants best recollected, and believed, his left arm partially confined by a leathern belt, but that he had not otherwise his arms confined and so fettered as to be unable to do any injury to himself and others." They said they were informed and believed, that it had been, as thereinbefore appeared, the Plaintiff's custom occasionally to have his arms confined: that on the circumstances aforesaid, they entertained no doubts, though they could not state the same of their own knowledge, that the Plaintiff had, at his own request, on a day in the bill mentioned, before the Plaintiff went into the room where the Defendant J. Jackson was with the deeds, his left arm confined in manner before mentioned. They said they believed, that at such time, there was not the slightest reason for any such restraint or precaution.

It appeared from the answer that on the same day on which these deeds were executed, the Plaintiff executed an indenture of apprenticeship of his son.

The cause now came on for hearing, when

Mr. Selby, in person, insisted on the total invalidity of the deeds in question. He argued that having been executed by him at a time when he was in confinement under medical certificates of his lunacy, and when he was not a free agent but in others, the same were in law wholly void.

He imputed no fraud to the Defendants, but complained of their injudicious course of management of the property.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Rogers, contra, contended that it appeared from the answer, which must be taken [198] to be true, that the Plaintiff was, at the time of the execution of the deeds, competent to understand and did understand their nature and effect. That it was an act of the greatest prudence, and that the Defendants were actuated by no personal motives in bringing about the arrangements. That they had incurred liabilities in order to affect the arrangement for the benefit of the Plaintiff, and though they were perfectly willing to account for their acts under the deeds, they submitted that the deeds ought not to be set aside without providing indemnity for all that they had properly done, and for what they had expended for the Plaintiff's benefit. That if the transaction were to be set aside in toto, the Defendants were entitled to stand in the place of the creditors to the full amount of their debts.

Mr. Selby, in reply.

Jan. 28. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case the Plaintiff by his bill prays, that certain deeds which are dated the 20th of May 1840, which he says were executed by him whilst under confinement for unsoundness of mind, were and are as against him invalid and void, and ought to be set aside. The rest of the prayer is for consequential relief.

By the deeds in question the property of the Plaintiff was assigned to two of the Defendants, and he seeks the relief which is asked for by this bill, on the ground that he was induced to execute the deeds whilst he was confined in a lunatic asylum, under medical certificates that he was a proper subject for such confinement—that his state of mind was such, that his person was fettered for the purpose of preventing him from doing injury to himself and [199] others—that he was required to execute and to execute the deeds in the presence of his keepers, and was, for the occasion, totally relieved from his fetters with an intent which was carried into effect, of his being immediately afterwards subjected to the former constraint.

The circumstances thus alleged are no doubt very important, and of themselves strongly calculated to invalidate the deeds; but when this Court is called on to set aside deeds, all the circumstances under which they were executed must be taken into consideration. In this case it is very remarkable that there is no allegation of fraud against the Defendants or any of them, no pretence that coercion was used, or any stratagem or any contrivance employed, to compel or induce the Plaintiff to do any act in any way tending to the personal benefit of any of the Defendants. There is no pretence of any imposition—no allegation that the Plaintiff had not the means of understanding and was not capable of understanding the effect of that which he did. The Plaintiff so far from alleging that the act done was injurious to him or contrary to his interest at the time, or from insinuating that it was intended otherwise than for the benefit of himself and his family, has, at the Bar, frankly and no doubt properly and truly stated, that the Defendants were actuated by motives only of kindness towards himself and his family: that the act done, namely, the execution of the deeds, was, at the time, an act of the highest prudence and greatly to his advantage, and that all that the Plaintiff has since disapproved of, has arisen, not from any desire to injure the Plaintiff, but, as he alleges, from want of judgment, knowledge, and experience, in carrying on the Plaintiff's business; and the Plaintiff's principal ground of complaint, which he has repeatedly referred to, is his exclusion from the personal management of the business.

[200] The question however is, whether under all the circumstances of this case the Court is to set aside the deeds. The Plaintiff may undoubtedly be entitled to relief or to an account under the deeds supposing them not to be set aside, but such an alternative relief is even asked for in this case.

As the Plaintiff has not replied to the Defendants' answer, the answer is the only evidence in the cause—and the Defendants having been precluded by the Plaintiff from every opportunity of examining witnesses, the statements which are made in their answer must be taken to be, in all respects, true, so far as they are consistent with themselves.

Now what do the facts appear to be? [His Lordship referred to the facts of the case as appeared from the answer, and which it is not necessary to repeat.]

It is unnecessary to state the deeds further than this, that they appear manifestly and plainly to have been, what the Plaintiff himself had called them, deeds which were executed with the highest sense of prudence. He was manifestly in such a state of embarrassment in his affairs, in addition to the condition of his mind, which most probably had become unsettled by the difficulties in which he was placed by nothing else, that it was utterly impossible for him to proceed. He was insolvent, and as the Defendants state in this answer, deficient to the amount of seven thousand pounds. The arrangement consisted of a settlement with his creditors by the payment of a composition, the greater part of which was secured by his personal obligation and liability of the Defendants Mr. James Jackson and John Reid Jackson; by taking upon themselves that personal responsibility, they relieved him entirely from the [201] pressure of his creditors beyond his family, and they then, at their personal risk and liability, obtained a release for his benefit. In order to afford them an indemnity, which formed a part of their arrangement all through, it was agreed that he should assign his estate and effects to them, that they should apply the proceeds of it for their indemnity, after paying the proper expenses, and when their indemnity had been secured, they were to stand possessed of the whole surplus in trust for the Plaintiff. So that having gratuitously secured him the benefit obtained by means of their own personal liability, all that they asked in return was, that they should be indemnified in respect of that liability out of the property which he at that time possessed.

The question is this, are these deeds to be simply set aside, are these gentlemen to be left with the advances they have made upon the settlement with the Plaintiff's creditors uncovered and entirely at the mercy of the Plaintiff? Is he to be put into the absolute and uncontrolled possession of the property which remains, by setting aside these deeds? And is everything which has been done for his benefit upon this occasion to be entirely undone? The proposition, I must confess, seems to me to be of a very extraordinary nature. I can hardly believe from what I have seen of the Plaintiff on this occasion, who has conducted his own case not only with ability, with a very considerable and laudable degree of candour, that a gentleman who manifested the moral feeling as well as the ability he has done on this occasion, seriously mean that which this bill purports to aim at, namely, to take to himself the whole property, and the whole benefit which his relations have conferred upon him by their own personal liability, and leave them wholly unpaid and without remedy whatever. This, however, being manifestly the [202] purport of this it is sufficient for me to say, that it is not a proceeding which this Court can sanction.

It must be admitted, that the Defendants did an act which can by no means be considered consistent with legal prudence; an act which exposed them to very considerable hazard, which made it incumbent on them to shew, at any time when they were called upon to do so, that their proceedings were entirely fair and disinterested, that there was not the slightest personal interest to be obtained, that there was not the smallest imposition practised on the other party. They placed themselves in a position which disentitled them to the ordinary presumptions which are given in the general transactions of mankind. The Plaintiff being in confinement under medical certificates justifying his being confined as a lunatic, and being at the same time under personal constraint, the burden of proof was thrown upon those who dealt with him; the Defendants are not, as I said before, entitled to the ordinary presumptions in their favour. But when the matter comes to be investigated, and it turns out that they have acted fairly and disinterestedly for the benefit of their relation, that they have sought no benefit for themselves, that they have done for him alone an act which was of the highest prudence, I say the deeds, and the circumstances under which the deeds were executed, become of comparatively trifling importance.

If they had assumed the management of this gentleman's property without any aid or anything of the kind, it would have been a very hazardous act; but if they had assumed the management of his affairs at a time when he was incompetent to manage them himself, this Court, at least, would then have taken into consideration the circumstances under which they did it, would have investigated with minuteness, and would in their [203] favour have considered the prudence and propriety of their conduct, and would not, when this gentleman recovered the possession of his reason, have taken from them the property which remained in their hands, without making them an equitable allowance for the expenses and liabilities to which they had subjected themselves for his benefit.

It is scarcely necessary for me to proceed further. It is very true that the presumptions against these Defendants are increased, in consequence of the state of this gentleman having been such as to prolong his confinement for a very considerable time after the date of the execution of these deeds. He was not released till a year afterwards, in the month of July 1841; his business was in the meantime carried on by the Defendants; and when this gentleman was released, he naturally and properly had a great anxiety to know the state of his affairs. He had naturally (but whether properly or not depends on other circumstances), a great desire to be restored to the full control and management of his property. If he had desired to be restored to the full control and management of the property, for the purpose of working out that which was to secure the residue to himself, it would have been quite well. He interfered, however, in a manner which interrupted the business as then carried on by the trustees.

The Defendants were trustees only for the benefit of Mr. Selby, and were accountable to him for the surplus, after indemnifying themselves; he had therefore a clear right to call them, and to keep them closely to account. He had the surplus interest, they had the interest to indemnify themselves, he had therefore a right to call upon them to account, but they, in the meantime, had the right to control and manage the property [204] for their interest and indemnity, provided they did it in such a way as was consistent with his ultimate interest. If they failed in that respect, Mr. Selby had a perfect right to call them to account, and might have filed a bill, not like this bill to set aside the deeds, but a bill, stating that these gentlemen who, subject to their right to indemnity, were trustees for him, were not carrying on the business in proper manner, and desiring the assistance and control of this Court to compel them to do so. If he could sustain his case by evidence, this Court would necessarily have interfered for his protection, and would not have permitted the trustees, because they had a personal interest for their own indemnity, to carry it on in such a way as would be injurious to their cestui que trust.

There is no such relief sought by this bill, the sole object aimed at by it is, to set aside the deeds, and to leave these gentlemen without any protection at all for the advances they have made, or even for the payment of the composition on their own respective debts.

Under these circumstances I confess that I do not think the Plaintiff is entitled to any such relief as is sought for by this bill. Being, as I think entitled, if he think fit, to have an account of the receipts and payments of these gentlemen in the execution of their trusts, he must be under the necessity of filing another bill, unless the Defendants, by arrangement and for the purpose of getting rid of what I think is a troublesome business for them, will consent to have an account taken in this case; otherwise I must dismiss this bill.

Affirmed by the Lord Chancellor, 31st of January 1844.

[205] FULLER v. KNIGHT. Jan. 26, 27, Feb. 28, 1843.

A trustee cannot, by contract, waive his right to resort to the life interest of a tenant for life, for the purpose of replacing a trust fund, which, in breach of trust, he lent to the tenant for life.

A trustee, in breach of trust, lent the trust fund to A. B., the tenant for life. The trustee afterwards concurred in a creditor's deed, by which A. B.'s life interest was to be applied in payment of his debts, and the trustee received thereunder a debt due to him from A. B. Before the other creditors had been paid, the trustee retained the income to make good the breach of trust. Held, upon a bill filed by the trustees of the creditor's deed, that this Court would not prevent such application.

By a settlement made in 1795, on the marriage of the Defendant Charles Fuller with Jane his wife, two sums of £20,000, and £16,000 consols were vested in trust upon trust for the husband for life, with remainder to the wife for life, with remainder to the issue of the marriage, with remainder on certain trusts, under which the husband was entitled to a contingent reversionary interest in a portion of the fund.

[206] In 1805 the trustees of the marriage settlement committed a breach of trust, by lending £9000 (the produce of £15,517 consols part of the trust fund) to the husband, on the security of certain leasehold property.

In 1816 Charles Fuller, the husband, executed a creditor's deed, whereby his interest in the leaseholds and under the marriage settlement, including the £9000 besides other property, were assigned to trustees for the payment of certain debts.

The Defendant Robert Knight, the surviving trustee of the marriage settlement, was one of the creditors of Charles Fuller, the tenant for life, whose debt was provided for by the creditor's deed.

Robert Knight concurred in that deed, and received his debt thereunder. He had lately and before the trust of the creditor's deed had been fully carried into execution, commenced proceedings by ejectment to recover the possession of the leasehold premises, and he threatened to apply the life interest of the tenant for life in reparation of the breach of trust, alleging that the leasehold security was inadequate.

The trustees of the creditor's deed, who were also unsatisfied creditors under the deed, thereupon filed this bill against Robert Knight and Mr. and Mrs. Fuller, praying to have the trusts of the creditor's deed carried into execution, and that the rents and interest on the trust funds and securities might be applied in payment of the monies thereby secured, and that Knight might be restrained from interfering therewith, and particularly with the rents of the leasehold property.

The only issue of the marriage had died without acquiring any interest in the trust funds, so that, subject [207] to the very remote contingency of issue of the marriage being born, Mr. and Mrs. Fuller were the only persons interested in the trust funds, but the interest of Mrs. Fuller therein was reversionary.

The Defendant Knight, by his answer, submitted, that it was his duty to receive the rents of the leasehold property and the interest of the settlement funds, and to apply the same towards replacing and making good the £15,517 consols lent to the Defendant Charles Fuller, the tenant for life, on the security of the leaseholds, which had become an insufficient security; and he submitted, that it was his duty as trustee of the said settlement, or at least, so far as he was trustee for the said Jane Fuller, to enforce his said claim against the Plaintiffs, as well as against Charles Fuller, notwithstanding he might have joined and concurred, as a creditor of the said Charles Fuller in the deed of 1816; for the Defendant was advised, that his joining therein as such creditor could not exonerate or preclude him from performing his duty as a trustee of the settlement of 1795.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Wood, for the Plaintiffs. The Defendant, Mr. Knight, having concurred in the creditor's deed and accepted the benefit of the trusts, has contracted for the application of the rents and profits in the manner thereby pointed out. He cannot, for the purpose of relieving himself from the responsibility he has incurred, insist on the application of the income in any other way, until the other creditors have been fully paid.

The husband and wife being of advanced age, and there being no issue, and no persons interested in the fund except themselves, there is not the remotest chance [208] of the trustees being exposed to any liability in respect of the breach of trust.

Both husband and wife are desirous that the former application of the income should be continued.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Shapter, for the Defendant Knight. This Court will not permit trustees to do an act which would be a breach of trust; Mortlock v. Buller 10 Ves. 292 and Wood v. Richardson, 4 Beavan, 174). So it will not order a trustee to abstain from an act which would repair a breach of trust already committed; it will not sanction an arrangement by which a trustee lessens the security of his cestui que trust. Here the interest of the tenant for life is primarily liable to replace the stock, and the cestui que trust will be left to the personal responsibility of the trustees, if this Court should prevent the Defendant's replacing the fund by means of the life-estate. The wife has but a reversionary interest in a chose in action. She is therefore incapable of binding it; and notwithstanding any act she may now do, she might the next day file a bill against the trustee for the restitution of the fund.

There is no estoppel in such a case as this; Fairtitle v. Gilbert (2 Term. Rep. 171), Appendix v. Burgess (4 East, 230).

Mr. Hoare, for Mrs. Fuller, supported the Plaintiff's case.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case, the circumstances and the relief sought are very peculiar. The bill asks that the indenture of [209] 1816 may be executed, and that the income of the trust property may be applied under the trusts of that deed. The Defendant Knight, against whom this prayer is directed, insists, that he has a right to apply that income towards the reparation of the breach of trust, in which he was led to join at the request of the Defendant Mr. Fuller.

The facts are shortly these:—Mr. Knight and other persons were trustees of the marriage settlement of Mr. and Mrs. C. Fuller of two sums of £20,000 and £16,000 stock. The settlement contained a power to sell the stock and lay out the money in the purchase of freehold estates. Unfortunately, in the year 1805, the sum of £15,517 stock was sold out, and produced a sum of £9000, which, instead of being properly laid out on freeholds, was lent to Charles Fuller on the security of his leasehold estates.

It is not denied that this was a breach of trust, and that the persons beneficially interested in this sum had a right to call on the trustees, at any time to make good the amount of stock sold out. Knight is the surviving trustee of the settlement, and he is subject to the liability. Under the circumstances which have taken place, Mrs. Fuller, the cestui que trust, having a reversionary interest in this property, an interest which she is incapable of dealing with, and cannot deprive herself of, has a power to enforce the right of having the breach of trust remedied according to the rules of this Court, and this has been the state of things since 1805.

In 1816 Charles Fuller, the tenant for life of the property, being indebted to several persons, executed the deed now in question; it was made between Charles Fuller of the first part, Richard Fuller and George [210] Fuller and Joseph Fuller of the second part, and several persons whose names are in the schedule of the third part. Knight's name occurs in the schedule, and he was a creditor who consented to be paid under the arrangement of the deed. The deed, so far as it is necessary to state it, recited the settlement, the subsequent transaction which is admitted to be a breach of trust, and the proposed arrangement for the benefit of the creditors; and the effect of that deed was to assign other property of C. Fuller and his life interest in the trust property to trustees, to be applied, in the way stated, in liquidation of the debts; this deed is sought to be enforced by this bill.

What is alleged by the Plaintiffs is this, that Knight being a creditor and party to the deed, has so far authorised and directed the application of the income of the trust property to the purpose mentioned in the deed, that he has no right to resort to the interest of Charles Fuller, for the purpose of performing the trusts of the settlement, and for repairing the breach of trust which had been committed.

It is admitted, and properly admitted, that the income of the husband ought to be applied in making good the breach of trust, and it is admitted that Mrs. Fuller, she thought fit, might file a bill by a next friend to have it so applied; but this bill, proposing to leave nothing but the personal liability of Knight for the reparation of the breach of trust, seeks to withdraw the liability of the life-estate, and thereby materially diminish the security of the cestui que trust.

The answer attempted to be given is this:—It is not proposed to deprive Mrs. Fuller of her right to file a bill for reparation of the breach of trust, and [211] decrees may be now made without prejudice to that right. It is said that Knight is a man of property, and well able to replace the fund, but it is forgotten that we are to look at the situation of the persons concerned, and that this Court must act on general principles.

What is asked is this, that the trustee shall be prevented applying the life-estate in making good the breach of trust; and thus leave to chance the reparation of the breach of trust, by confining the remedy to the personal liability of the trustee of the estates of the deceased trustee.

I cannot reconcile myself to the notion that this is a course which this Court could pursue. The Court, being apprised that a breach of trust has been committed, and that the trustee is desirous of repairing it, is required, for the benefit of all persons, to prevent his doing so, to withdraw the substantial means of repairing the breach of trust, and to leave the wife, who is now under the dominion of her husband, to her remedy against the trustees.

The question really comes to this, whether the trustee has done, or could do, what would be allowed by this Court to do an act which would fetter his power of performing his duty. His first obligation was to perform the trusts; he had erred in committing a breach of trust, and the instant he found he had done so, was it not his duty to repair it? And could he be permitted, in violation of his duty, to do an act for his personal benefit by which he deprived himself of the power of performing his duty?

I have no recollection of any such case as this; at the same time it does seem to me, that even if the trustee [212] had entered into a direct covenant, these Plaintiffs would not be permitted to require him to perform it, if it appeared that by the performance the security of the cestui que trust would be lessened.

There is another point. This gentleman is a mortgagee of the leaseholds, and supposing he is not entitled to what I think he is, namely, to have the fund restored out of the life interest, is he not entitled to make what he can of the mortgage-estate, and to know the extent of his liability?

Mr. Kindersley. I admit I cannot restrain the Defendant's rights as a mortgagee.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I confess I cannot see my way to granting the relief asked, except by arrangement. It would be a matter of the most serious consequence to cestui que trust, if it were once held that a trustee could bargain away the power which is absolutely necessary for the performance of erty, and that he could give up that power by contract or by incurring a personal liability.

If no arrangement can be made, the bill must be dismissed.

The cause stood over, in the hope that some arrangement might be come to between the parties.

[213] JOPE v. MORSHEAD. Jan. 27, 28, 1843.

independently of the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 85, this Court has no jurisdiction to direct the partition of copyholds, nor of customary freeholds.

In a bill for a partition, when there is a small failure in proof of title, or when the shares of the parties are alone doubtful, the Court will grant an inquiry: but where there is a material omission in the proof of the Plaintiff's title, the bill will be dismissed with costs. This course was pursued, though the Plaintiff had recovered in ejectment a portion of the estate from the Defendant, it not appearing what were the circumstances of that proceeding, or whether the Plaintiff's title, as alleged, was herein proved.

The object of this suit was to obtain a partition of some property in Cornwall of tenure of customary freehold.

The Plaintiff alleged himself to be entitled to thirteen-ninetieths of the property, owner of three unexpired terms of 500 years, of 400 years, and of ninety-nine years determinable on lives. The first term was created in 1760; the second was a mortgage term for securing £20,000, derived out of the former, and was created in 1773, and the third term was created in 1798. The Plaintiff, by his bill, traced at length the devolution of these terms until they became vested in himself; and he alleged that the term of 400 years had long since, by lapse of time and otherwise, become irredeemable, and that the Plaintiff had become legally entitled to all the beneficial interest therein.

The Plaintiff, in 1837, recovered thirteen-ninetieths from the Defendant Grigg by ejectment, but the circumstances of that proceeding did not appear, or in what way the title of the Plaintiff was, upon that occasion, made out.

The Plaintiff, at the hearing, failed in establishing the devolution of the terms, and in shewing that they were legally vested in him.

The bill was filed in 1840, and therefore the recent statute did not apply. (1)

[214] Mr. Turner and Mr. Collins, for the Plaintiff. The statute of 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 85 (which passed the 21st June 1841), though inapplicable to the present case, shews, not that the Court has no jurisdiction to direct a partition of copyholds, but merely that "doubts were entertained whether by the practice of such Courts, the same can now be obtained." There are however authorities in support of the jurisdiction, as Dodson v. Dodson (2 Watkins on Copyholds, 123, n.; 1 Scriven (3d ed.), 123, n. (e)), Treherne v. Nash (Seton on Decr. 189).

If the title has not been fully proved, the Plaintiff is entitled to an enquiry before the Master as to his interest, as was done in Agar v. Fairfax (17 Ves. 533)

(1) 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 85, by which it is enacted, "That from and after the passing of this Act, it shall be lawful for any Court of Equity, in any suit to be hereafter instituted therein for the partition of lands of copyhold or customary tenure, to make the like decree for ascertaining the rights of the respective parties to the suit in such lands, and for the issue of a commission for the partition of the same lands, and the allotment, in severalty, of the respective shares therein, as according to the practice of such Court, may now be made with respect to lands of freehold tenure."

The Plaintiff has recovered the thirteen-ninetieths from the Defendant Grigg in the action of ejectment; Grigg, therefore, cannot set up a want of title in the Plaintiff.

Mr. Teed and Mr. Nevinston, for the Defendant Morsehead, did not object to the relief prayed.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Speed, for the Defendant Grigg. The Plaintiff has wholly failed in making out any title to the property; he is not therefore entitled to a relief or any enquiry. (Marten v. Whitchel, Cr. & Ph. 257.) To obtain a partition of freeholds, a Plaintiff must both allege and prove a clear and distinct title to the portion of the estate [215] claimed by him; a litigated or ambiguous title is insufficient. Cartwright v. Pultney (2 Atk. 380); in which case the title made by the original bill being suspicious, the bill was dismissed with costs. The reason requiring such strictness in the title is obvious; the title of the Defendant, after partition, would depend on the validity of the conveyance from the Plaintiff, and therefore on his title to convey. The Defendant might make a valid conveyance of his interest to the Plaintiff, and receive an invalid title in return.

A Court of Equity has no jurisdiction to decree the partition of copyholds: S v. Fawcett (1 Dick. 299), Horncastle v. Charlesworth (11 Sim. 315; 1 Mad. Pr. (2d ed. 248), Co. Litt. 187, a., note 2, Coke, Copyholder. It would be interfering with the rights of the lord in his absence, by dividing his tenements, altering the accustomed rents and services, and forcing upon him a different tenant. There cannot, for these reasons, be a partition without the intervention of the lord: Oakeley v. Smith (1 Eden, 261).

Copyholds are not within the Statutes of Partition (31 H. 8, c. 1, 32 H. 8, c. 8 & 9 W. 3, c. 31, 3 & 4 Anne, c. 18), Scriven on Copyholds (vol. i. p. 106, note 3d edit.), nor are customary tenements, Burrell v. Dodd (3 Bos. & P. 378), the freehold of which is in the lord, Stephenson v. Hill (3 Burr. 1273), and which fall within the same consideration as copyholds: Doe d. Reay v. Huntington (4 East, 271).

In North v. Guinan (1 Beat. 342) Sir A. Hart held that there could be no partition of leaseholds for years.

[216] The recovery by ejectment in no way proves the Plaintiff's title, nor does it appear that the title now set up by the Plaintiff was ever litigated in that proceeding. The title alleged by the Plaintiff is that of a mortgagee of the 400 years' term. Such an interest cannot, in the absence of the mortgagor, be made the foundation of a decree for a partition.

Mr. Bacon, for a mortgagee of Grigg's share, opposed the partition.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

The jurisdiction of this Court in cases of partition is quite independent of the statutes. Scott v. Fawcett, Oakeley v. Smith, and Horncastle v. Charlesworth, were cases of copyholds, and not of customary freeholds, and they are opposed to Dodson v. Dodson and Treherne v. Nash.

North v. Guinan was a different case from the present; there there was a tenant subject to covenants, and the Court would not direct a partition which would have involved the commission of a waste and have prejudiced the landlord.

The Plaintiff has an equitable title, which for the present purpose is sufficient. Cartwright v. Pultney (2 Atk. 380).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case there is really no proof at all of the facts alleged in the bill as constituting the Plaintiff's title, and the facts if true are easy of proof.

This is a bill for a partition, and a party who is tenant in common or joint-tenant of freehold property has a right [217] to a decree for a partition upon proving his title; but in this case two objections have been raised:—First, that the suit relates to customary freeholds, and that the Court has no jurisdiction to order their partition; and secondly, that even if the subject be one over which the Court can exercise jurisdiction, still that the Plaintiff has not proved his title. This property seems clearly to be of the tenure of customary freehold, and I have always understood that the Court has constantly declined directing a partition of copyholds and, for similar reasons, of customary freeholds. Two cases have been produced; they may be consistent with the general rule if there had been both freeholds and copyholds to vided, and the Court had directed such a partition, as to give the entire copyhold to one party, and the freehold or a part of the freehold to the other.(1)

[218] It is said, that although the property is customary freehold, yet the case is tended with circumstances which make it proper to have a partition; and it is held that the Defendant ought to have stated express circumstances which would relude the Plaintiff's right thereto. It appears, however, to me that if the Plaintiff relies on his case being an exception to the general rule, it is his duty to allege and set out the circumstances under which he is entitled to the exception.

The next objection to this bill is, that the Plaintiff has not made out his title. It has been admitted that the title is not fully made out; but it is alleged that it is far made out, that this Court will afford the Plaintiff an opportunity to enable him to complete the proof of his title, and that there are instances in which the Court is allowed a Plaintiff so to do. I can conceive that where there has been a small omission, the Defendant would scarcely object to the Plaintiff's having an opportunity to supply it; and I can conceive that the Court, seeing a slight omission or error in the proof, would say that such an objection shall not prevail, and that an opportunity must be given to supply the defect. Though instances have occurred in which the Court has given the Plaintiff an opportunity to complete his title, it is my opinion that a Plaintiff who brings forward his case imperfectly, is not, as of right, entitled to such an indulgence at the expense of a delay to all the other parties. It has been supposed that it was almost of course to refer the matter to the Master, and reference has been made to the cases in which it was done, but the cases only go to this:—That if it appears that the parties to the cause are entitled to the estate between them, but the shares are uncertain, the Court will, almost of course, direct an inquiry before the Master as to their respective interests; but that is for the common benefit of all.

[219] The Plaintiff, it is plain, must make out his title, because he calls on the Defendant to accept a legal conveyance in exchange. If he proves no title he is not entitled to a partition. Here the Plaintiff has undertaken to make out his title to thirteen-ninetieths of the property, but has failed.

It is said that he has recovered judgment at law; but under what circumstances does not appear. I collect that the Defendant was in possession of the entirety, and that the Plaintiff recovered thirteen-ninetieths. It does not, however, appear, whether, in that proceeding, the Plaintiff proved his title or if the case was ever tried.

The Plaintiff has failed here for want of proof of title; and I think this case must, therefore, in its result, be treated as in the nature of a non-suit. He has failed in proving his title; but it has not been proved that he has none.

(1) The following was a case of this description:—

Dillon v. Coppin. June 28, 1833.

In a suit previous to the 4 & 5 Vic. c. 35, s. 85, for a partition of freeholds and copyholds, the Court directed the copyholds to be allotted in entirety to one of the parties.

The freehold and copyhold estates of the intestate, Mr. Plura, had descended to three coparceners.

The Plaintiff, being one of such coparceners, filed this bill against the other two, for a partition of all these estates; and the Defendants, by their answer, objected that the Court had no jurisdiction to make a partition of the copyholds.

Mr. James Campbell, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Beavan, for the Defendants.

Sir John Leach, M. R., to obviate the objection, directed a commission "to divide the freehold and copyhold estates and premises in question into three equal parts," &c., and ordered "that the copyhold part of the estate should be allotted in entirety to one of the said parties." (Reg. Lib. 1832, A. fol. 2179.)

R. II.—26*

The bill must, therefore, be dismissed with costs, but without prejudice to the Plaintiff's filing a new bill.

[220] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE CORPORATION OF SHREWSBURY.
Feb. 17, 18, May 1, 1843.

The Crown, in consideration of the past services of the town, the situation and importance of the place, the injury and damage to be expected from the King's encroachment from the current of water, and from the traffic on the bridges, and the ruin likely to take place, if the means of repairing were not provided, granted certain tolls to the Corporation of Shrewsbury, to be applied in reparation of the bridges and without yielding any account or reckoning thereof. Held, that the grant was made to the corporation for its own benefit only, as a reward for prior service, that it was the duty of the corporation to apply so much of the receipts as might be required for the purposes stated :—That this was a gift for a public and general purpose for the benefit of the town, in aid of a general charge or burden to which the burgesses and inhabitants of the town were liable, and that it was a gift for charitable uses under the statute of Elizabeth, and was therefore subject to the jurisdiction of this Court.

This information prayed for a declaration, that a sum of £2176, 17s. 5d. stock which had arisen from the sale of certain tolls belonging to the corporation, was part of the capital stock of the Corporation of Shrewsbury, and that the dividends and produce thereof were applicable, in the first instance, in and towards the repair and support of the bridge called the Welch Bridge, and also of another bridge called the English Bridge, and also those parts of the walls of the town which now remain and required support ; and that the capital stock was not applicable towards the current expenses of the corporation, nor towards the payment of any debts incurred subsequently to the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act. The information further prayed for an injunction to restrain the corporation from applying the stock in a manner inconsistent with the right alleged by the information.

The sum of £2176, 17s. 5d., 3 per cent. annuities, which was in question in the suit, arose from the investment of a sum of £2000, which, in the year 1792, was received by the Corporation of Shrewsbury as the consideration for the release of certain tolls, to which the corporation was entitled under several charters from the Crown.

[221] The principal questions were, first, whether those tolls were held by the corporation subject to a charitable trust to be executed in this Court ; and if so, secondly, whether the stock in question was now held subject to the same charitable trust.

The town of Shrewsbury was held of the Crown at a fee-farm rent and by fealty and by a grant dated the 22d of September in the forty-first year of the reign of King Henry III., the custom, formerly granted for the amendment of the walls of the town from things coming to the town for sale, was continued to the end of a term of seven years. By another grant dated the 12th of February in the twelfth year of King Edward I., after reciting a former grant of the 15th of March, of the reign of King Edward I., whereby in aid of repairing and amending the Welch Bridge, the corporation were, for three years, to take by the hands of persons in whom they could confide, and for whom they would be willing to account, from things for sale coming to the town, the several customs therein mentioned :—it was granted, that after the expiration of the three years, the corporation might take by the hands of those in whom they might confide, and for whom they would be willing to answer, in aid of the repair of the Welch Bridge, and also of paying the town, the customs aforesaid, unto the end of five years from thence next following.

By a mandate or precept directed to the Lord Chancellor by King Richard II. the 4th of June in the 15th year of his reign, after referring to a former grant of the custom of murage from his liege men passing by the town with their merchandizes or three years which were nearly run out, in aid of the inclosure of the walls and repair of the bridges and gates of the town, it was recited, that on the application of the burgesses, the [222] king had granted to them the same custom of murage for four years from the feast of St. John the Baptist next coming, for the safety of the town and in aid of the inclosure of the walls and repair of the bridges and gates hereof, and of other the necessary occasions for the defence of the town; so always, that the profits arising from the same custom were employed about the works aforesaid, and thereupon the Chancellor was commanded to cause letters to be made under the Great Seal; and letters patent, dated the 20th day of the same month of June, were accordingly made.

The next charter was one dated the 6th of November in the 7th year of King Henry IV., and thereby, in consideration that the town was situate near Wales, on account whereof it required to be fortified and strengthened, the better to resist the king's enemies; it was granted, that in aid of the fortification of the town and repair of the walls of the same, the corporation, from the date of the grant unto the end of three years, should take from things for sale coming to the town by land or by water, any good, sufficient, lawful and faithful men, whom for that purpose they should order to be deputed, and for whom they should be willing to answer, the custom therein particularly mentioned; and it was commanded, that the corporation should apply, and convert and apply, the said customs about the fortification and repair of the walls of the town, and not to any other uses, by the survey and control of the Abbot of the town or his deputy, and at the end of three years the customs were to cease.

There was a like grant, dated the 9th of October in the seventeenth year of the reign of King Henry the Sixth, and another dated the 15th of March in the twentieth year of the same king, and by the last, the [223] grant was continued for twelve years from the date thereof.

In the fourth year after the date of the charter dated the 15th of March in the twentieth year of King Henry the Sixth, whereby the customs were granted for twelve years, the charter, upon the construction of which the principal question in his cause depended, was granted. It was dated the 12th of January, in the twentieth year of the reign of King Henry the Sixth, and after granting to the corporation cognizance of pleas and jurisdiction over various matters therein mentioned, it proceeded, in substance, as follows:—"Further, we, considering after what manner the town is situate adjacent to parts of Wales, and the marches of the same, and which, in the times of our progenitors, and especially in the time of King Henry the Sixth, stood for the defence and fortification of the people of England against the rebels of Wales, and which also by Owen Glendower, with great multitude, by sacking the town and burning the suburbs had taken the town, and great part of the county of Salop, and other adjacent counties, in like manner, had been burnt and destroyed, if it had not been defended by the people within the town, upon the bridges, gates, towers, and walls of the same then being defensible, and as yet very likely, in a similar case hereafter, may be burnt and destroyed by such rebellion, unless the same bridges, gates, towers, and walls shall be repaired, kept and maintained, in a state of defence; and also considering after what manner the bridges are made, viz., one towards Wales, and another towards England upon the Severn; and so small damages have happened to the arches and stonework of the same bridges, by the rapid course of the water there, and also by carriages passing over the same, and greater damages are likely to happen to the same in process of [224] time, and the ruin thereof, to the destruction of the town and county and the country there, may be feared, unless they are repaired and amended in a short time, as it is said, and we, desiring to provide these opportunities for the repairing, amending, fortifying, calling and defending the bridges, gates, towers and walls, to the resistance of the rebels of Wales and other malefactors willing to injure the town; also considering the letters patent of the 15th of March, anno 20, and the several customs thereby granted" (which were stated at length), "which same sums of money yearly arising from the customs, during the term aforesaid, greatly fall short for the sufficient or reasonable reparation of the town walls, bridges, gates and towers aforesaid, as we are now more fully informed, we, for the reasons aforesaid, have granted for ourself and our heirs, to the bailiffs and burgesses of the town aforesaid, their heirs and successors for ever, that they, by the hands of lawful men whom they shall from time to time depute for that purpose, may, from time to time for ever, take all the customs aforesaid, in manner aforesaid yearly to be taken, for the reparation, amendment, and fortification of the bridges, gates, towers and walls of the town, to the resistance of the rebels of Wales, and the marches of the same, and the same sums of money yearly arising from the said customs to apply and expend, from time to time, about the reparation, amendment and fortification of the bridges, gates, towers and walls aforesaid, to be made for the strengthening the same towers, without yielding account or reckoning thereof to us or our heirs, or of the receipts of the same in any wise." And the grant contained a discharge of all arrears of accounts and receipts, "and of other causes whatsoever which had accrued, or thereafter might have accrued to His Majesty for the premises or any of them, against the said bailiffs or the successors in any wise howsoever."

[225] The grant was afterwards confirmed by charters of Henry the VII. and Charles the I.

The corporation continued to receive the tolls down to the year 1789, and they kept the Welch bridge in repair. Shortly afterwards the bridge became so damaged that it became necessary to rebuild it, and it became desirable to the neighbours to widen the bridge, and to abolish the tolls.

In 1792 the corporation agreed to abolish the tolls, in consideration of the sum £6000, which was raised by subscription; of this they applied £4000 towards building the bridge. The residue was invested, and now consisted of the sum £2176 stock, standing in the names of three of the members of the borough council.

The corporation, after the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 W. c. 76), being indebted to their former town clerk for compensation under that Act, were about to apply the fund in question in payment of that debt, and this gave rise to the present information.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Romilly, in support of the information, argued, that the charters of the Crown had devoted the tolls to a public trust. That the trust was of such a nature as to come within the charitable uses mentioned in the statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. c. 4); and, therefore, that the Court had jurisdiction to see to the due application of the fund.

That the stock, being the produce of and substitute for the tolls, was affected by similar trusts, and that its [226] application in the way proposed by the corporation would be a diversion of it from the legitimate purposes, and a breach of trust, which this Court would prevent.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Walker, and Mr. Kenyon, contra, for the Defendants, contended that, under this charter, the corporation became absolutely entitled to the customs thereby granted, free from any trust: that although the grant might make them liable to the duty of making the repairs, the means of making which were given by the grant, yet that the duty was not and could not be annexed to the receipt of the customs, and could not be enforced by compelling them to apply the customs to the purpose intended; and that the duty, if to be enforced at all, was to be satisfied by some other means.

They also contended that the grant was made as a reward for past services; and from the exemption from the duty to render any account, it was plain, that the corporation was not intended to be, and ought not to be held accountable to the Crown, or to the King's Courts for the application of any part of the money; and further, that if the corporation were entitled to the tolls for a public purpose of that purpose was not civil but military, and therefore that the Crown only, and not the Court of Chancery, could direct the application.

The Attorney-General v. The Haberdashers' Company (1 Myl. & K. 420), The Attorney-General v. The Mayor of Galway (1 Molloy, 103, Beat. 298), The Attorney-General v. Corporation of Carlisle (2 Sim. 437), were cited.

[227] May 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. From the several charters anterior to that of the twenty-fourth of King Henry the VI., it appears that grants were made for some public purpose affecting the welfare or safety of the town, such as the amendment of the walls, the repair of the Welch Bridge, the paving of own, the safety of the town, the repair of the bridges and gates, and other necessary occasions for the defence of the town. The customs were to be taken by the hands of persons in whom the corporation could confide, and for whom they were willing to answer. In the three last charters, the grant is in aid of the fortification of the town and repair of the walls, and the money was to be applied under the survey and control of the Abbot of the town or his deputy, or, as the two last charters say, of John Ashfield, and a time was limited for the cesser of the customs.

By the last charter of the twenty-fourth of King Henry the VI., we have a grant in perpetuity, instead of a grant for a short term of years. The king exempts the corporation from rendering any account or reckoning; the corporation is not subjected to any special survey and control in the expenditure of the sums to be received; but, in consideration of the past services of the town, the situation and importance of the place, the injury and damage to be expected from the King's enemies, from the current of water, and from the traffic on the bridges, and the ruin likely to take place if the means of repairing were not provided, the grant was made, expressly, that the money might be applied and expended about the reparation, amendment and fortification of the bridges, gates, towers and walls to be made for the strengthening of the town.

[228] The Defendants contend, that under this charter, the corporation became absolutely entitled to the customs granted, free from any trust: that although the grant might make them liable to the duty of making the repairs, the means of making which were given by the grant, yet that the duty was not, and could not be annexed to the receipt of the customs, and could not be enforced by compelling them to apply the customs for the purpose intended; and that the duty, if to be enforced at all, was to be so by some other means. Assuming, as I must do for the purpose of this case, that the Crown had power to grant the customs in question, I can have no doubt that the corporation, by accepting the grant, became liable to the performance of the duty thereby imposed; the money to be received was, according to the express direction contained in the grant, to be applied for the purposes therein mentioned; and I am of opinion, that it was the duty of the corporation so to apply so much of the receipts as was required for those purposes.

The Defendants have contended that the grant was made as a reward for past services, that, from the exemption from the duty to render any account, it is plain that the corporation was not intended to be, and ought not to be, held accountable to the Crown, or to the King's Courts, for the application of any part of the money, and further, that if the corporation were entitled to the tolls only for a public purpose, that purpose was not civil but military, and therefore that the Crown only, and not the Court of Chancery, could direct the application.

It appears to me that the argument, that the grant was made to the corporation for its own benefit only, as a reward for prior services, is contrary to the plain terms of the charter, which, whilst recognising the past services of the burgesses, states, as the inducement for [229] the grant, the necessity of providing for the future defence of the town, and accordingly directs the money to arise from the customs to be applied for that purpose.

It further appears to me, that the customs, or the right to levy them, were considered as belonging to the king, and to be capable of being granted by him for public purposes; that in the former grants, the burgesses were held to be accountable to the Crown, for the sums which they received and their application thereof, but that the charter of the twenty-fourth Henry VI. in exempting the corporation from the account, only released the corporation from the beneficial interest which the Crown had, or was supposed to have, in the customs received, but did not release the corporation from the right which the Crown had, for the benefit of the subject, of seeing that the duty, for the performance of which the customs were granted, was performed. I conceive that the reparation of the bridges and walls ought to be considered as the duty of the burgesses, that the expense of performing the duty was a common burden upon the burgesses and inhabitants; that if there had been no grant of the Crown, either in aid or expressly for the purpose, the whole burden would have fallen upon the burgesses and inhabitants; that the grants were therefore made, pro tanto, in relief of the burgesses and inhabitants, and in diminution of the collection or assessments, which, in some form or other, would have been made upon them; and that to whomsoever the duty of directing the construction of the walls and fortifications might have belonged, the raising the money was a civil duty, and the relief afforded by the grant was the relief of a civil burden.

Now the statute of Elizabeth (43 Eliz. c. 4) enumerates among gifts to charitable uses, gifts for the "repair of bridges, [230] ports, havens, causeways, churches, seabanks, and highways," and for "aid or ease of any poor inhabitants concerning payments of fifteens, setting out of soldiers and other taxes;" and Sir John Lee expressed himself to be of opinion, that funds, supplied from the gift of the Crown or from the gift of the Legislature or from private gift, for any legal, public, or general purpose, are charitable funds to be administered by Courts of Equity. Some doubt has been thrown upon the generality of this position, but I am not aware of a decision by which it has been impeached. A question, however, is made upon the subject of the gift; and the case of The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Glamorgan before Sir Anthony Hart, is referred to (1 Molloy, 103, 104, 108; Beatt. 298). In that case Sir Anthony Hart felt a difficulty, in consequence of the tolls which were the subject of the gift having been created de novo for the purpose of the grant; but he thought that if the Crown, being entitled to tolls, grants them to a charitable use, they are subject to all the incidents of other property so granted. Now in this case it appears that the customs granted in the twenty-fourth of Henry VI. were not created: the origin of them is not shewn, but they had been the subject of grant to the Crown for nearly 200 years before; and, as I have before stated, it appears to me for the purposes of this cause, I ought to presume that the Crown had a right to make the grant.

On the whole, I think that this was a gift for a public and general purpose; that it was given for the benefit of the town in aid of a general charge or burden to which the burgesses and inhabitants of the town were liable; and that it was a gift, which, under the equity of the [231] statute of Elizabeth, ought to be considered as a gift to charitable uses.

The subsequent charters of Henry VII. and Charles I. do not appear to me to affect the question. The customs, or tolls as they were called, continued to be received by the corporation till the year 1792. Sometime previously the inconveniences arising from the narrowness of the bridge and from the toll, had become subject of complaint, and an arrangement was made for the abolition of the tolls, in payment to the corporation of £6000, of which £4000 was to be applied towards building a new bridge, and the remaining sum of £2000 was to be paid to the corporation. This arrangement was carried into effect. The corporation actually received the sum of £2000, which was lent at interest to a person of the name Loxdale, who had an account with the corporation, upon the balance of which sometimes more or sometimes less than £2000 was due. The debt of £2000 was called in in the year 1837, and invested in the purchase of the sum of £2176, 17s. Bank 3 per cent. annuities now in question. The information was occasioned by an avowed intention, on the part of the corporation, to sell the stock or part of it in order to raise money for the purpose of liquidating debts contracted by the corporation. As it is not denied that the £2000 invested in 1837 represents the £2000 paid to the corporation in 1792 as part of the consideration for the tolls, I think that the annuities must be subject to the same trust, which, as it appears to me, was attached to the tolls.

I must therefore declare, that the 3 per cent. Bank annuities were held by the corporation in trust to apply the dividends in or towards the repairs of the bridge and walls; and that the injunction, &c., already granted ought to be continued.

[232] BLACHFORD v. KIRKPATRICK. Nov. 16, 19, 1842.

Even after great delay and acquiescence, the Court will not compel a purchaser to complete, if the title appears to be manifestly bad.

The right to the tithes of an allotment generally follows the right to the old tenement, in respect of which the allotment is made.

Contract for the purchase of tithes not signed by the party chargeable, Held, under the circumstances, to have been taken out of the Statute of Frauds.

Messrs. James and Joseph Kirkpatrick were owners of a renewable lease, under Manchester College, of a farm called St. Cross, in the parish of Carisbrooke; to this there was appurtenant a right of common over the forest of Parkhurst.

In 1812 an Act passed for enclosing the forest; but the right to tithes was not thereby interfered with. Under the powers of this Act, Messrs. Kirkpatrick had granted, in respect of the St. Cross farm, 130 acres of the forest situate in the parish of Carisbrooke.

In 1812 the Plaintiffs, or parties represented by them, assuming to be entitled to the tithes of the allotment of 130 acres as lay impropriators of the parish of Carisbrooke, agreed to sell to the Kirkpatricks the rectorial tithes of such allotment for the sum of £700. It did not appear that any agreement in writing was signed by the purchasers. An abstract of title was delivered, and the purchasers prepared a conveyance, which, in 1819, was submitted to and approved of by the vendors. It was not however executed; the reason for which did not however appear. Interest had been paid on the purchase-money down to 1835, at the rate of 4 per cent.

The purchasers died, and the matter being mooted in consequence of the discontinuance to pay interest, the abstract was, in 1836, found, when it appeared that, by deed of 1758 under which the vendors claimed, the tithes of St. Cross farm were excepted out of the grant to them of the rectorial tithes of the parish of Caris[233]-brooke. The Defendants thereupon contended that, as the vendors had no title to the tithes of St. Cross farm, they had none to the allotment made in respect of the farm.

In 1838 this bill was filed for a specific performance, and for a declaration that the purchasers had accepted the title.

The Defendants said, that the farm consisted of North St. Cross and South St. Cross; that the former was tithe free, and that the tithe of the latter had been purchased by the Kirkpatricks in 1810. That no tithes were therefore payable in respect of the allotment, though the parties had acted under the erroneous supposition to the contrary. They insisted that there had been no contract in writing signed by the purchasers, and claimed the benefit of the Statute of Frauds.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Prior, for the Plaintiffs. The Plaintiffs are at once entitled to a decree for payment of the purchase-money, without any reference as to title. The Defendants have accepted the title; and there has been such a course of conduct on their part, as to disentitle them to any further investigation of it. See Wood v. Green (15 Ves. 594), Margravine of Anspach v. Noel (1 Mad. 310), Haydon v. Bell (1 Beavan, 337), Hall v. Laver (3 Y. & Coll. 191).

As to the Statute of Frauds, there has been a sufficient acquiescence and part performance to take the case out of that statute. There has been a possession and payment of the tithes since 1812, a payment of interest on the purchase-money, an approval of the title [234] and a settlement of the conveyance. It is now too late to say that there is no contract in writing.

It does not appear that the allotment was made in respect of the farm, or whether it was made for lands alone in the parish of Carisbrooke, and the defence is not properly raised by the answer. They also cited The Bishop of Carlisle v. Blain (1 Y. & Coll. 123).

Mr. Boteler, Mr. George Turner, and Mr. Piggott, for the Defendants. The abstract, even if valid, was entered into under a mistake, and on the supposition that the vendors, and not the purchasers, were entitled to the tithes. The Court would never in such a case, even after payment of the purchase-money. Bingham v. Braham (1 Ves. sen. 126).

If the Plaintiffs have no title, it would be a strong measure of equity to compel a purchaser to pay his purchase-money without receiving the property in return. This Court would not force a bad title on a purchaser. Warren v. Richardson (Younge, 1).

It is plain that the vendors have no title. The tithes of the allotment belong to the party entitled to the property in respect of which the allotment is made, Steele v. Manns (5 B. & Ald. 22). It appears from the deed of 1758, which is the root of the Plaintiffs' title, that the tithes of the St. Cross farm did not pass to them; and it appears further, that, so far as tithes were payable, they were purchased in 1810 by the Kirkpatricks.

There is no sufficient signed contract, nor has there been an acquiescence, the delay in completing has most [235] probably arisen from this very objection. There has been no possession taken; for tithes were never payable in respect of the allotment, and therefore cannot be said to have been retained.

Mr. Hale, in the same interest.

Mr. Pemberton, in reply.

Nov. 19. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I confess, I feel very considerable difficulty as to part of this very singular case, considering the great length of time which has elapsed since the contract was entered into.

The Plaintiffs are asking for a conveyance, in pursuance of a contract entered into in the year 1812. The Defendants have set up several defences, which, upon the best consideration I can give them, and having regard to the great length of time which has elapsed, and to the acquiescence of the party in the terms of the contract during the whole of that time, I think cannot be sustained. It appears to me, that there is sufficient proof of the contract being entered into in this case by Joseph, on behalf of Joseph and James. It is sufficiently proved, as it appears to me, that both parties intended to complete this contract in the year 1816; and that, at that time, both parties had approved of the title, and had acquiesced in it in a most extraordinary and emphatic manner, there being on the one side a payment of the interest of the purchase-money, avowedly as such, and on the other side, the constant acceptance of the interest, as the interest of the purchase-money.

[236] Now without meaning to say that the single circumstances here set forth would, in themselves and without the lapse of time, be held to be an acquiescence in and confirmation of the contract, and a sufficient proof of the existence of a valid contract, yet, having regard to the length of time, I must say, that, in my opinion, they must be so held. This does not get over the difficulty I feel in the present case; for if the parties delay asking for the specific performance of a contract and for a conveyance of the legal estate, as they might do, and in the interval before the contract is completed, and while the purchase-money is in the hands of one party, and the legal estate in the other, it should turn out, that that title which had been supposed to be good, was really a bad title, I am not prepared to say, that this Court, knowing the title to be bad, would order the party to accept it, and pay the purchase-money for it. That is what is alleged at the Bar to be the case in the present instance, though it is by no means stated on the pleadings in a way that such a defence, in my opinion, ought to have been stated.

Having read these answers, I find nowhere an intimation of a mistake, except in the answer of James Kirkpatrick; there is there an intimation of a mistake which both parties were under, that, although St. Cross farm might be free from the payment of tithes, and although a portion of the tithes of St. Cross farm might have been purchased by the Defendants, yet nevertheless, it was believed that the impropiator or the person entitled to the tithes of the forest would be entitled to the tithes of the allotment. This, it is suggested, was the mistake on which both parties at the time proceeded.

On that point, it seems to be now stated, that a conveyance of the tithes of the farm of South St. Cross had, [237] in the year 1810, been made to the Kirkpatricks. It is alleged that the North St. Cross farm was free. That had nothing whatever to do with any allotment; but the contract is for the sale of the tithes of the allotment: both parties, as it is said, then thinking, that the tithes of the allotment remained in the Blachford's, although the tithes of St. Cross farm or part of St. Cross farm might belong to somebody else.

It is said that the case of Steele v. Manns (5 Barn. & Ald. 22) was decided after the date of the contract, and after the negotiation between these parties, and that there was some new law propounded. I do not think it was. It was clear law that the tithes of an allotment follow the fate of the tithes of the land in respect of which the allotment is made, unless there be some special circumstances.

Then it is said there are some special circumstances here. The right of the Blachfords to the tithes and the right of common of the persons who were entitled to the old tenement named Carisbrooke, extended over three different parishes, and certain extra-parochial places. It might therefore have happened, that the allotment was not made in the parish of Carisbrooke, where the old tenement was, but might have been made in other parishes, or in the extra-parochial place. It is stated, however, in answer, that it appears the allotment was made in the parish of Carisbrooke. I must, however, say it appears to me, that if the party intended to rely on these circumstances, they ought to have been brought forward in a manner more distinctly than has been done. I will not presume to say what was the real state of this title, but this I think I must state, that [238] if it did appear to the Court that there the vendor had no title at the time this contract was entered into, and the matter being left by the acquiescence of both parties, as it certainly must have been, in the same state, the money being in the hands of the purchasers, and the legal estate, such as it was, in the hands of the sellers, this Court would not, knowing there was a bad title, order a conveyance to be made and accepted.

I think the best course I can pursue upon it is this: take it for granted at this moment, that the Plaintiffs suppose they can make out that in the year 1819 a good title could have been made. If a good title could have been made at that time, then I think all the rest is proved here, and that there ought to be a payment of money and conveyance; but if it should turn out that in the year 1819 a good title could not have been made, I do not know what would be the effect of the length of time that has since elapsed. Whether a good title could have been made at the time when that abstract was examined by these parties, is the question. I think there ought to be a reference to ascertain whether a good title could be made in 1819, if the Plaintiffs desire or are willing to take it, rather than have the bill dismissed. If the bill is to be dismissed, it ought to be dismissed without costs.

Declare that there was a binding contract, which ought to be performed, if a good title could have been made on the 18th of June 1819, and refer it to the Master to ascertain that fact.

[239] MATTHEW v. BRISE. March 11, 1843.

[S. C. 12 L. J. Ch. 263. Affirmed on appeal, 15 L. J. Ch. 39; 10 Jur. 105.]

Where a trustee has trust money in his hands which he is authorised to lay out in the public funds or on real security, he is justified, pending the necessary delay in completing a contemplated mortgage security, in investing the money in Exchequer bills.

A trustee properly invested trust-money in Exchequer bills, but he left them undistinguished in the hands of a broker; upon a misapplication of them by the broker: Held, that the trustee was personally liable.

A trustee was empowered to invest in the public funds or on real security. He had in his hands a sum, which, in the interval between receiving and investing in a contemplated real security, he invested in Exchequer bills, which he left in the hands of a broker, who misapplied them. Held, that the trustee was liable for the value of the Exchequer bills at the time of the loss, and not for the stock which the money would have purchased.

The Defendant Brise was the sole executor and trustee under the will of the testator, who died in 1834. The Defendant, in 1839, realised part of the estate of the testator, which he deposited with a banker. The Defendant, who by the will was empowered to invest this sum in Parliamentary stock or public funds of Great Britain, or on real securities in England, had, previous to receiving the money, entered into arrangements for lending a portion of it on a mortgage security. In order to make the money profitable in the meantime, he directed the investment of £5600 in Exchequer bills. This investment was accordingly made on the 4th of March 1840, by Messrs. Wakefield, who were brokers, but acted in some respects as bankers, and had to some extent enjoyed the confidence of the testator in his lifetime. The Exchequer bills were left, undistinguished from others, in the hands of Messrs. Wakefield.

Various delays occurred in the perfecting the mortgage, and before it was completed, and in April 1841, Messrs. Wakefield became bankrupts, when it was discovered that they had sold £4000, part of the Exchequer bills, and had applied the produce to their own use.

This bill was filed by the children of the testator, to make Mr. Brise, the executor and trustee, responsible [240] for the loss which had occurred by the failure and misconduct of Messrs. Wakefield.

The cause came on upon bill and answer.

Mr. Pemberton, Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. Chandless, for the Plaintiffs. The question is this:—Was the Defendant justified in keeping a large portion of the trust funds invested in Exchequer bills for a period of twelve months, in the expectation of completing a mortgage security? The will authorised him to invest in Parliamentary stocks or public funds, or on real securities in his name; but the Defendant had no authority to invest in Exchequer bills. He made no investment authorised by the power, and, therefore, he is liable to replace the stock which might have been purchased with the money.

Again, supposing him justified in investing the money for a temporary purpose in Exchequer bills, still he acted without due care in allowing them to remain in the custody and power of another person; and without taking care to have them distinguished from other Exchequer bills in the possession of the brokers. In Clough v. Bond (3 Mylne & Cr. 496), Lord Cottenham says—"It will be found to be the result of all the best authorities upon the subject, that, although a personal representative, acting strictly within the line of his duty, and exercising reasonable care and diligence, will not be responsible for the failure or depreciation of the fund in which any part of the estate may be invested, or for the insolvency or misconduct of any person who may have possessed it, yet, if that line of duty be not strictly pursued, and any part of the property be invested by such personal re-[241]-presentative in funds or upon securities not authorised, or be put within the control of persons who ought not to be intrusted with it, and a loss be thereby eventually sustained, such personal representative will be liable to make it good, however unexpected the result, however little likely to arise from the course adopted, and however free such conduct may have been from any improper motive." And, after referring to the cases of unauthorised securities, his Lordship adds (page 497), "So when the loss arises from the dishonesty or failure of any one to whom the possession of part of the estate has been entrusted. Necessity, which includes the regular course of business in administering the property, will, in equity, exonerate the personal representative. But if, without such necessity, he be instrumental in giving to the person failing, possession of any part of the property, he will be liable, although the person possessing it be a co-executor or co-administrator; Langford v. Gascoyne (11 Ves. 333), Lord Shipbrook v. Lord Hinchinbrook (11 Ves. 252, and 16 Ves. 477), Underwood v. Stevens (1 Mer. 712)."

The Defendant is, therefore, liable to replace the stock which would have been purchased with the money lost by the failure of the brokers. They also cited Hambury v. Kirkland (3 Sim. 265).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Phillips, for the Defendant. The Defendant had the power of investing in real securities; some delay must necessarily occur in completing a mortgage transaction; and the question is, what was to be done with the money intended to be invested in the interval? Was it to lie idle at the [242] banker's? Would it have been prudent to have invested it in the funds, incurring the double expense of investing and selling out, and running the risk of a fall in the price of stocks, or was it not more proper and prudent to invest the amount in the least fluctuating of Government securities?

If the money had been left in the hands of the bankers, the Defendants would have incurred no liability. Is the case to be dealt with differently, because the Defendant invested the money in a better, viz., a Government security? The Defendant would have been justified in paying the money into the bankers generally and unmarked, why he is not equally justified in placing, in the same way, the Exchequer bills in the possession of a banker or broker both for safe custody, and to receive the interest and exchange the bills when paid off.

In all cases of this description the question is, whether the trustee has used the ordinary degree of caution and prudence which he would exercise in his own case, and in respect to his own property. In Ex parte Belchier (Ambler, 218), Lord Hardwicke says, "where trustees act by other hands, either from necessity, or conformable to the common usage of mankind, they are not answerable for losses. There are two sorts of necessities; first, legal necessity; second, moral necessity. As to the first: a distinction prevails, &c.; second, moral necessity, from the usage of mankind, if a trustee acts as prudently for the trust as for himself, and according to the usage of business. If a trustee appoints rents to be paid to a banker at that time in credit, and the banker afterwards breaks, the trustee is not answerable."

[243] So in Bacon v. Bacon (5 Ves. 331), where one executor remitted to another a sum of money for payment of the testator's debts which he misapplied, Lord Loughborough thought the former not liable; he said (page 334), "If the business was transacted in the ordinary manner, unless there was some circumstance to awaken suspicion, surely the allowance is fair."

If the Defendant is liable, he is answerable only for the money, and not for the stock. There was no selling out of stock, and no breach of trust committed by the purchase of the Exchequer bills. The default, if any, must be taken as at the last proper investment, when the trust property consisted of money.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], without hearing a reply said:—Cases of this kind are certainly very painful. In this particular case, the Defendant acted throughout, with an anxiety to do that which was best for his cestuis que trust.

It has not been attempted to throw the slightest imputation upon him; and, however unfortunate the issue of this matter may be, he has the consolation that he goes out of Court with his character perfect, and his honour unimpeached.

The Defendant was the trustee for the Plaintiffs. A sum of money to the amount of £6000 came into his hands, a portion of which he thought it would be most beneficial to the family to lay out on mortgage security. This was entirely within his power. The mortgage security could not of course be perfected without some delay, for it was obviously necessary, in a prudent and proper management of the business, that some things [244] should be done before it could be safely completed. Pending the interval, the Defendant laid out a considerable portion of the money in the purchase of Exchequer bills. This investment was of such a nature that it might be converted into money at any time, and during the time which must necessarily elapse, that is, from the period when the money was lying dead in the hands of the bankers, down to the time when it would become fruitful upon the mortgage, it would by these means make some interest for the benefit of the family.

I am of opinion, under these circumstances, that the Defendant was very well justified in laying out the money in Exchequer bills during that interval. He, however, unfortunately left them entirely under the control of other parties, and intrusted to them the possession. Instead of securing them in the ordinary mode, he permitted them to remain undistinguished in the hands of brokers, who, in some respects, acted as bankers, who held them and had the absolute power of disposing of them; was it right or was it to be justified, that a trustee should leave such securities as Exchequer bills in the hands of a banker or broker, who acquires the power of disposing of them as he may think fit? Was it not transferring to those persons that trust and confidence for which he was answerable? It is said, that this was just the same thing, as if the Defendant had left a balance in the hands of the bankers. It is to be observed, however, that he did not do so, and I don't think that it is necessary on this occasion to consider how long a trustee may keep money which he is desirous to employ for a particular purpose in the hands of a banker. When the Defendant had purchased Exchequer bills, he might have kept them perfectly safe, either in his own hands, or he might even have kept them in the hands of those persons, distinguishing them, however, [245] from the other property they had; and though they would still be liable to lose by fraud or embezzlement, still they would have been free from that species of misapplication which was resorted to upon the present occasion.

It seems to me to be a case of very great hardship; and it is impossible to feel anything but regret at the loss which falls upon this gentleman; but it would be a greater regret if the loss were to fall upon those depending upon his vigilance and care for their protection. The Defendant has made himself liable, because he omitted to take due and proper precaution for the protection of the fund. Having omitted to take it, and having transferred the confidence which was vested in himself to other persons of his own appointment, for whose conduct, it appears to me, he is personally answerable, I think I am bound to decree in favour of the Plaintiff in this case; and this gentleman must make good the money, and must also pay the costs of this suit.

The Defendant was charged with the value at the bankruptcy of the £4000 Exchequer bills, with interest thereon at 4 per cent.

A mortgagee in possession, held liable for a damage occasioned by his pulling down two cottages on the property.

A mortgagee in possession will be allowed for repairs necessary for the support of the property, and for doing that which is essential for the protection of the title of the mortgagor. If he has got the consent of the mortgagor or has given him notice in which he acquiesces, he may be allowed for money laid out in increasing the value of the property, but he is not justified in increasing the value of the estate by improvements so as to cripple the mortgagor's power of redemption.

Mortgagee in possession, claiming upon a bill for redemption, to be allowed for substantial repairs and lasting improvement, but adducing no proof of any such expenditure, held not entitled to any enquiry on the subject.

This was a suit for redemption.

In 1830 the Plaintiff mortgaged some property to the Defendant, a solicitor, for £300; and, in 1836, he executed to him a further charge, for a sum of £140, part of which consisted of a bill of costs due from the Plaintiff to the Defendant, and other part of arrears of interest and money paid.

Default having been made in payment of interest on the mortgage, the Defendant, in 1838, by an action of ejectment, recovered possession of the mortgaged property.

After the Defendant had taken possession, he pulled down two cottages on the premises and made some alterations.

By his answer, the Defendant stated that he had laid out £300 in substantial repairs and lasting improvements; but of this no evidence was given.

Mr. Chandless, for the Plaintiff, contended, first, that there ought to be a taxation of so much of the Defendant's demand as consisted of professional costs, Wragg v. Denham (2 Y. & Col. (Exch.) 117); secondly, that the mortgagee was liable [247] for the damage done by pulling down the cottages, Wragg v. Denham; and, thirdly, that the Defendant ought to pay the costs of the suit, it having been occasioned by his improper conduct in refusing to render accounts. Detillin v. Gale (7 Ves. 583), Taylor v. Baker (Daniell, 71), Harvey v. Tebbutt (1 Jac. & W. 197); and see Wilson v. Cluer (4 Beavan, 214).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Stevens, for the Defendant, did not oppose the taxation, but contended that the Defendant was entitled to an inquiry as to the substantial repairs and lasting improvements, and to be allowed the amount; and that the Defendant was entitled to the costs of suit, and of the ejectment.

Mr. Chandless, in reply. There is no proof of any substantial repairs or lasting improvements; the Defendant, therefore, is not entitled to any inquiry.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is objected on behalf of the Plaintiff, and properly objected, that so far as the sum of £140 consists of the bill of costs, which is payable to the Defendant, it ought only to stand as a security for so much as will be properly due upon taxation. That is not disputed by the Defendant; it has been very properly conceded to the Plaintiff, that he is entitled to have that investigated.

In the year 1838 the Defendant obtained possession by an action of ejectment, and after he came into possession, he pulled down two of the cottages which were upon the premises, and he says, in his answer, that he laid out a considerable sum of money, to the amount of [248] about £300, for repairs and substantial improvements, which he alleges were done with the privity and knowledge of the Plaintiff. First, with respect to the dilapidations, they are proved; and there is not an attempt made in evidence for the purpose of shewing that it was proper. I am therefore of opinion, that the Plaintiff is entitled to an account of any loss occasioned by pulling down those houses.

The next question is, whether the Plaintiff is entitled to anything for the improvements which he alleges to have been made. With respect to what a mortgagee in possession may do with the mortgaged property, several cases have occurred at different times, shewing what he ought, and to some considerable extent, what he ought not to do. Such repairs as are necessary for the support of the property he will be allowed for. He will not only be allowed for repairs, but he will be also allowed for doing that which is essential for the protection of the title of the mortgagor. Further, if he has got the consent of the mortgagor, or has given him notice, in which he acquiesces, then he may be allowed for sums of money which are laid out in increasing the value of the property; but he has no right to lay out money in what he calls increasing the value of the property, which may be done in such a way as to make it utterly impossible for the mortgagor, with his means ever to redeem; this is what has been termed, improving a mortgagor out of his estate—an expression which has been used both in this argument, and on former occasions. The mortgagee has not a right to make it more expensive for the mortgagor to redeem than may be required for the purpose of keeping the property in a proper state of repair, and for protecting the title to the property.

[249] Now, in this case, it has also to be considered, whether it is a matter of course to direct an inquiry whether any money has been laid out in lasting improvements. Many such inquiries have been directed where the fact of any money having been laid out has been proved and brought to the attention of the Court. I quite agree with the argument that has been used on this occasion, that it was not necessary for the Defendant to prove the items of sums of money laid out in the permanent improvements alleged to have been made; but, in this case, there is, as to that, a total absence of all evidence whatever. There is evidence, on the part of the Plaintiff, to shew that what was done deteriorated the property, and there is not one word in evidence, on the part of the Defendant, in support of his allegation, that he has laid out any money for lasting improvements, or that anything he did was done with the privity, consent, or knowledge of the Plaintiff. In the absence of all proof, it is not at all within my authority to direct an inquiry to enable him to supply that in the Master's office, which he has already had an opportunity of doing. (See Marten v. Whichelo, Cr. & Ph. 257.) He may have done something towards the improvement of the estate; and if he had entered into any general proof without going into the items, it is very probable that the proof might have been such as would have induced the Court to direct an inquiry upon the subject; but there is no such proof brought forward.

Another point has been raised in this case as to the refusal of the Defendant to account. To excuse his refusal, the Defendant alleges that he was under a mistake as to the party on whose behalf the application was made; but I think the circumstances sufficiently shew there was no mistake.

[250] Under these circumstances I shall direct no inquiry as to lasting improvements: I think the Plaintiff is entitled to an inquiry, as to the loss sustained in consequence of pulling down the cottages: he is entitled to a taxation of the bill of costs, which formed part of the consideration for the further charge; and, considering the course the Defendant has taken, I think he is liable to pay some of the costs of this suit. I cannot, however, take it for granted, that this suit would not have occurred if the estate had not been dealt with as it appears to have been; I cannot therefore say, that the Plaintiff is to be excused from the whole costs of the suit up to the hearing. I think the Plaintiff must pay the costs, except those which relate to the claim for lasting improvements—those relating to the Plaintiff's claim for compensation for the dilapidations, and those which have arisen from the evidence, which the Plaintiff has been obliged to enter into for the purpose of shewing the refusal to account. There must be an inquiry taken of what is due to the Defendant for principal and interest, and for the costs payable by the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley asked for the costs of the action of ejectment.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The Plaintiff is entitled to those costs: that has often been decided.

[251] WARD v. WARD. March 16, 1843.

The name of a person who had been made the next friend of an infant Plaintiff without his authority, ordered to be struck out, but liberty was given to the Co-plaintiff to amend by naming a new next friend.

As to the liability of the next friend in such a case as regards the Defendant.

In this case, an infant had been made a Co-plaintiff with several other persons, and Mr. Johnson his father had, without any authority, been named his next friend by the Plaintiff's solicitor. It was now moved, that the bill might be amended by striking out the name of the infant by Mr. Johnson his next friend, or by striking out the name of the next friend, and that the solicitor might exonerate the next friend from any costs to which he might be liable.

The Plaintiffs and the next friend had already been ordered to pay the costs of the Defendants of some interlocutory application, and subpoenas for costs had issued.

Mr. Kindersley, in support of the motion.

Mr. Selwyn, for some of the Defendants, asked, that in any order which might be made, the Defendants' interest might be protected as regarded the costs; and also that there might be no further delay in bringing the suit to a hearing.

Mr. Parsons, for the solicitor, objected to the form of the notice of motion, and contended what was proposed to be done could not be considered an amendment. He insisted that Mr. Johnson had, after knowledge of his being named next friend, acquiesced in and sanctioned the proceeding. That the infant was a proper person to be made a Co-plaintiff, and ought not to have [252] been made a Defendant; and in Hosbing v. Nicholls (1 You. & Col. (C. C.) 478) extra costs, occasioned by an infant being made a Defendant who ought to have been made a Plaintiff, were not allowed. Wilson v. Wilson (1 Jac. & W. 457) was also cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The objections made to this application are, first, that it is wrong in point of form, that it is not the usual simple application to strike out a name from the record, but an application to amend by striking it out; but though perhaps it is not strictly an amendment in the sense in which the word has been used in the argument for the Respondent, still I do not think that this objection can prevail.

It is then said, that the infant was a proper party to be a Co-plaintiff, and that his father was the most proper person to be his next friend and guardian. This I will assume, still the solicitor ought to have applied to the father in the first instance for his consent, and ought not to have relied, as he seems to have done, on the representations and instructions of other persons. Where the interest of a person is such that he ought to be a Co-plaintiff on the record, and being applied to, refuses to join in the suit, and in consequence of such refusal he is made a Defendant, whereby additional and unnecessary costs are thereby occasioned, it is a very proper subject for consideration, at the hearing, whether he shall be allowed those additional costs.

that I understand was the question raised before Vice-Chancellor Knight Bruce in the case which has been referred to. But because it is convenient to the other Plaintiffs that another person should be joined with them on the record, can it be for a moment contemplated, that any party whatever has a right to use the name of another person without his authority or against his consent, and thereby expose him to the risk of being subjected to the costs of the suit? It could not be considered for a moment. Precarious indeed would the situation of every man in this country be, if he could, in a case in which other persons thought it right and convenient to join him in the suit, be made subject to all the costs, in case of the failure of the suit.

The question is, therefore, to be considered upon its merits. Was authority given to Mr. Johnson to the solicitor to file this bill, and if not, has there been such subsequent acquiescence in the proceedings as to entitle the Court to say, that from such subsequent sanction an authority must be implied? In this case, it is admitted that there was no previous authority, and having attended to the affidavits throughout, I think there is nothing in them from which I can collect that he ever acquiesced in the use of his name as a party prosecuting this cause; under these circumstances, without interfering in respect of this infant, I think that the name of this gentleman next friend of the infant must be struck out. The other Plaintiffs may then procure another next friend to be inserted. This will not occasion any great delay, though the suit cannot be prosecuted until a new next friend has been appointed.

Then comes the question, what is to be done with regard to the costs? Now I think that there are precedents in similar cases which I will look at before I make any order as to costs, in order that I may make an order in this case, as far as circumstances will allow me, in conformity with the former orders. The Court has been obliged in the confidence it must place in solicitors to assume that there has been no ill practice, [254] and the consequence has been, that Defendants have been held entitled to be protected; the Court in more than one case has said, that when a party who has been made a Plaintiff without his authority, afterwards procures his name to be struck out from the record, he shall still as against Defendants remain responsible for what has happened. (See Wade v. Stanley, 1 W. 674, and Hood v. Phillips, 6 Beav. 176.) I wish to see the orders before I determine what ought to be done about the costs.

Mr. Kindersley. Should the form of the order be such as to leave Mr. Johnson under his present liability to the Defendants?

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. That is one of the points as to which I wish to see what has been done in former cases.

EXTRACT FROM THE ORDER.—Order the name of Mr. Johnson to be struck out. The Plaintiffs have liberty within a fortnight to amend, by inserting the name of A. W. as next friend of the infant. Order the solicitor to pay to Mr. Johnson all the costs as have been occasioned by his being named next friend (including his costs of this application), and to pay the Defendants the costs of this application.

[254] LOPEZ v. DEACON. March 16, 1843.

admission of the possession by an agent on behalf of the Defendant and other persons who are not parties to the cause, of documents relating to the matters in question, does not entitle the Plaintiff to an order for their production.

In 1814 the father of the Plaintiff and certain order parties, by their tin bounders' letters, granted to William Smith Amies, as the agent of the Defendant [255] Deacon, and of other persons his co-adventurers, the right of working tin mines within tin bounds, rendering by way of royalty one-twentieth of the tin risen, clear of

The bill in this case was filed by the representative of Lopez alone against the Defendant Deacon, and against the co-grantors for an account of the dues, but it did not make the other co-adventurers parties.

The Defendant Deacon by his answer stated, that the original "sett" was in the hands of the bankers of himself and his co-adventurers, and had been deposited by him and his co-adventurers jointly; and he admitted that certain documents were in the possession of the captain of the mine, but he stated that they were held by the captain, and that the original sett or licence was also held by the bankers for him jointly with his said co-adventurers, and the same ought not to be produced in the absence of such co-adventurers; he stated the names of some, and gave the description of others of his co-adventurers, and insisted they were necessary parties to the suit.

A motion was now made, that the Defendant might produce the documents.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Shafter, in support of the motion. The lessor has a clear title to the inspection of these documents, in order to ascertain the extent of his right.

The production of the documents is a mode of obtaining the discovery of the matters, much less expensive than that which results from requiring them to be set out at length in the answer. A statement by a Defendant that papers are in the joint possession of himself and other persons, is not a sufficient excuse for his not setting out [256] the contents, unless he shews that he has used his best endeavours to set them forth, and that it is practically impossible for him so to do, Stuart v. Lord Bell (11 Simons, 442, and 12 Simons, 460, affirmed by the Lord Chancellor, March 1849; Taylor v. Rundell (Cr. & Ph. 104; 1 Y. & Col. (C. C.) 128; and Phil. 222). If, therefore, the Defendant is bound to discover these matters by answer, he is equally bound to give the same discovery by their production.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Neate, contra. The right to the production of documents depends on principles quite different from those which regulate questions of the sufficiency or insufficiency of an answer. To entitle a Plaintiff to the production of documents, you must have a clear admission of the Defendant that they are in his possession, and also of his exclusive right to them. You cannot order A. to produce documents in the joint possession of himself and B., nor can you, in the absence of B., order A. to produce documents in which B. is interested. This was laid down by Lord Cottenham in Murray v. Walter (Cr. & Ph. 114), where the Defendant, by his answer, stated, that certain books relating to a concern in which the Plaintiff claimed to be a partner with the Defendant, were in the possession of the treasurer of the concern, on behalf of the several shareholders in it, many of whom were not parties to the suit. It was held that the Defendant could not be ordered to produce the books in question. Lord Cottenham said (Cr. & Ph. 124, 125), "The only order which could possibly be made, would be an order against that Defendant who has made this admission; but to order him to produce these documents, would be contrary to what I have always understood to be the practice of the Court. When documents are stated in the answer to be in the [257] possession of A., B. and C., you cannot order that A. shall produce them, and that for the best possible reason, namely, that he could not produce them." Lord Cottenham afterwards added, "It is perfectly true, that if documents are in the hands of an agent, the principle of the Court is, that the possession of the Defendant's agent, is the possession of the Defendant against whom the order is made. But here the agent is the agent not only for the Defendant against whom the order is prayed, but also for other Defendants. The Defendant against whom the order is prayed, has not the possession of the documents either personally or through an agent. I have always understood the rule to be that, under such circumstances, the Court would not make an order for the production."

So in the case cited of Taylor v. Rundell, Lord Cottenham said (Cr. & Ph. 111), "It is true that the rule of the Court, adopted from necessity, with reference to the production of documents is, that if a Defendant has a joint possession of a document with somebody else who is not before the Court, the Court will not order him to produce it, and that for two reasons: one is, that a party will not be ordered to do that which he cannot, or may not be able to do; the other is, that another party not present has an interest in the document, which the Court cannot deal with."

Mr. Pemberton, in reply, referred to Walburn v. Ingilby (1 Myl. & K. 78, 79).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. If this were a case of a lessor filing a bill against one of the lessees, who being the sole manager of tin mines [258] for himself and other co-adventurers, had possession of the documents, either by himself or by a person whom he had appointed captain of the mine, or the agent of himself and all the co-adventurers, I should be very much disposed to think, that

According to the old practice of the Court, the Plaintiff would be entitled to an order for the production of these documents.

I do not think that the case is so stated in the answer. What is stated is, that here are other persons besides the Defendant who are interested in the accounts, and that these books are partly in the possession of the Defendant, and partly in the possession of another person, who is appointed on the behalf of himself and all the other co-adventurers. That may be an evasion, but that is the effect of the answer as I understand it.

Lord Cottenham, in the cases cited, states distinctly that you cannot order the production of papers on the admission of one person, if other persons are interested in them. I cannot, therefore, in the face of those decisions, make an order for the production of these papers. The effect will be merely to increase the expense of the suit; for, in one or two ways, the contents of these papers may certainly be had. The Plaintiff may either make all the persons interested parties to the suit, or he may press the Defendant for a full discovery of the contents of these documents by his answer. I think that, if the power of the Court is to be really restricted in the way that is alleged, the only effect will be to increase the expense of obtaining that discovery which a Plaintiff is entitled to.

I cannot make the order, the costs must be costs in the cause.

[259] HEWETT v. FOSTER. March 17, 1843.

The testatrix gave her personal estate to A. and B., subject to debts and legacies, upon certain trusts, and she appointed A. alone executor. A fund, over which the testatrix had a power of appointment, was transferred into the names of A. and B. A., the executor, representing that a considerable part of the fund was wanting to pay debts and legacies, induced B. to join in selling out the fund, promising to give a mortgage security for what might not be wanted for debts, &c. A. received the whole, but applied a very inconsiderable sum in payment of debts, &c. Held, that B. was liable to replace so much of the stock as had not been applied in payment of debts, &c., and to account for the dividends.

The testatrix, Jane Pinkey, being entitled to a sum of £2194 consols, standing in the names of two trustees, by her will, dated in 1835, gave and appointed unto Daniel Grigg Hewett and John Foster, all her stocks, &c., and personal estate, subject to the payment of her debts, &c., upon trust to invest on Government securities, and pay the dividends to Sarah Hewett for life, with remainder to her children; and she appointed D. G. Hewett alone executor.

The testatrix died in August 1835, and Hewett alone proved the will. The trustees, in whose names the fund was standing, transferred it into the joint names of Hewett and Foster. On October 1835 Hewett "applied to Foster, and represented to him, that the whole, or some considerable part of the sum of £2194, 5s. 8d., would be required for the purpose of discharging the testatrix's debts, and funeral and testamentary expenses, and the legacies given by her will; and he also represented, that it had been the testatrix's intention that the said Bank annuities should be lent to him D. G. Hewett; and he stated that it would be more for the advantage of the parties entitled to the testatrix's residuary estate, that the whole of the sum of Bank annuities should be sold at one and the same time, and that after applying so much of the proceeds thereof as should be required for that purpose, in payment of the debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies, the residue hereof [260] should be retained by him, Daniel G. Hewett, upon his giving an adequate mortgage security for the same, which he undertook to do."

Foster thereupon executed a power of attorney to Hewett, enabling him to sell out the stock. Hewett sold it out, and received the produce, amounting to £2002, and after applying £55 in payment of debts, &c., he retained the remainder. Hewett afterwards gave a security to Foster for £1947, being the surplus. Hewett fell in difficulties, and the securities could not be realised.

This suit was instituted by the children of Sarah Hewett, to make the trustee liable for a breach of trust.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Beavan, for the Plaintiffs, asked that the Defendant Hewett and Foster might be declared liable to make good the stock.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. W. H. Clarke, for the Defendant Foster, contended that the executor had a right, in the first place, to possess himself of all the assets, and that as the debts and legacies of the testatrix were charged on the fund in question and were payable thereout by Hewett, the sole executor, Foster was justified in placing, and would not have been justified in refusing to place, the fund in question in his hands, to be administered by him. That if Foster were responsible at all, was merely liable for the amount of the money, and not to replace the stock.

Mr. Chandless, for Hewett, the other trustee.

Mr. Twells, for other parties.

[261] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that the fund, doubtless, formed assets for payment of the funeral expenses, debts, and legacies of the testatrix; and if the exigency of the case demanded its application therefor, and Hewett had required it to be transferred to him for that purpose, this would have been a sufficient justification to Foster for so doing; but here the application made to Foster by Hewett was, that after payment of the debts, &c., the residue should be lent to him, Hewett.

That he was of opinion, that Foster was answerable for the breach of trust, so much as had not been applied in payment of debts or legacies, that he was therefore, be decreed to replace so much of the stock as had been unnecessarily paid out, must account for the dividends from the death of the tenant for life, and the costs of this suit.

[261] PARKER v. YOUNG. March 21, 23, 1843.

Where no proceedings have been taken to put an administration bond in suit, a debt due from the administrator at his death to the estate of the intestate, is not a specialty debt.

This was a creditor's suit for the administration of the estate of John Young, reference being made to the Master to take the usual accounts, &c., the Defendant Bullpett was found to be a creditor of the estate of John Young to the amount of £3094, under the following circumstances:—

On the 22d of January 1833 letters of administration of the personal estate of James Young were granted to his brother John Young, on his executing to

[262] Ordinary an administration bond in the form directed by the Statute in relation to Administrations. (1)

The clear residue belonged to John Young and his brother William Young, lunatic.

John Young collected the personal estate of James, rendered an account, &c., to the Ordinary but to the Stamp Office, and on the 29th of May 1839 he retained his own share of the residue; he died largely indebted to the estate of James Young.

On the 11th of September 1841 letters of administration of the estate of John Young, unadministered by John, were granted to the Defendant Bullpett, a committee of William Young, who was found by the Master to be a creditor of the estate.

(1) 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10, s. 1. The conditions of the bond are first to make an inventory, &c.; secondly, well and truly to administer according to law; thirdly, to make a true account of the administration, and pay the residue to the person appointed by the Court; and, fourthly, to render the letters of administration if a will should thereafter appear.

John Young to the amount of £3000 and upwards, the amount due from him to the estate of James at the time of his death.

Under these circumstances Bullpett claimed to be a specialty creditor to this court, alleging that the conditions of the bond were broken, that the Ecclesiastical Court ought ex debito justitiæ, to order that the bond be attended with on the trial of an action, and that the Ordinary ought to be considered as a trustee for the administrator de bonis non.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Willcock, for Bullpett.

Mr. Wray and Mr. Glaase, contra.

[263] The Archbishop of Canterbury v. Tappen (8 B. & C. 151), The Archbishop of Canterbury v. Robertson (1 Cr. & M. 690), The Archbishop of Canterbury v. Tubb (3 Bing. C. 789) were cited.

March 23. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is, whether the administrator de bonis non ought now to be considered a specialty creditor John Young upon the administration bond, and I think that he is not.

The bond is taken pursuant to the Statute of Distributions, and remains subject to the control of the Ordinary.

In the case of The Archbishop of Canterbury v. Tubb (3 Bing. N. C. 789) it was determined, that an action on the bond could not be maintained, even in the name of the Archbishop, without production of the bond, as by that means the control of the Ecclesiastical Courts over suits on administration bonds would, in effect, be destroyed.

An action upon the bond can only be maintained in the name of the obligee, and the administrator de bonis non has no independent right to sue upon it;—it remains to the judicial discretion of the Ecclesiastical Court, to determine according to the circumstances, whether the order that the bond shall be attended with shall be granted or not. In the absence of all authority on the subject, it does not appear to me that any one can be a specialty creditor under a bond which he does not produce, which is not under his control, which was not [264] executed to him or to his intestate, nor was executed to a public officer, and remains subject to the judicial control of the Ecclesiastical Court, which has discretion to determine whether the bond shall be put in or not, and on what terms.

I am of opinion that the administrator de bonis non is not a specialty creditor.

[264] CHIDWICK v. PREBBLE. April 1, 3, 1843.

The Plaintiff does not, by obtaining an order to amend, between the time of giving notice of a motion for the production of documents and its being heard, deprive himself of his right to their production.

The Defendant, by his answer, admitted the possession of certain documents, and the Plaintiff gave notice of a motion for their production. Before the motion came to be heard, the Plaintiff obtained an order to amend his bill.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Dixon now moved for the production of the documents.

Mr. Bloxam, contra. The Plaintiff having obtained an order to amend, cannot call for the production of the documents until the amended bill has been answered. The Defendant may now by his answer protect himself from discovery, and the Plaintiff, by his amendment, strike out the only equity on which his right to production depended. He cited De la Torre v. Bernales (4 Mad. 396).

[265] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] overruled this objection and ordered the production of some of the documents.

See Goulthwaite v. Rippon, 1 Beavan, 54, and Martin v. Fust, 8 Sim. 199.

[265] RIGBY v. RIGBY. April 3, 1843.

Traversing note, obtained ex parte by the Plaintiff, with notice that the Defendant's answer had been sworn, discharged, but the Defendant ordered to pay the costs.

The answer of the Defendant had been sworn in October 1842, but the Defendant had neglected to file it.

On the 28th of February 1843 the Plaintiff's solicitor, having notice of the circumstance, applied for and obtained the traversing note under the Twenty-first and Twenty-second General Orders of August 1841. (Ord. Can. 170.) This he did without giving notice to the Defendant.

Mr. Kindersley applied to discharge the order for the traversing note, to enable the Defendant to file his answer to the bill.

Mr. James Parker, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] disapproved of the practice of retaining the answer after it had been sworn, but said that the Plaintiff's solicitor, knowing the answer was ready, ought not to have obtained the traversing note without first communicating with the other side. That [266] he could not allow the Defendant to be deprived of every opportunity of properly making his defence, and that he should remove the obstacle of the traversing note upon payment by the Defendant of the costs.

[266] EVANS v. SALT. April 4, 1843.

[Disapproved, De Beauvoir v. De Beauvoir, 1852, 3 H. L. C. 556; 10 E. R. 219. In re Rootes, 1860, 1 Dr. & Sm. 228; Hamilton v. Mills, 1861, 29 Beav. 198. De see In re Stevens' Trusts, 1872, L. R. 15 Eq. 114.]

Gift of personality to A. for life, and afterwards to his children, and in default to the heirs of B. Held, that the next of kin were entitled under the ultimate limitation.

James Salt, by his will, among other things, gave to Sarah Evans his reputed natural daughter, for her use and benefit only, during her life, and after her death to be equally divided amongst her children, the sum of £1000 3 per cent. consols, and also to James Salt Brown, his reputed natural son, the sum of £1000 3 per cent. consols for his own use and benefit, during his life, and at his death to his children equally, or in default of issue to the heirs of the above-named Sarah Evans.

James Salt Brown died on the 26th day of September 1842, without having been married; Sarah Evans died in September 1837. The Plaintiff William James Evans, her eldest son and heir at law, claimed the fund on which the £1000 had been invested.

The Petitioners, the next of kin of Sarah Evans, also claimed the fund under the ultimate limitation to the heirs of Sarah Evans.

Mr. Pemberton, in support of the petition, contended that having regard to the nature of the property, which was personality, the word "heirs" must be construed "next of kin."

[267] Mr. C. J. Selwyn, contra, contended that the heir of Sarah Evans was entitled. He cited Mounsey v. Blamire (4 Russ. 384) where a testatrix amongst other pecuniary legacies gave "to her heir £4000" and it was held that the heir at law and not the next of kin was entitled.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] was of opinion that the next of kin were entitled and ordered accordingly.

[267] LOCKHART v. HARDY. April 6, 27, 1843.

Under a decree in an administration suit, certain parties only were allowed to attend before the Master. The Master approved of some suits being instituted by the receiver who was to be indemnified out of the estate. The funds appearing by affidavit to be "abundantly ample," the Court ordered the institution of the suits, and the payment of costs out of the fund standing to the general credit of the cause, upon service on those only whom the Master had authorized to attend him on the reference.

John Wastie had devised estates upon trust for sale, in aid of his personal estate pay debts, and left other estate to descend on his heir at law; he died in 1825.

Four suits were instituted by creditors and legatees against the executor and heir at law of the testator, and a decree for taking the usual accounts was made in all the

The Master, under the authority of the fifty-first of the General Orders of the 3d April 1828 (Ord. Can. 22), determined that the parties entitled to attend the future proceedings were, the Plaintiff in the first cause, who was a legatee and had the benefit of the decree, the executor, and the heir at law.

[268] The heir at law presented a petition founded on the Master's report, that the receiver in the causes might be directed to institute certain suits which had been moved of by the Master, in the name of the executor, against debtors to the estate, that the executor should be indemnified out of the estate, that the receiver's costs should be allowed in passing his accounts, that it should be referred to the Taxing Master to tax the costs of obtaining the Master's report and of this application, and that the amount might be paid out of the fund in Court standing to the general credit of the four causes.

The only parties served with the petition were the Plaintiff in the first cause and the executor; but the order was made.

The registrar, on an application to draw up the order, objected, that all the parties in the four causes ought to have been served with the petition, since the general fund was to be affected.

Mr. Shapter in support of the petition now applied for the direction of the Court. Mr. Kindersley, for the Plaintiff and executor.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, that inasmuch as the executor and heir at law (if the estate was more than sufficient to meet the demands upon it) interested themselves in the fund; he would, if the petition were amended by stating that the funds were sufficient to pay the debts and legacies, and that statement was properly proved by affidavit, make the order as prayed without requiring the other parties to be served.

[269] It appearing by affidavit that the fund was upwards of £10,000 beyond the debts,

April 27. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] this day made the order.

[269] ENGLAND v. DOWNS. Dec. 14, 16, 17, 1842.

Goodwill of a victualler's business held, under the circumstances, to be incident to the stock and licence, and not to the premises on which the business was carried on.

Now carried on the business of a licensed victualler on premises held by her from year to year. Prior to her second marriage, she assigned her household goods, furniture, stock-in-trade, brewing utensils, and all other her effects upon trusts including her husband. She married. Held, that the goodwill of the trade, which was afterwards sold, passed by the deed as incident to the stock and licence, and not to the husband with the premises.

A husband carried on the business of a victualler with stock, &c., which formed the separate estate of the wife; in carrying on the business he disposed of the consumable stock, and substituted similar articles, and at a subsequent period he sold the stock and business. By the decree an account was directed against the husband of the stock comprised in the settlement and sold. Held, that the Master properly included the substituted stock in the account.

A witness was examined for the Plaintiff and cross-examined by the Defendant on other matters. Held, that his further evidence on behalf of the Defendant could not be received, upon an inquiry before the Master, except by order of the Court.

This case is reported (2 Beavan, 522), where it will appear, that on the 5th August 1818, Mrs. Mason, who married the Defendant Broad on the 26th of October following, executed a voluntary settlement of her property in favour of herself and the daughters of her first marriage, to the exclusion of the husband.

That the husband took possession of the property and carried on the business of a victualler until August 1822, when he sold the business, stock and effects.

His wife died in 1833, and the property was claimed under the settlement by three daughters; viz., the Plaintiff, Mrs. England, and the Defendants Mrs. Broad and Mrs. Davies. The claim was resisted on the ground that the settlement had been made without his knowledge, pending the time he was paying his ad-[270]-dress to Mrs. Broad, and was therefore a fraud on his marital rights and void. This defence failed, and it was referred to the Master to take an account of the household goods, stock-in-trade, and effects comprised in the indenture of settlement, which were sold by the Defendant John Thiery Broad in the month of August 1822, and of the value thereof, and of the application of the money arising from the sale thereof.

The Master by his report found, that the household goods, stock-in-trade, and effects conveyed or assigned by the indenture of settlement, or so much thereof as were then remaining in the possession of Mr. Broad, were, in August 1822, sold by him to Davies; but the stock-in-trade being fluctuating, he found that certain articles which were assigned by the indenture of settlement were not included among the articles so sold to Davies, and that other articles were then sold to him, which were not assigned by the said indenture. And he found that the household goods, stock-in-trade, and other effects sold to Davies were valued and appraised, together with the goodwill of the business on the premises in which the business of a retail victualler had been carried on at the sum of £902, 6s. 5d., which was made up as follows:

Household goods, furniture, fixtures	£408
Stock-in-trade	284
Goodwill of the business	210
	<hr/>

which sum was received by the Defendant, and with which (after deducting the debts of the Master charged him.

[271] The Defendant Broad took several exceptions to this report. By the fifth, he, in different forms, objected that the Master had not taken the accounts of the household goods, stock-in-trade, and effects comprised in the settlement and sold by the Defendant in 1822, &c., as directed by the decree.

By the sixth, he objected to the Master's having charged him with the £210. The seventh and eighth related to the evidence.

By the ninth, he complained that the Master had not allowed him the £210 for the goodwill.

The remainder referred to items of payments disallowed to the Defendant, amongst them a sum of £123 for money laid out during the time the trade was carried on, and £178 for the increased value of the stock beyond that belonging to Mrs. Broad on her marriage.

With respect to the goodwill of the business, it should be stated, that the business was carried on at premises in Cider House Passage, held from year to year, and that the house was not specifically assigned by the settlement; that if it passed at whereby, it must have passed under the words, "All and every her household goods, furniture, plate, linen, china, books, stock-in-trade, brewing utensils, and all other the effects of her, Joan Mason," set forth in the schedule, and no schedule was added to the deed.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Chandless, for Mr. Broad, in support of the exceptions, intended, that the Master had not taken the accounts directed. He was directed to take an account of the stock-in-trade comprised in [272] the settlement and sold by road, whereas he had included the after-purchased stock, and all the stock which existed at the time of the sale, whether included in the settlement or not, and had improperly charged the Defendant with the amount.

As to the goodwill they argued that the Cider House to which it was attached could not pass under the settlement by the words "stock-in-trade, &c., and other effects" in the schedule, and therefore did not become subject to the trusts, but passed to the husband jure mariti. In Portman v. Willis (Cro. Eliz. 386), it was held, on the authority of a case of 4 Ed. 6, Grants 51, that a leasehold would not pass by a grant of "omnia bona." That the goodwill was not therefore comprised in the settlement by the decree, and belonged to the husband.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Dixon, for the Plaintiff. The decree was taken in its recent form in order to save the expense of taking the account of receipts and payments, and the Master has pursued the direction of the Court according to the spirit and meaning of the decree and of the parties.

The inquiry directed, is not only of the goods, &c., comprised in the settlement, but of those sold, and as the stock-in-trade consisted of consumable articles, in lieu of, and from the produce of which, others were bought, it was considered that the substituted articles came in the place of those which were sold.

The goodwill depended on the fixtures, furniture, and stock, and not to the house in which the parties had no beneficial interest. If a party assigns all his property [273] and all benefit thereof, surely the goodwill which is attached to the property passes with it. Suppose the trustees had been called on to account as for a breach of trust, would they not be liable to account for the money received for the goodwill?

As to the several sums disallowed, the Defendant seeks to charge the trade debts, without accounting for the profits. He is made liable for the stock only, he cannot charge outgoings, unless he gives credit for his receipts.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Elderton, in the same interest for Mrs. Barton, another daughter, and Mr. Spurrier, for Mrs. Davies the third daughter.

Mr. Chandless, in reply. The decree only directs an account of the goods comprised in the settlement. If it had been the intention of the Court to charge the Defendant with the substituted goods, it would have been expressly declared by the decree. The goodwill is inseparable from the house, which did not pass by the deed.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This litigation has taken a course which has somewhat disappointed me. At the hearing, it seemed to be perfectly understood what was best and for the advantage of both these parties, and the accounts were directed with reference to that which was then understood to be, and was the only question between the parties.

This lady, during her widowhood, made a settlement, by which, amongst other things, the stock-in-trade and [274] furniture were assigned to trustees for her separate use, free from the control of any future husband; at a future period the stock-in-trade and the other things were to be sold, and the money was to be appropriated to certain uses and upon certain trusts. I think nothing could be more manifest, having regard to the nature of the property thus assigned, than that it never was or could have been intended, that precisely the same articles of which the stock-in-trade then consisted, were to continue subject to those trusts that were then created. It is impossible to suppose that the publican's stock-in-trade, as ale, beer, and such sort of things, the only value of which was in their consumption, and which would be entirely deprived of their value if not consumed, were to be preserved in specie so long as the trust continued.

Mrs. Broad, having executed this instrument, and being herself in possession of the whole of the property conveyed and assigned by it, intermarried with the Defendant Mr. Broad. Mr. Broad, if he did not know of the settlement previous to the marriage, did, very soon afterwards, become perfectly well aware of it, and acquiesced in it. I have a strong recollection of there being proof in the cause, of his having, upon more than one occasion, actually resorted to the trust deed, and acted under it. But though he acquiesced in it for certain purposes of his own, he nevertheless, for his own purposes, claimed title against it, and dealt with the property as if it were his own. The business was put an end to in the year 1822, and then the stock-in-trade was sold. The wife lived some years afterwards, and, upon her death, the persons beneficially interested, subject to her life interest, claimed to be entitled to the benefit of the money arising from this sale, and Mr. Broad having resisted their claim, this bill was filed for the purpose of having it established.

[275] It seemed to me perfectly clear, that the persons interested under that trust were entitled to have the benefit of it; and the Defendant having stated in his answer that he had sold the goods and stock-in-trade for a certain sum and made certain payments thereout, it was certainly a very natural object of every one interested, and desirous to see that these persons did not injure themselves by a prolonged litigation in a matter not likely to lead to any benefit to them, that the account there stated should, if possible, be taken to be the account between these parties, and that that matter might be settled on that footing. It would have been very well if it had been so, but not being able to come to an agreement at the time, the decree was made, in the form in which it now is. It is argued that the decree means simply that an account was to be taken of those specific and individual articles assigned by the deed and which had been sold. I am quite certain it was not in the contemplation of either of the Court or any of the parties that such could have been the meaning of the decree. The Master has taken an account of the goods, &c., sold in 1822, and states the value as consisting of the sum of money for which they were sold, and this the difficulty has arisen. He finds "that certain articles which were assigned by the said indenture of settlement, were not included among the articles so sold to said Richard Davies, and that other articles were then sold to him which were assigned by the said indenture."

That may be perfectly consistent with what was intended, and in this way:—carrying on the business in the ordinary way, some articles were substituted for others; certain articles being sold, the money arising therefrom was laid out in purchase of articles of the like kind, and which, as existing from time to time, constituted the stock-in-trade which was the subject of the trusts of the deed.

[276] I think that this, in substance, was what was meant:—during the time the trade was carried on, the stock-in-trade, of necessity, was known to the parties to consist of fluctuating articles, and in the course of that fluctuation, the stock-in-trade as it ultimately subsisted at the time of the sale, did not consist of the same articles as the stock-in-trade at the time of the marriage, or when the deed was executed, still it was that stock-in-trade which was contemplated by the deed, and intended to be the subject of the trusts of the deed.

I think, therefore, that it was right in the Master to come to the conclusion which he did on that subject. This applies to the first six exceptions.

As to the ninth exception, the Master has allowed as against the Defendant the sum of £210, being that part of the purchase-money which was paid by the purchaser for the goodwill of the trade. Mr. Chandless has experienced a difficulty, which I believe everybody feels, in accurately defining what is meant by the expression, "the goodwill of a trade;" it is not at all easy to do it. Here is a trade carried on upon premises by means of certain stock-in-trade and furniture, which are by a settlement set apart to the separate use of the wife, the husband not being entitled in any way to interfere therein. The business is carried on in a house which has a licence (which licence creates some difference between the goodwill of a publican's trade and that of other trades), the husband is not to interfere with the furniture or with the stock-in-trade which is to be for the separate use of the wife, and the wife possesses on those premises the stock-in-trade and the furniture; by the use of that, she obtains a certain custom and the probability of the continuance of that custom. This, in one way of looking at it, is the goodwill. It is the chance or probability that custom will be had at a certain place of business in consequence of the way in which that business been previously carried on. By this deed that business was to be carried on by the use of the furniture and the stock-in-trade which belonged separately to the wife, and with which the husband was not to interfere. I must own my opinion is, that the goodwill belonged to the wife, and was a part of that settled property, as annexed and incident to the things which were comprised in the deed, and that whether the particular interest she had in the leasehold premises was distinctly comprised in the deed or not.

As to the other exceptions, I think there are considerable difficulties. The question is not whether a trust of a fluctuating property is to extend to that, which from time to time is substituted for it; but whether such a trust must not be considered as maintained, if the value of the original settled property is kept up.

Here the wife was entitled for her separate use, she might have received the profits of this trade, and either spend them or lay them out in increasing the capital. If she laid out those profits in increasing the capital, which would be for her separate use, could her husband, at any time, have the right to say that the increase of capital should be for his benefit, and not continue for the purpose for which she intended to increase the capital belonging to the trade? Mr. Chandless very forcibly put the case, how would it be as to the wife herself. If the wife herself had received the different sums of money which became due in the course of the business, and instead of spending that money, had thought fit to lay it out upon increasing the capital, would it not have been necessary for her to say, "I intend this increase of the capital as a permanent investment for the benefit of the trust?" I think that is a question of some [278] difficulty. I do not think that is quite so clear as it has been considered to be in argument.

There is this specialty in the case, that this increase of capital was not, in point of fact, created by the wife or by her agent, but by the husband claiming, in opposition to the wife and to her exclusion, the possession of this property for his own benefit. Could he, by interfering with the trust property in this way, appropriate to his own use the profits arising from the trade, and if he could not, does it make any difference whether he laid it out in the purchase of additional capital or not? I think there is some considerable difficulty in that question.

The two sums of £178 and £123 require further consideration. The remaining exceptions depend upon Mr. Broad being entitled to charge for the outlay which he made. It is perfectly clear that if an account had been directed to be taken of profits, he would have had the benefit of that outlay. The injustice which is alleged on his part would cease, if he has been in the receipt of profits exceeding the several sums charged. On the other hand, if all the profits he has received in carrying on the trade have been less than the sums of money with which he is sought to be charged, is that right? I cannot say I think it is.

This brings me to the consideration whether, in point of fact, the decree does do strict justice between the parties, whether by directing an account to be taken of the capital and of the application thereof, you really do that which is necessary to be done before strict justice can be administered between these parties, whether you ought not to take an account of what he has received and paid, charging him with the amount of the receipts and giving him the benefit of payments in [279] the shape of just allowances, and taking from him everything but that which he has expended, and can prove that he has expended. I have some difficulty how to deal with those exceptions, and I think I must look over these papers and take a little time to consider how they are to be dealt with. I think the first eight must be overruled. I must dispose of the rest until this cause has been heard on further directions, that I shall then see the whole merits of the case.

The cause was heard on further directions, when it was, amongst other things, argued that as the suit had become necessary by the conduct of Mr. Broad, he ought to pay all the costs consequent upon the litigation, and, amongst them, the costs of the Co-defendants.

Dec. 17. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think that I cannot give any costs of this suit to those who are in the same interest with the Plaintiff. I must not make the Plaintiff pay for them, and I do not think it is a case in which Broad ought to be called on to pay them over.

With respect to the trustees, I do not think they are entitled to costs, because they have utterly neglected their trust, they executed the trust deed, and ought to have taken care that the schedule was annexed; their neglect of that duty has been followed by such very serious consequences, I think it is utterly impossible to give them any costs of these proceedings. There is certainly some doubt with respect to the other points, and I shall be sorry if it should turn out to be necessary to investigate the facts further.

This gentleman carried on the business which was settled on his wife, and the proceeds of which, after [280] keeping up the stock, would be at her disposal. He might have consented to her husband's applying the profits to his own use, or he might have said "it shall be laid out in increasing the stock." Under the circumstances, it does not appear to me to be unreasonable to presume that the increase of stock was made by the application of what constituted the profits; was the increase of stock subject to the trusts of the settlement? That is one of the questions of looking at it. It would be very difficult to permit the husband, who was carrying on this trade, selling the stock, receiving money, and applying it in the purchase of other stock-in-trade, to say, "I have spent so much money in the business, I must recoup out of the stock." I scarcely know on what principle that could be done. The exceptions as to the sum of £123, contain an express assertion that he is entitled to be re-imbursed for money laid out during the time the trade was carried on, and I find very great difficulty in allowing it. Then there is the sum of £178 which he claims as being the value of the increased stock, malt, and things of that sort, got up for the purpose of carrying on the business; how can he have that, if the whole of the stock was subject to the trust? There is a difficulty in allowing that.

There are other sums of money, amounting in the whole to £44, 2s. 7d., which were debts in the trade and sums of money which he had to pay at a time when it appears he could not, by any means have been receiving the proceeds of the stock-in-trade. I confess I feel some difficulty in saying in strictness he might not be entitled to those sums of money. I must, if the parties cannot agree, consider the matter further, and give a decision upon it. Without however binding myself, I think I may say that my impression is against the exceptions as to the £123 and £178, and rather in favour of the others, unless it can be shewn the Defendant had no means of paying them.

NOTE.—The case was afterwards compromised.

Another point relating to evidence was raised upon these exceptions, which is as follows:—Mr. Davies had been examined in the cause on the part of the Plaintiff, and cross-examined by the Defendant Broad, but the points to which he was cross-examined by the Defendant did not arise out of his examination-in-chief.

Upon the enquiries before the Master, two affidavits of Mr. Davies were taken in evidence on behalf of the Defendant Broad, but no order of the Court had been obtained for leave to examine him upon the enquiries, the Master received his evidence, which was also stated to be on points on which he had been previously examined.

Mr. Chandless contended that as he had not been examined in chief by the Defendant, an order was not necessary. He cited Melford v. Peters (8 Sim. 104) in which it was held, that a witness who had been examined before the Master may be examined before the Master for the other side without the leave of the Court.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Dixon, contra, contended that the case cited did not apply, for the witness had been examined on the part of the Plaintiff, though nominally he had been cross-examined only. That the [282] ordinary rules of law therefore prevail which was, that witnesses examined in the cause cannot be examined by the Master without leave of the Court.

Smith v. Althus (11 Ves. 564), Willan v. Willan (Cooper, 291), Smith v. Gell (2 Swan. 264), Rowley v. Adams (1 Myl. & K. 545) were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The 7th and 8th exceptions relate to the evidence rejected by the Master, and upon that I have no objection whatever. The Defendant says that this witness had not been examined on his and that he was merely cross-examined. This however was not cross-examination upon the matters to which the Plaintiff had examined the witnesses, but was a direct examination-in-chief, though under interrogatories which were nominally cross-interrogatories. It was a direct examination-in-chief of this witness by the Defendant, to establish his own case, as alleged by the answer; and that being so, I am of opinion, according to the ordinary rules and practice of the Court, not that the witness was excluded, but that the Master was not at liberty to examine this witness to receive his further evidence without the leave of the Court.

If, subsequent to the time the witness had put in his examination to the interrogatories filed in the cause, it had been discovered that new evidence could be given by him and it was therefore desirable to examine him, for the purpose of bringing forward such new evidence in support of the case made by the Defendant, it would have been easy for the Defendant to have applied to the Court, stating and shewing such circumstances as [283] would have induced the Court to give leave to have that examination, and he might then have had it.

It has been stated, that the Master being of that opinion, gave an opportunity to the party to apply to the Court, which he did not think fit to take advantage of, but he preferred running the risk of succeeding upon exceptions to the Master's report.

The 7th and 8th exceptions must therefore be overruled. (See Whitaker v. Wright, Hare, 321.)

[283] WATSON v. PARKER. Feb. 16, 22, 1843.

voluntary covenant is sufficient to support a creditor's suit against the representatives of the covenantor.

covenanted with B. to transfer stock into the names of C. and D., or some other person to be named by A., upon trust for B., his wife and issue. Afterwards B. became absolutely entitled to the fund. In a suit by B. against the representatives of A. to obtain satisfaction out of his estates in respect of the covenant, Held, that C. and D. were not necessary parties.

This case came on upon demurrer to the whole bill for want of equity and for want of parties.

The bill in substance alleged, that a Mr. Oswald married in 1811, and that previous to the marriage, Thomas Shipman, being intimately acquainted with both parties, agreed with them that in the event of the marriage being solemnised he would make such provision for them and their issue as mentioned in the indenture hereinafter stated.

[284] That in pursuance of the agreement, Shipman, by deed dated the 20th of August 1811, after reciting that previous to the marriage he had "promised and agreed that in case such marriage should take place he would make a provision for the said Sarah Simson and the issue of such marriage, in consideration of such marriage," and Shipman, "for the better confirming the said promise and engagement made by him, and for the making and securing a settlement and provision for the said Sarah Oswald and the issue of such marriage, and in consideration of the sum of 10s.," &c., covenanted with Oswald and wife, that he would, in his lifetime or by his last will and testament, give, direct, limit and appoint unto the said Thomas Oswald and Sarah his wife, and George Lee and Joseph Thorpe Shipman, or unto some other person or persons to be by him the said Thomas Shipman in such will or settlement named, the full sum of £3000 of 5 per cent. Navy annuities, upon trust for the wife, husband, and the issue of the marriage.

According to the statements of the bill the husband alone became, in the events which happened, entitled to the fund.

Shipman died without having performed this covenant; and this, which was a creditor's suit, was instituted against his representatives, to enforce its performance out of the testator's real and personal assets. Lee and Joseph Shipman were not made parties to the bill.

To this bill, the Defendant (the executor and devisee in trust of the testator) demurred for want of equity, and for want of parties.

Mr. Steere, in support of the demurrer.

[285] By the Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3, s. 4) no action shall be brought whereby "to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage," &c., "unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought or some memorandum or note thereof shall be in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised."

Previous, therefore, to this marriage there appears to have been no agreement in writing; there was therefore a mere nudum pactum which gave no cause of action. Wain v. Warlters (5 East, 10); another objection to it is, that the consideration must appear on the face of the agreement.

If no binding obligation existed at the time of the marriage, no subsequent recognition would give it validity. In Randall v. Morgan (12 Ves. 67) a question arose whether a letter written after marriage, sufficiently recognised an agreement before marriage to give a marriage portion; and Sir W. Grant observed (page 73) "Supposing, however, that this letter refers to some parol promise before the marriage, I doubt extremely, whether this would be sufficient to entitle the Court to construe this into an acknowledgment of a debt; for the promise being in itself nullity, producing no obligation, a written recognition, after the marriage, would give it no validity. Otherwise the construction of the fourth section of the statute would be just the same as the seventh, which requires only that a trust shall be manifested by writing. Upon that clause it is not necessary, that the trust shall be constituted by writing. It is sufficient to shew [286] by written evidence the existence of the trust. But the fourth clause requires the very agreement to be in writing, and signed by the party, to be charged therewith."

The covenant is purely voluntary, and the covenantee would recover merely nominal damages at law: it cannot therefore be made the foundation of a creditor's suit in equity.

Lee, also, to whom the money is to be paid, and who is the legal owner, is a necessary party to this suit.

Mr. C. Hall, in support of the bill.

This is not the case of a voluntary engagement on the part of a stranger: the consideration of marriage is a valuable consideration, and sufficient to support such an agreement.

Whether the agreement prior to the marriage could be enforced or not, still the deed executed after the marriage imports a consideration, and an action at law could be sustained on it, Tuffnell v. Constable (7 Ad. & E. 798); the Plaintiff is therefore in equity, entitled to have satisfaction out of the assets.

Lee and Joseph Shipman, having no duties to perform, are not necessary parties to the suit; the covenant is not entered into with them, and it is to transfer to them or some other persons, to be named by Thomas Shipman.

Mr. Steere, in reply.

[287] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. As to the demurrer, for want of parties, I am of opinion that it cannot be sustained. I will not decide the demurrer for want of equity, until I have read the case of Randall v. Morgan.

Feb. 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case stood over, in order that I might have an opportunity of reading the case of Randall v. Morgan which was referred to in the argument. Having read the case, I am of opinion that it has no bearing on the question raised by this demurrer.

By the bill it appears, that the testator, by deed, signed, sealed, and delivered, promised and agreed with Thomas Oswald and his wife, that he would, in his lifetime or by his last will, direct and appoint to certain persons, or to persons to be by him named, the full sum of £3000 5 per cent. Navy annuities, upon the trusts and for the purposes in the deed mentioned.

By the promise and agreement under seal, a covenant is constituted; but the defendant contends that the deed was executed without any consideration, and that no damages, or only nominal damages could be recovered for a breach of the covenant; and therefore they argue, that the Plaintiff cannot sustain a suit framed as this is. There are however several cases in which a breach of covenant to do a particular act has been held to constitute a debt, as in the case of Musson v. May (3 V. & B. 194), where Mr. Justice Williams held it to be settled, that if a covenant is broken, though the damages are [288] unliquidated, the covenantee is a specialty creditor; and in the case of Wright v. Wright (2 Myl. & K. 769), where the testator had entered into a voluntary covenant to settle certain leasehold and copyhold lands, it was held by Lord Cottenham that the Plaintiffs, who claimed under the covenant, were to be considered as creditors, and that although (as volunteers) they were to be postponed to all creditors for valuable consideration, they were entitled to be paid out of the assets in due order; and it was referred to the Master to enquire into the amount of the damage they had sustained.

I am therefore of opinion that, even supposing the deed to have been voluntary, the bill may be sustained, and that the demurrer must be overruled. (See Clough v. Lambert, 10 Sim. 174.)

[288] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. FOORD. Feb. 20, 21, 22, 1843.

Lease of charity property for ninety-nine years, at a fixed rent, containing no contract to repair or lay out any money thereon, set aside.

Building lease of charity property for more than ninety-nine years, cannot stand unless there be some special grounds on which it can be protected.

Some property at Whitstable, was held by trustees of a charity for the poor of the parish.

In 1791, the trustees demised the charity property, consisting of about half an acre of land, a public-house called the Hoy, and two cottages and a stable, for ninety years, at a yearly rent of 20s. The demise was [289] expressed to be made in consideration of a former lease therein mentioned to be cancelled, and of the premises being repaired, but no evidence was given in the cause of that being the fact.

The present value was £60 a year.

This information, filed without a relator, sought to set aside the lease for ninety-nine years, and also the under-leases which had been granted, but the latter part of the relief was, in the course of the argument, abandoned.

It appeared that during the progress of the suit, Mr. Foord died and his representatives having proposed a compromise of the suit, a petition was presented for the purpose of effecting it; but the trustees of the charity opposed the arrangement, thinking it would be disadvantageous to the charity. In consequence, not only was a bill of revivor filed, but a supplemental bill, stating all the matters as to the compromise, and again putting in issue the very points raised by the original cause.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Blunt, in support of the information.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Shebbeare, for the trustees, supported the information. They cited The Attorney-General v. Kerr (2 Beavan, 420), and The Attorney-General v. Attingham (3 Beavan, 91).

Mr. Tinney, Mr. Elderton and Mr. Dixon, for the sub-lessees.

[290] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Simpson, for the representatives of Foord.

Feb. 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Upon the real question in the case, I am of opinion that the lease of 1791 cannot stand. The only ground upon which it was contended that it could be sustained was, that it contains certain recitals, which, if true, would shew that there was a consideration given for this lease, a consideration which would have been beneficial to the charity. It is not a building lease, and one of the rules laid down in this Court has been, that a building lease for longer term than ninety-nine years cannot stand, unless there be some special ground on which it can be protected. This is a lease for ninety-nine years, containing no covenants to keep the premises in repair, and no covenants as to laying out any money upon them: I am therefore of opinion, that it cannot stand.

The Attorney-General does not desire to disturb the sub-lessees, and therefore they will retain their interest. The only question as to them is whether they are entitled to costs; I cannot say that I think they are entitled to costs; this is not a case in which costs can be ordered to be paid out of the charity, and they have made out a case to entitle them to costs as against Mr. Foord.

There is another question raised with regard to the costs, which involves a matter in great perplexity. This cause having been at issue, a proposal was made by the representatives of Mr. Foord to compromise the suit. They were willing to compromise the suit on certain terms. The Attorney-General thought, and after all that has taken place, I am not sure the Attorney-General was not right, that it would be expedient, and for the benefit of the charity, to stop the litigation, and obtain for the charity the increased rent for the future, together with the costs of the suit, by which means the beneficial objects of the charity would be immediately brought into exercise; but the trustees represented that this compromise would be very disadvantageous; that the value of the property was such, that to accept the increased rent for the remainder of the time would be injurious to the charity. In that state of things it seems to have been absolutely necessary that the matter should undergo some subsequent investigation; perhaps by a reference to the Master to enquire whether it was beneficial; but the course adopted was to bring the matter to a hearing. If publication had then passed, which I suppose it had, witnesses could not have been examined in the original cause without an order; but no order was obtained, and not only was a bill of revivor filed to bring Mr. Foord's representatives before the Court, but also a bill of supplement, stating all the matters as to the compromise, and putting in issue again those very points raised in the original cause. It has been stated, that these proceedings took place for the purpose of having the decision of the Court on the costs of the petition. I confess, after hearing all that has been said, that I am by no means satisfied that it was necessary. It was clearly put in issue in the original information that the value was above £60 a year. The answer stated it was £44 a year. The trustees alleged that the answer was wrong, that if the information were proceeded in, it would establish that the value was greater. All that might have been proved in the original information, and I am very much at a loss to discover on what ground the representatives of Mr. Foord are to be called upon to pay the costs of that proceeding. [292] I certainly do not think that it is a sufficient justification of the proceeding, to say that that was necessary for the purpose of bringing the point to a decision. The point in issue was the value, and the question raised by supplement was the costs of the petition, which might have been determined on the point being brought on with the cause.

I find some difficulty in dealing with those costs. I think that the right course will be, that the costs of the supplemental information be deducted from the costs of the original information which Mr. Foord must pay, the costs which then remain due to the Attorney-General should be thrown on the charity.

In the present state of the thing, I cannot say the trustees were wrong in suggesting and bringing forward the point. If they had been, they ought to have been personally charged with the cost; but I cannot say I think they were. (See Attorney-General v. Pargeter, 6 Beav. 150.)

[293] COCKELL v. PUGH. March 3, 16, 1843.

The executor of a surviving trustee declined stating whether he would or not perform the will, and neglected for thirty-one days after notice to transfer trust property standing in the name of his testator. Held, that he was a trustee within the Statute, 1 W. 4, c. 60, and a transfer was ordered to new trustees.

The Court, if perfectly satisfied, will make an order to transfer under the Trustee Act without a reference.

Under a marriage settlement, the sums of £7694 consols, and £4000, were vested in Dampier, Hopkins and William Pugh, upon the usual trusts.

The suit was instituted in 1833, respecting the sum of £4000 only. Pending the suit, Dampier and Hopkins died. Pugh, who survived, had by his answer admitted the trust; he afterwards absconded, and died abroad. He appointed Buckley Pugh his sole executor, who, as executor of the surviving trustee, having applied to in writing, in August 1842, to transfer the trust fund to the new trustees appointed under the settlement, declined to say whether he would or not obey the will, and stated he would prefer the matter taking its own course.

A petition being presented by the parties beneficially interested, it was referred to the Master to ascertain whether William Pugh was a trustee of the sum of £7694 in the meaning of the Act, and for whom.

The Master found in the affirmative, and a petition was now presented to confirm the report, and that the secretary of the bank might transfer the fund to the new trustees of the settlement.

Mr. Rogers, in support of the petition, relied on Ex parte Winter (5 Russ. 284), Ex parte Hagger (1 Beavan, 98).

Mr. James Parker and Mr. W. H. Clarke, contra, objected that the reference to the Master ought not to have [294] been whether William Pugh was a trustee, but whether William Buckley Pugh was a trustee. They cited, in the matter of Anderson (L. & Co. 27).

Mr. Rogers, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The objection to the reference is a matter of form. The reference is made for the satisfaction of the Court, and the Court is perfectly satisfied of the facts, the order may be made without any reference, or the reference will be confined to those facts only, as to which the Court does not feel satisfied without a reference.

I will look at the cases cited.

March 16. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] made the order for the reference, observing that there appeared to be no entry in the registrar's book of the matter before Lord Lyndhurst.

[295] EARL NELSON v. LORD BRIDPORT. April 1, 6, 1843.

When a party takes his state of facts into the Master's office, and obtains leave to examine witnesses and completes the examination, his opponent's state of facts may, at any time before publication, be amended by leave of the Master.

The Plaintiff and Defendant took their states of facts into the Master's office. The Plaintiff completed the examination of his witnesses, and was about to obtain an order to pass publication, when the Defendant, with the Master's permission, carried into the Master's office an amended state of facts. Held, not irregular, and a motion in the alternative to suppress it and the subsequent proceedings, or that the Defendant might pay the costs occasioned, was refused with costs.

Certain inquiries had been directed by the decree, and the cause being in the Master's office, the Plaintiff, on the 8th of December 1841, carried in his state of facts, and on the 10th of February 1842 it was decided that evidence should be taken in support of it.

The Defendants carried in their state of facts on the 29th of April 1842, and on the 6th of July 1842 it stood over to save expense by admissions.

On the 8th of August 1842 the Plaintiff served an order which he had previously obtained for an interpreter, and on the same day commenced examining his witnesses, at an expense of £720, he had brought over from Sicily. Having completed the examination, the Plaintiff, on the 23d of January 1843, gave notice of motion for publication, but before the motion had been heard, and on the 10th of February 1843, the Defendants carried an amended state of facts into the Master's office, which was permitted by the Master, who, on the 16th of March 1843, certified that a commission was necessary to prove the amended state of facts. On this certificate, an order for a commission was obtained on the same day; and, on the same day, the Plaintiff's motion to pass publication was refused; but the Defendants were ordered to pay the costs.

It was now moved, on behalf of the Plaintiff, that the amended state of facts, the certificate and the order for [296] a commission might be suppressed, or that the Defendants might be put on terms to pay the Plaintiff's costs of joining in the commission, and of the proceedings under the same and occasioned by the amendments.

Mr. Tinney and Mr. Gardner, in support of the motion, contended, that after the Plaintiff had commenced the examination of his witnesses in August, it was no longer competent for the Defendants to carry in an amended state of facts, and thus alter the issue tendered by them, and render nugatory the evidence taken on behalf of the Plaintiff, who might have been proceeding under a wrong impression as to the issue raised by the Defendants. They argued that such was the usual practice of the Masters' offices, and in conformity with the rule, that after issue joined no amendment is permitted.

Secondly, they insisted, that if, by the indulgence of the Court, these proceedings were to stand and the Defendants were to retain their commission to examine their witnesses in Sicily, they ought to indemnify the Plaintiff the expenses he had been put to, or would be put to, in consequence of the negligence and delay of the Defendants, and who, coming for an indulgence, ought to pay for it. They cited Lord Clarendon's Orders. (Beames' Orders, 192.)

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Bowyer, contra, argued that there was no such rule of practice as that alleged by the Plaintiff, and that until the evidence had been made known, either party was at liberty, with the sanction of the Master, to bring in an amended state of facts, and to proceed to examine witnesses thereon. That if it were otherwise, one party, by un-[297]-due haste, might effectually prevent his opponent from properly bringing forward his case upon the enquiry.

That it was evident, that the negotiation as to admissions had caused the consideration of the Defendants' original state of facts by the Master, to be postponed and had created the delay; that it was not right that the Plaintiff, who was party to that proceeding, should now take advantage of the delay.

That the matter was properly within the discretion of the Master, who necessarily possessed an extensive control over the proceedings in his office; and that it did not appear that any extra expense had been or would be incurred by the Plaintiff.

Mr. Tinney, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is certainly a very unusual application, and one which does not, on the face of it, appear to me to be very reasonable. Here is a most important and complicated enquiry pending before the Master. Both parties have carried in their respective states of facts, one has examined witnesses, and, before the publication of the evidence, the Master, who has the conduct of this enquiry, has given leave to the other side to amend his state of facts, and has certified as to the propriety of issuing a commission to examine witnesses abroad, for the purpose of enabling the party to prove that amended state of facts, and upon the Master's certificate, an order has been obtained for issuing such commission.

This motion seeks to set aside the amended state of facts and the proceedings subsequent upon it, on the [298] ground of irregularity. Whether there has been an irregularity or not, is a matter which I certainly should not like to decide on my own judgment, without first enquiring as to the usual practice in the Master's office in that respect.

The Plaintiff's state of facts was taken into the Master's office on the 8th of December, and he obtained leave to examine witnesses in the ordinary course. He might have witnesses examined in London by procuring the attendance of his witnesses from abroad; but there was nothing to preclude either party from having a commission to examine their witnesses abroad.

No state of facts was brought into the office on behalf of the Defendants Lord and Lady Bridport until five months afterwards, namely till the 29th of April. Now if argument were to prevail, that a party is not entitled to amend a state of facts, when the other party has commenced the examination of his witnesses, then as the Plaintiff had commenced the examination of his witnesses on the 9th of December, Defendants would have been precluded bringing in any state of facts at all.

(THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS proceeded to state the circumstances of the case, which it is unnecessary to repeat, and proceeded):—

In this state of things, it is asked, in the first place, that Lord and Lady Bridport be precluded from alleging those facts which are necessary to establish their case for the enquiry. Under the circumstances which have taken place in this case, it is utterly impossible, and cannot be seriously thought of. It is then said that these proceedings are so irregular, that if the Defendants are desirous of being relieved therefrom, [299] they must pay all the costs; besides this, it is said that there has been very great and very unreasonable delay on the part of the Defendants. I will make some enquiries as to the course of proceeding before the Masters in these cases before I decide this case; but if one party thinks fit, and finds it for his advantage, in order to secure testimony which might or might not be in danger of being lost, to commence, with all the diligence he is master of, the examination of his witnesses, is he, from the moment he commences the examination of his witnesses, to be at liberty to preclude his opponents from bringing in an amended state of facts, any state of facts at all, and that, though he has given him no notice further than that which is usually given in the course of the examination? If he is, we must consider that rule, and the consequences which the Defendants desire to be relieved from. A state of facts may be amended over and over again according to the circumstances of the case. The Master, who, upon an enquiry of this kind, has a large discretion, which the Court is by no means disposed unnecessarily to interfere, may consider it necessary for the purpose of conducting the enquiry, and give leave to do it. Then the party who proceeds with diligence and with strict propriety in the examination of witnesses for himself, but without any constat on the part of the Master as to the regular period from which the parties shall be bound by their states of facts, or as to the parties are to be considered at issue, and without any intimation to the other side, by examining witnesses one day to have a right to preclude his opponent from bringing forward an important fact the next day? If that be the state of things, it certainly requires some consideration; I will enquire, but I have no doubt that I will refuse this motion in the terms in which it is made.

[300] With respect to the costs, I will consider how far the parties may be relieved from the consequences of any irregularity that has occurred. If there is to be a division, it will be directed for the purpose of giving a real, fair, and bonâ fide examination of witnesses to the satisfaction of both parties. Though granted for the benefit of one, still the other party must have the opportunity of attending with all the facilities.

I am strongly of opinion, that if the Plaintiff in this case is advised that he ought to bring forward a supplemental state of facts, to enable him to give evidence of something of which he was first apprized by the amendment, justice requires that he should have the opportunity of doing it. If the Defendants bring forward new facts by amendment, the Plaintiff must have an opportunity of meeting them; natural justice requires that he should have that opportunity. Anything contrary to that would seem to be so abhorrent to fair dealing that it could not be allowed.

Both sides are engaged in a contest of great complication and great difficulty, requiring close and exclusive attention for a long time; I do not wonder that the natural zeal which is engendered in the course of this matter should lead to some excess. It has been a great satisfaction to me to have heard from each side testimony in favour of fair dealing of the other.

I will endeavour to communicate with the Masters in the course of to-day, and I will mention the case on Wednesday.

[31] April 6. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I have had a communication with some of the Masters, and though I do not find among them a perfect conformity of practice, yet most of them say, distinctly, that there is not the same degree of irregularity in this proceeding, and that it has been quite in conformity with the practice of their offices; though there is some doubt on the part of other Masters, yet they all think that special circumstances may arise, which might make this mode of proceeding perfectly proper.

I have considered the case with all the attention that I could, and I certainly am of opinion, that under the circumstances of this case, it is in conformity with the practice in the Master's office to receive an amended state of facts before publication and to go into new evidence. The subject was discussed before Lord Eldon in a case of Willan v. Willan (19 Ves. 589; and see Napier v. Staples, 1 Molloy, 228). In that case publication had passed, and on the ground that publication had passed and the depositions had become known to all the parties, he was clearly of opinion, in conformity with what is now the ordinary practice, that there could not be a further examination without special leave of the Court; but it does not seem to have been stated by anybody, that there might not, at any time prior to the publication, have been an examination of witnesses, and, as preliminary to such examination, a statement shewing the facts which were to be the subject of that examination.

There was a case before Lord Cottenham, which has not been reported, which does not bear on this directly, but it certainly shews what is the view taken of the matters. It was a case of an enquiry as to the next of [302] kin, a state of facts having been carried in, witnesses had been examined on both sides, and the examination it would appear, entirely brought to a close; the evidence was not however taken on interrogatories, but on affidavits, which makes a great difference, because the production of every affidavit is the same as publication; the evidence having been gone through, and the Master being prepared to make his report, another fact was brought forward, and it was said that the parties were not then at liberty to prove it. The Master thought it was too late, and that he ought not to admit any fresh examination. In that state of circumstances application was made to Lord Cottenham, and he referred it back to the Master to review his report, thinking, that under the circumstances, a party ought not to be precluded from bringing forward fresh facts which were material to be enquired into. Certainly the case is not sufficiently strong to make the one an authority for the other, but it shews the view taken in a case of this kind.

On looking at this matter with all the attention I can give to it, I do not find any irregularity in the proceeding, and I must add further in this case, that if in the proceeding there had been a deviation from what might be considered the ordinary practice of the Master's office, I think the special circumstances here were sufficient to justify it. It is perfectly clear to me, that after that meeting of the 6th of July 1842, it must have been in the expectation of everybody, that some further proceeding was to take place with reference to the state of facts brought in by Lord and Lord Bridport; whether that proceeding was postponed merely for the purpose of making whether admissions of documents could be made, or whether it was postponed for the purpose of considering, between the parties, what mode of proof on the subject of the inquiry at large was to be adopted, [303] still something, of necessity, was to be done, and if the parties could not come to an agreement respecting it, there must necessarily have been a further proceeding before the Master on the state of facts which was under his consideration on the 6th of July. That never was brought under his consideration at all. The other party could not, by proceeding to examine witnesses, preclude the Master from going into a subject, the consideration of which had been merely postponed, and preclude him from the right to have it fully investigated. I think that the matter was left in a state that gave to the other party a right to proceed; and if the Defendants, having that right, found they could proceed with greater advantage by amending their state of facts, I know of no rule and no principle of practice that would preclude them from so doing.

I am of opinion that this motion is entirely mistaken, and I think it must be refused with costs. At the same time justice must be done to the other side; I am not aware that it will be in the least degree necessary for me to make any order on the subject, but new allegations having been brought forward on the amended state of facts, there must, on that new matter, be a just, fair, and regular litigation between the parties; it being the right of the Plaintiff to put in a bill of particulars proper to meet the allegations now brought forward by Lord and Lord report. I do not think it will be necessary for me to interfere in the matter, but the Master entertains any scruple, upon an application made here, I should require strong reasons to induce me to refuse to the Plaintiff liberty to meet those new in every way that justice may require.

[304] CATTELL v. SIMONS. April 19, 24, 1843.

be receivable and payable by two parties, ordered to be mutually set off, without regard to the lien of the solicitors.

The Master of the Rolls has jurisdiction to direct costs which have been ordered by the Lord Chancellor to be paid by the Defendant to the Plaintiff to be set off against costs ordered by the Master of the Rolls, to be paid by the Plaintiff to the Defendant. The order may be obtained on motion, and the notice of motion may be given before the taxation.

The Lord Chancellor on the 8th of November ordered the Defendant to pay costs to the Plaintiff, but the order was not completed till the 23d of December. The Master of the Rolls on the 15th of December ordered the Plaintiff to pay costs to the Defendant, and on the 19th the Plaintiff offered to set off the costs. The Defendant in January following issued an attachment for the costs. Held, that the Plaintiff, notwithstanding he was in contempt, might, under these circumstances, have to set off the costs.

This case, which is reported in a former volume (5 Beavan, 396), now came on for a motion by the Plaintiffs, that costs ordered by the Lord Chancellor to be paid by the Defendant to the Plaintiffs might be set off against costs ordered by the Master of the Rolls to be paid by the Plaintiffs to the Defendant. The circumstances conveniently appear by the following chronological statement:—

On the 8th of November 1842 the Lord Chancellor ordered the Defendant to pay costs to the Plaintiffs.

On the 8th of December the minutes being mentioned to the Lord Chancellor, an order was directed to be made.

On the 15th of December the Master of the Rolls ordered the Plaintiffs to pay costs to the Defendant Flecknoe.

On the 19th of December the Plaintiffs gave notice to the Defendant that they were willing to set off the costs they had to pay against those they had to receive.

[305] On the 23d of December the minutes of the Lord Chancellor's order were read.

On the 11th of January following, the Defendant issued an attachment against the Plaintiffs for £10, 16s. 4d. part of costs under the Master of the Rolls' order.

On the 13th of January the Defendant issued a subpoena for £24, 19s. 8d., the remaining costs under the same order.

On the 14th of January the subpoena for costs was served on the Plaintiffs, and on the same day the Plaintiffs gave this notice of motion to set off the costs.

On the 16th of January the Plaintiffs' costs under the Lord Chancellor's order were taxed at £38, 14s.

Under these circumstances, £35, 16s. being due from the Plaintiffs to the Defendant and £38, 14s. from the Defendant to the Plaintiffs, this motion was now brought on.

Mr. Teed and Mr. W. T. S. Daniel, in support of the motion.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Chandless, contra, objected, first, that interlocutory costs should not be ordered to be set off so as to defeat the right of the solicitor; secondly, that such an application ought not to be made by motion; thirdly, that the notice of motion could not be given until the amounts had been ascertained by taxation; and, finally, that the Plaintiffs being in contempt, could not be heard in support of a motion; and lastly, that the Lord Chancellor having by his order specifically directed that the costs should be paid by the Defendant to the Plaintiffs, this Court had no jurisdiction to alter or vary that direction.

[306] Taylor v. Popham (15 Ves. 72), Ex parte Rhodes (Ibid. 539), Wright v. Mide (1 Sim. & S. 266), and Hawkins v. Hall (4 Myl. & Cr. 282) were cited.

Mr. Teed, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Where a party owes another £35, 16s. for costs, and at the same time is entitled to receive £38, 14s. from him for other costs, nothing would seem more reasonable than that these sums should be set off one against the other. Several objections have, however, been made to this application.

First, that it interferes with the rights of the solicitor, but I have no doubt whatever of the rule, that the lien of the solicitor for costs, is not to interfere with the rights of the parties. I have already had occasion to consider the point; and I think the case is reported. (Bastree v. Watson, 2 Keen, 713.)

Secondly, it is said, that the application ought not to be made by motion, but I cannot see why the Court is not to proceed upon motion; or why the parties are to be put to the trouble and expense of attachments, and other proceedings, to work out their rights, when there is a plain equity to have the costs set off. If I had been aware of the circumstances when the order was made here, I should, if I had jurisdiction, have ordered the costs to be set off. I am of opinion, that the application is not improper by motion.

Thirdly, it is said, that the Plaintiffs' costs had not been ascertained until after the notice of motion had been given, but I am of opinion, that it was not necessary to wait until the amount of the costs had been ascertained.

The fourth objection is, that an attachment had issued against the Plaintiffs prior to the notice of motion, and that being in contempt, the Plaintiffs cannot be heard. I think, however, under the circumstances, the objection ought not to prevail, seeing that the offer to set off was made on the 19th of December, that the Lord Chancellor's order was not ultimately settled until the 23d of December, and that the attachment was issued on the 11th of January. (See King v. Bryant, 3 Myl. & Cr. 191, and Wilson v. Bates, Id. 197.)

The last is the only serious objection, namely, that the order asked for will interfere with the Lord Chancellor's order, and that the Plaintiffs ought to have applied to the Lord Chancellor on the subject, when the matter was before him on the 23d of December. It does appear to me, that the Lord Chancellor had jurisdiction over the matter, and might either have ordered the costs to be set off, or have directed that the order should not be carried into execution, until an opportunity had been given to the Plaintiffs to apply; I must reserve the point as to the interference with the Lord Chancellor's order.

April 24. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. By an order made by the Lord Chancellor, the Defendant was ordered to pay costs (the amount of which has been ascertained to be £38, 14s.) to the Plaintiffs. By an order made at the Rolls, the Plaintiffs were ordered to pay costs (the amount of which has been ascertained to be £35, 16s.) to the same Defendant. [308] The Defendant, who has not paid the £38, 14s. due from him, claims to be entitled to compel the Plaintiffs to pay the £35, 16s. due to him. And the Plaintiffs ask, that one set of costs may be set off against the other, and that the Defendant may not be permitted to enforce the payment of the costs due to him, without paying the costs due from him.

It appears to me, that in making this application, the Plaintiffs do not seek to vary the order made by the Lord Chancellor in their favour, but claiming against the Defendant the duty of his obedience to that order, and admitting in favour of the Defendant the duty of their own obedience to the order made here, they ask, that the Defendant may not be at liberty to enforce obedience to the order made here, without, on his part, obeying the Lord Chancellor's order, and they offer to accept what is due to them in satisfaction pro tanto of what is due from them. They do not ask for the costs of this application, which (under the circumstances to which I adverted at the time when the motion was made), I should not have been disposed to grant. I think that the order must be made to set off the costs due to the Defendant.

under one order, against an equal amount of the costs due from the Defendant under the other order. (See also Harmer v. Harris, 1 Russ. 155; Taylor v. Cook, Younge, 401.)

[309] LLOYD v. CLARK. April 20, 21, 28, 1843.

B., very soon after coming of age, was induced by C. D., his superior officer, to accept bills for £3000 at two months, for his accommodation, which were handed by C. D. to E. F., a moneylender, in payment of a debt of £2590. E. F., who was privy to the transaction, afterwards agreed to arrange the renewal of these and another bill for £500 for twelve months in consideration of A. B.'s promissory note for £2500 payable in three years, which sum E. F. charged for his expence and trouble. E. F. was, under the circumstances, restrained till the hearing, from suing for the £2500.

In this case the common injunction had been obtained for want of answer, training the Defendant from proceeding at law on certain negotiable securities.

The answer having been filed, a motion was now made to dissolve the injunction.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Bates shewed cause.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Daniel, in support of the motion to dissolve.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS postponed giving judgment.

April 28. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case, the Plaintiff alleges, that the Defendant Mr. Clark has obtained from him several securities for money, to the amount altogether of about £6257, 10s., and by his bill prays, that it may be declared that the securities were obtained from him by the fraud and imposition of Mr. Clark, and that the same may be delivered up to be cancelled; and that Mr. Clark, and also Mr. Argent, into whose hands one of the securities has come, may be restrained from prosecuting any [310] action against the Plaintiff in respect of the matters in question.

An injunction was obtained for want of answer, and the answers being filed, the Plaintiff shews cause upon the answer of Clark, why the injunction against him should not be dissolved. It is admitted that, upon the answer of Argent, the injunction against him cannot be sustained.

The case appears to be, that, before the month of June 1841, extensive pecuniary transactions took place between Capt. Byng and the Defendant Clark, who is a moneylender by profession; that Capt. Byng had the confidence of the Plaintiff, who is a cornet in the regiment in which Capt. Byng was captain; that Byng, being harassed and indebted to the Defendant Clark, procured the acceptance of the Plaintiff for his accommodation, and that under these circumstances, the Plaintiff, without any consideration paid to him, was induced, for the accommodation of Capt. Byng, his superior officer, and to facilitate Byng's transactions with Clark, to accept the bills of exchange for £1000 each, drawn upon him by Capt. Byng. These bills were delivered by Capt. Byng to Mr. Clark. Two of them were dated on the 1st of June 1841. The date of the third does not distinctly appear, the bill stating that it, as well as the other two, was dated the 12th of June, but the answer so stating the matter, as to leave it doubtful and to afford some reason for thinking, that it was dated two or three months earlier, and at a time when the Plaintiff had not attained his age of twenty-one years. However this may be, I think it cannot be doubted, upon the answers and the correspondence, that Mr. Clark well knew, that the acceptances had been given by the Plaintiff for the accommodation of Capt. Byng. The bills were payable in two months, they amounted together to £3000, and, according to the answer, the sums due from or payable by Capt. Byng to Mr. Clark, amounted together to £2590, and thus Mr. Clark was to obtain £410 for discount, or for forbearance for two months.

In this way, the Plaintiff became liable upon three bills of exchange, amounting in the whole to £3000. He had very recently attained his age of twenty-one years (in May 1841), and became alarmed, not only at the responsibility which he had incurred, but also lest his father should become acquainted with his conduct in these matters.

According to the answer, the Defendant Clark had negotiated one of the bills for £1000, and had deposited another of them for the sum of £700, but the other bill remained in his own hands. He told the Plaintiff, however, that all the bills were out in the world, or were in the hands of bona fide holders thereof. The Plaintiff became anxious to get in and conceal from his father the bills, all of which he supposed to have been negotiated and to be outstanding, and he offered the Defendant Clark any security in his power, if he would get in the bills, and he wished the bills (which he called bonds) to be consolidated into one.

On the same 23d of June, on which the Plaintiff expressed his wish that the bills should be consolidated, Mr. Clark says, that he advanced to the Plaintiff £450, and took from him an acceptance for £500; he has not stated when this acceptance was payable, but from the nature of the dealing, it must have been in a short time.

[312] The Plaintiff now, as surety for Capt. Byng, whose debt upon this transaction is stated to be several sums, amounting in the whole to £2590, and as debt himself to the amount of £450, had become liable to pay £3500, and he is said to have been desirous that the securities should be consolidated; Clark alleged some trouble in getting in the outstanding bills, and the expense of insurance, and he agreed to extend the time for payment of the £3500 for twelve months. For this agreement and the trouble and expense, he says, the Plaintiff agreed to give him a promissory note for £2500, payable at the end of three years; and, on the 31st of July 1841, the Plaintiff gave to Clark a promissory note for £3500 payable in twelve months, and another for £2500 payable in three years, and a warrant of attorney confess judgment was signed on the 5th of July.

The promissory note for £3500 has been given to the Defendant Argent, who is at liberty to sue the Plaintiff upon it; the note for £2500 is in the hands of the Clerk of Records and Writs for the inspection of the Plaintiff, and the Defendant says, that he is ready to deal with it as the Court may direct.

Not being in the possession of the note for £3500, and not being able, at present, and professing not to wish to sue on the note for £2500, it does not appear why, to these sums, the Defendant desires to dissolve the injunction, or how he can reasonably expect that the Plaintiff, whilst he remains liable to the suit of Argent, should, as the price of the injunction, pay the sum of £3500 into Court; but after carefully reading the answers and the admitted correspondence, I am of opinion, that the injunction as to these sums ought not to be dissolved. The answers appear to me to contain an unsatisfactory account of the transactions: several [313] of the statements appear to me to be inconsistent with the correspondence: it does not clearly appear, but may certainly be doubted, whether the Plaintiff was ever legally liable to pay one of the acceptances for £1000, the giving up of which was part of the consideration for the note for £3500: it appears to me, that upon further investigation, and upon evidence to be taken in the cause, it may not improbably appear, that the Plaintiff was induced to give the note, by misrepresentation as to the extent of his previous liability, and by misrepresentation as to the nature and extent of Clark's services, and I think that the fact of the note for £2500 being taken upon such a pretended reason, from a young man placed in the situation which Mr. Clark knew the Plaintiff to be, and acting under the influence of his superior officer, whose accommodation the whole transaction was commenced, throws such a suspicion upon it, that the Plaintiff ought to have an opportunity of proving the alleged facts before the Defendant can be permitted to sue him upon this note.

[314] GREENWOOD v. CHURCHILL. Feb. 3, 22, 23, April 29, 1843.

A. B. was entitled to a legacy, which was charged on real estates devised to C. D. by a deed, to which C. D. was a party, and which recited that it had been agreed that the legacy should remain on the security of the estate, assigned to E. F. A. B., without the concurrence of E. F., afterwards released the charge upon the estate, and A. B. and C. D. together afterwards mortgaged the estates, first Lord C. and afterwards to the Plaintiff, a judgment creditor, who released his judgment. Held, that the Plaintiff had priority over E. F. mortgage was made, "subject to prior incumbrances." Held, under the circumstances, that a prior equitable charge was not included, it being unknown to the mortgagee, and it not appearing to have been the intention of the mortgagors to include it.

Samuel Churchill the elder, by his will dated the 17th of April 1808, gave to his Benjamin Churchill a legacy of £8000, to be paid within twelve months after the testator's death, with interest at 4 per cent. in the meantime, and he charged all real estates in Doddington with the payment of that legacy. Subject to the charge, the estates in Doddington (which were said to comprise Clifton) were devised Samuel Churchill the son in fee.

The testator died in April 1808. The will was proved by Samuel Churchill the elder, who was sole executor; and in October 1809, Benjamin Churchill being entitled to receive the legacy of £8000, and being about to marry Eliza Harriot Frome, an indenture of settlement, made between Benjamin Churchill of the first part, Eliza Harriot Frome of the second part, Theodosia Frome of the third part, John N. Bakerly and John Churchill of the fourth part, and Samuel Churchill of the fifth part, was executed by the several parties thereto; and thereby, after reciting the will of Samuel Churchill the elder, and that the legacy of £8000 was unpaid, and that in respect thereof, Samuel Churchill had agreed to pay interest at 5 per cent., in lieu of interest at the rate of 4 per cent. as directed by the will; and that upon the treaty of the intended marriage between Benjamin Churchill and Eliza Harriot Frome, and the considerations therein [315] mentioned, the said Benjamin Churchill had proposed and agreed to settle the sum of £6000, part of the legacy of £8000 (which had been agreed should remain at interest upon the security of the estates of the Samuel Churchill, and then of Samuel Churchill, party to the indenture, charged herewith), upon the trusts in the indenture mentioned, it was witnessed, that Benjamin Churchill assigned £6000, part of the legacy of £8000, to the trustees, on trusts of the settlement, and the better to enable them to recover the £6000, they were appointed the attornies of Benjamin Churchill for the purpose.

The legacy was not paid, and under the circumstances aforesaid, by the will of the testator, and the agreement of the devisee, the devised estates were charged with and retained as a security for the payment.

Samuel Churchill the devisee, having become embarrassed in his circumstances, executed indentures of the 17th and 18th days of July 1826, made between himself of the one part, and Benjamin Churchill and James James of the other part, and he thereby conveyed his freehold estates, subject to the incumbrances affecting the same, to Benjamin Churchill and James James, in fee upon trust to sell the same, or raise money by mortgage thereof as therein mentioned.

Whilst this deed was in preparation, Mr. James discovered, that the legacy of £8000 to Benjamin Churchill, and another legacy to the like amount to John Churchill had not been paid, but remained as charges on the estate of the testator Samuel Churchill, and he thereupon required that releases should be obtained; and accordingly, and without any reference to the settlement of October [316] 1809, by indentures respectively dated the 14th and 15th of July 1826, those legacies were released by John Churchill and Benjamin Churchill respectively.

Under these circumstances, and on the 8th of August 1826, Benjamin Churchill and James James executed a mortgage of the estates to Lord Carrington, to secure him the payment of £5000, and the legal estate was now vested in him.

Samuel Churchill and Benjamin Churchill, being parties to the settlement, were aware of it, but it was said, that Mr. James did not know of it till towards the end of September 1826.

During these transactions, Samuel Churchill was indebted to the Plaintiffs or to Mr. Greenwood, in the sum of £2200, to secure the payment of which, he executed a bond, dated the 24th of April 1826, and the condition of the bond being broken, Mr. Greenwood commenced an action against him, and in or as of Trinity term 1826, obtained judgment against him for the sum of £2273 and costs of suit, and thereupon, Samuel Churchill and his trustees Benjamin Churchill and James James, for the purpose of preventing execution on the judgment, proposed to Mrs. Greenwood to execute to her a mortgage or security on the estates in question, if she would acknowledge satisfaction upon her judgment. This proposal was accepted, and thereupon, an indenture, dated the 27th of October 1826, and made between Benjamin Churchill and James James of the first part, Samuel Churchill of the second part, and Mrs. Greenwood of the third part, was executed by the parties thereto, and Benjamin Churchill, James James, and Samuel Churchill, subjected and charged the estates, which, by the indentures of the 17th and 18th of July 1826, were [317] conveyed to Benjamin Churchill and James James (but subject and without prejudice to the incumbrances affecting the same estates respectively), to and with the payment of the sum of £2200 to Mrs. Greenwood, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

In this state of things, a suit being instituted by Mrs. Greenwood, it was referred to the Master to ascertain the priorities.

The Master, by his report dated the 24th day of November 1841, found that the Plaintiff Mrs. Greenwood, in respect of the principal and interest due to her as in the report mentioned, was entitled to a first charge upon the estates mentioned in the fourth schedule to his report.

To this finding an exception was taken by John Nicholas Fazakerly and John Churchill, the trustees of the settlement made on the marriage of Benjamin Churchill, who alleged, that the Master ought not to have found that the Plaintiff Mrs. Greenwood, in respect of the principal and interest due to her as in the report mentioned, was entitled to a first charge upon so much of the estates mentioned in the fourth schedule as were situate in Doddington and Clifton, because, as they said, by the settlement, they were entitled to a charge prior to that of Mrs. Greenwood upon such parts of the estates mentioned in the fourth schedule as were situate in Doddington, and also upon such parts thereof as were situate in Clifton, and were, at the time of the death of Samuel Churchill the elder, parts of his estate.

The question therefore was, whether the charge of the trustees or that of the Plaintiffs had priority.

[318] Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Calvert, in support of the exception. Assuming the effect of Benjamin's release to have been this:—That as between the trustees of his settlement and a subsequent incumbrance for valuable consideration without notice obtaining the legal estate and relying on the validity of such release, the latter would prevail, still that principle will not affect the present question. Here neither party has the legal estate, both have mere equities, and therefore that which is prior in time is prior in charge. The legacy was charged on the estate both by the will and the settlement. The owner of the estate, who was a party to the settlement, contracted to give an equitable charge on it, and the assignment afterwards executed by Benjamin could not prejudice the rights of the trustees; it could not have a more extensive operation than the first assignment. The charge of the trustees was originated in 1808, that of Mrs. Greenwood in 1826; the former must therefore have priority.

Again the Plaintiff took "subject to prior incumbrances," and consequently subject to the equitable charge of the trustees. Besides this, she had notice of their charge, or must, in equity, be assumed to have had notice of it, for if she had made due inquiry, she would necessarily have been led to a knowledge of the interest claimed by the trustees.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Cole, contra, for the Plaintiff.

This is not a case in which the parties have an equal equity; the equity of the trustees is inferior to that of the Plaintiff.

The legacy was only an incumbrance in the event of the personal estate proving deficient, and until that fact [319] had been established, Benjamin had no right to resort to the real estate for payment. The assignment to the trustees was, at law, a mere nullity, the interest could not at law be passed by an assignment, and after its execution, Benjamin still remained the only person who, at law, was entitled to receive the legacy, to give a discharge, and to release the estate. He effectually released the estate, and Samuel became, at law, the absolute owner. A mortgage was then executed to Lord Carrington, which is admitted to be the first charge; the Plaintiff who had a legal charge by judgment affecting the estate, and on which she might have taken the estate in execution, gave it up for a mortgage of the equity of redemption of that estate which remained after satisfying Lord Carrington's mortgage, namely, of an estate discharged of the legacy.

The Plaintiff has what is equivalent to a declaration of trust of the parties who are entitled to the equity of redemption of an estate discharged from the legacy. Where equities are equal, time decides priorities, but where one has got in the legal estate, or an assignment of a term, or a declaration of trust, or anything equivalent, his right will prevail.

It is said the Plaintiff takes subject to the trustees' claim, because she took "subject to prior incumbrances," but was this legacy an incumbrance? Had it not been legally released? It is clear also that it was not in the contemplation of either party.

Mr. Geldart, for other parties.

Mr. Kindersley, in reply. Both parties have mere equities, the Plaintiff has no greater right to call for the legal estate than the trustees. It is said that the [320] charge could not be assigned but has been released. If the charge was equitable, it could no more be released than assigned.

The judgment only affected the interest of the owner, and it has been released.

The following authorities were referred to during the argument: Jones v. Jones (8 Simons, 633), Beckett v. Cordley (1 B. C. C. 353), Wilkes v. Bodington (2 Vern. 599), Ex parte Knott (11 Ves. 609), Frere v. Moore (8 Price, 475), Jones v. Smith (1 Hare, 43), Evans v. Bicknell (6 Ves. 174), Willoughby v. Willoughby (Ambler, 282).

April 29. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is, whether the trustees of the settlement of 1809 or the Plaintiffs, in respect of their several charges, are entitled to priority of charge upon the estate.

For the exception to the report it is said, on behalf of the trustees of the settlement, that by the will of the testator, and also by the agreement of Samuel Churchill the devisee, the legacy was charged on the estates, and that the charge was never released, Benjamin Churchill having assigned his interest before he executed the release in July 1826: that Mrs. Greenwood had no claim against the estate till October 1826, and that she then acquired a merely equitable charge, which was subject to all prior incumbrances affecting the estate: that the legal estate is now vested in Lord Carrington (and [321] which the claimant of a merely equitable charge cannot disturb), subject to one equitable charge vested in the trustees, and another vested in Mrs. Greenwood: and that the common rule, "qui prior est tempore potior est jure," must be applied, unless something has occurred to disentitle the first in time to the preference.

There is a question of form, the exception suggesting that the Master has given to Mrs. Greenwood priority in respect of both Doddington and Clifton, whereas, in fact, he has only given her priority in respect of so much of Doddington as was not Clifton, and there being no exception to that part of the report, which finds the trustees to be second incumbrancers on Doddington; and a question was raised, whether any of the estates in the fourth schedule were derived from Samuel Churchill the testator; but, in substance, the question seems to be, whether the trustees and Mrs. Greenwood can be said to have equal equities upon the estate or equity of redemption vested in the trustees of the indentures of the 17th and 18th of July 1826. If they have, the trustees, claiming under a security prior in time, may be entitled to the advantage.

The legacy, as such, was charged on the land, and, in defect of the personal estate, might, at the suit of the legatee, have been raised out of the land after the testator's death; by the settlement, Samuel Churchill, the devisee, agreed that the legacy should remain on the security of the land, and after a long period of time, Benjamin Churchill the legatee, who had indeed assigned the legacy, but at law remained entitled to receive or release it, did actually execute a deed, whereby the land was purported to be released from the legacy; and, in this state of things, Samuel Churchill conveyed the legal estate to his trustees; the mortgage to [322] Lord Carrington was executed by them, and it is now admitted, that Lord Carrington's charge has priority over the claim of the trustees of the settlement. Lord Carrington's mortgage left the equity of redemption in Benjamin Churchill and James James, and they having the equity of redemption, gave the equitable charge to Mrs. Greenwood.

Mrs. Greenwood, therefore, claims, as against those trustees and Samuel Churchill, who acquired their title to convey free from charges by the release of Benjamin Churchill the legatee; her claim is upon the estate which was vested in Samuel Churchill's trustees after the execution of the release, or upon the equity of redemption which remained with them after the mortgage to Lord Carrington, and although it appears to me, that the execution of the release was fraudulent as against the persons entitled under the settlement, yet the equity to have a charge upon the estate could not be made available, without first establishing an equity to set aside the release, and it was seen, that the trustees of Samuel Churchill, who had actually contracted to give the security to Mrs. Greenwood, could not have resisted her demand to have the money raised out of the equity of redemption, though they might have resisted the claim of the trustees of the settlement, calling upon them to raise the legacy which had actually, however improperly, been released. Whilst that release remained in force, Benjamin Churchill the legatee, who had himself released, could not, for his own assignees, set up the claim to be paid in priority to a bona fide claimant on the equity of redemption.

The right to the legacy was to be made out through him. He had released the legacy, and he and his co-trustees had entered into a contract with Mrs. Green-[323]-wood to give her the benefit of a charge, and she having a judgment, was, on the faith of that contract and of the estate supposed to be invested in Benjamin Churchill and James James, induced to enter satisfaction on the judgment, in consideration of the charge which she received; and it does not appear to me that the trustees of the settlement, who were to claim through the assignment of Benjamin, could, whilst the release of Benjamin remained unimpeached, establish any priority before Mrs. Greenwood. The trustees, under the deeds of July 1826, had the legal estate till they executed the mortgage to Lord Carrington; after that, they had the equity of redemption. They then engaged to hold the estate as a security for Mrs. Greenwood, and in that way, it appears to me, they gave her a preference.

I think also that the argument founded on the words, "subject to prior incumbrances," cannot prevail. The settlement was not known to Mrs. Greenwood. The release of the legacy by the legatee had actually been executed, and was, or might have been known. It is, I think, clear, that the trustees of the deeds of July 1826 did not intend to include the unpaid part of the legacy amongst the "prior incumbrances," and I think that the words do not deprive Mrs. Greenwood of her right.

Overrule the exception.

[324] SADLER v. LEE. April 28, 29, May 8, 1843.

[S. C. 12 L. J. Ch. 407; 7 Jur. 476. See Davenport v. Stafford, 1851, 14 Beav. 392; St. Aubyn v. Smart, 1867, L. R. 5 Eq. 187; L. R. 3 Ch. 646; Moore v. Knight [1891], 1 Ch. 554. Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39) s. 11.]

A., B., and C. executed to a banking firm, consisting of E., F., and G., a power of attorney, empowering them "jointly and severally" to receive the dividends and to sell out the stock itself. The power was sent by the bankers to their broker, who deposited it with the Bank of England. F. alone clandestinely sold out the stock, but the firm had credit for the proceeds. The sale was concealed, and the amount of dividends for some time accounted for. Held, that E. was liable for the sale, though it had taken place after the death of C. and G.; and that he would have been equally liable, though the proceeds had not been placed to the credit of the firm.

Upon a question whether one partner had notice of the irregular course of dealing of his co-partner, to the prejudice of their customer, the Court was of opinion, that he ought to be deemed to have known the facts, it appearing from the evidence, that if he had used ordinary diligence and attention in the management of the business, he might and must have discovered all the material facts: that the means of knowledge were within his power: that he would, with very little trouble, have found confusion and irregularity in the accounts, a proper investigation of the sources of which would have led to discovery of all that had been done. Held, also, that under such circumstances the Court, for the protection of those who deal with partnerships, must impute the knowledge which the partners, acting for their interests and in discharge of their plain duty, might and ought to have obtained. Difficulty in holding a partner who ostensibly takes an active part in the conduct of the business free from responsibility, on the ground of insanity, in respect of the acts of the firm.

Confirmed and incurable insanity is a ground for dissolving a partnership, but a mere diminution of capacity in attending to it is insufficient for that purpose.

Partners of trustees wrongfully sold out stock and applied it to their own purposes. Held, that the measure of their liability was the amount paid in replacing the stock.

In the beginning of the year 1825 the Plaintiffs and Mr. Lucas, who had died, being entitled to the sum of £11,813, 0s. 2d. 3½ per cent. annuities, then residing in their names as trustees, were desirous that the dividends should be paid through the agency of Messrs. Sparks & French, who then carried on the business of bankers, in partnership together, at Guildford. The firm of Sparks & French consisted of Richard Sparks, William Sparks, and John French, and on the 1st of January 1825 the Plaintiffs and Lucas executed a power of attorney, whereby they empowered Richard Sparks, William Sparks, and John French, jointly and severally, not only to receive the dividends of the stock, but also to sell the capital. Sparks & French, by their [325] London agents and correspondents, according to the power, received the dividends, and although French died in 1828, and Anthony French was taken into partnership with Richard Sparks and William Sparks, and the firm thereupon became Sparks & Lee. Although Richard Lucas died in 1830, the Plaintiffs the surviving trustees, continued to act under the power of attorney, and the persons named in the power and the agents of the firm, continued to receive the dividends, and apply them according to the directions of the trustees. It did not appear that there was any irregularity or misconduct till the month of November in the year 1832.

The power of attorney itself was, on the 1st of February 1825, sent by the firm Sparks & French to Mr. Peppercorn, their broker in London, and was by him deposited in the proper office of the Bank of England, where it remained. On the 1st of November 1832 Mr. Peppercorn, by the direction of William Sparks, sold, for the sum of £2237, 7s. 6d., which he paid, with other sums, into the bank of Messrs. Eadailes & Co., who were the correspondents in London of Sparks & Lee, to the credit of that firm. Again, on the 28th of December 1832, Mr. Peppercorn, by the direction of William Sparks, sold the sum of £3406, 10s. 1d., further part of the trust stock, for the sum of £3151, 0s. 4d., which was partly applied by Peppercorn to the use of Sparks & Lee, and as to the rest, was paid to Eadailes & Co. to the credit of Sparks & Lee. And again, on the 29th of October 1834, Mr. Peppercorn, by the direction of William Sparks, sold the sum of £5056, 17s. 10d., further part of the trust stock, for the [326] sum of £5000, which he paid to Eadailes & Co. to the credit of Sparks & Lee.

The several sums of stock thus sold, amounted in the whole to the sum of £963, 7s. 11d. and the sum of £10,388, 7s. 10d. cash was the aggregate of the proceeds.

The several sales were, it was said, personally directed by William Sparks alone, and they were effected under the power which was confided to the firm of Sparks & French, the business of which was assumed and continued by the firm of Sparks & Lee. They were effected by the broker employed by that firm, and the proceeds were by him, after deducting half of the usual commission, paid to the credit of the account subsisting between Sparks & Lee and their London correspondents. The firm had credit for the proceeds in that account, and the entries in the accounts of the London correspondents indicated that the several sums thus placed to the credit of the firm were received "per Mr. Sparks."

After the several sales as well as before, sums, equal to the full amount of the dividends of the whole of the trust stock, £11,813, 0s. 2d. 3½ per cent. annuities were dealt with, according to the directions or authority given to the firm of Sparks & Lee, by the Plaintiffs or their solicitor, and thus the Plaintiffs and the persons interested in the stock were induced by the firm of Sparks & Lee to believe, that the stock continued safe. Nothing occurred to afford to the Plaintiffs the least intimation that any part of the stock had been sold.

In the month of June 1838 Richard Sparks died, having disposed of his real and personal estates by will and codicils. William Sparks, who was residuary legatee [327] and executor of Richard, proved his will, and after the death of Richard Sparks, the banking business was carried on by William Sparks and Lee. William Sparks died on the 24th of October 1840, and soon after his death it was discovered that the stock had been sold.

This bill was filed on the 16th of November 1840, and it prayed, in substance, a declaration that the real and personal estates of Richard Sparks and William Sparks were liable, in equity, at the respective times of their deaths, to replace the sum of £10,963, 7s. 11d. 3½ per cent. Reduced annuities, or at the option of the Plaintiffs, make good to them the amount of the proceeds of the sales, and the amount of much of the dividends as had not been accounted for. The bill alleged Lee to be insolvent, and he had since become a bankrupt.

The persons who claimed under the will of Richard Sparks were the principal Defendants, and it was alleged by them, in opposition to the Plaintiffs' claim, that as the power was joint and several, the partners were not collectively answerable for the use which might be made of it by any one of them. Each being enabled to exercise upon the power, in the absence of collusion, no other was answerable for what he did. Secondly, that if they were originally answerable in the character of partners, they ceased to be so on the death of French, and that afterwards, the surviving partner, Richard and William Sparks ceased to be answerable for each other. Thirdly, that Richard Sparks did not know, and had not the means of knowing, that the stock was sold, or that the money, now appearing to have arisen from the sale of the stock, was paid to the credit of the firm, and that if he had been informed that William Sparks had paid any such sums of money into Eadailes & Co., he did not [328] know, and had no means of knowing, that the money was not the separate property of William Sparks.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Freeling, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Turner, Mr. Tinney, Mr. Teed, Mr. Goodeve, Mr. Shebbeare and Mr. Collyer, for the Defendants.

The following cases were cited: Stone v. Marsh (6 B. & C. 551); Marsh v. Keating (8 Bli. 651; and 2 Cl. & Fin. 250); Ex parte Apsey (3 Bro. C. C. 265); Ex parte Hume (Buck. 386); Beavan v. Lewis (1 Sim. 376); Smith v. Craven (1 Cr. & Jer. 56); Hume v. Bolland (1 Cr. & M. 130); Devaynes v. Noble (Clayton's case, 1 Mer. 572; 1 Cr. & M. 495); Gray v. Chiswell (9 Ves. 118); Wilkinson v. Henderson (1 Myl. & K. 56); Pulliamy v. Noble (3 Mer. 593).

May 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The facts of this case are many of them very similar to those which occurred in Marsh v. Keating (8 Bli. 651; and 2 Cl. & Fin. 250); the material difference being, that in this case, William Sparks caused the stock to be sold under a legal and valid power of attorney, whereas in the case of Marsh v. Keating, Fauntleroy caused the stock to be sold under a power of attorney which was forged. It was argued that there was another material difference, inasmuch as, in this case, the trustees and the Plaintiffs were the regular customers of Sparks & Lee, whereas in Marsh v. Keating, Mrs. Keating was the regular customer of Marsh & Co. I do not know that any such supposed difference would be material, but I am of opinion, that [329] with regard to the stock and the receipt and application of the dividends payable thereon, Sparks & Lee must be deemed to have been the bankers of the trustees. There can, I think, be no doubt, but that the trustees constituted Sparks & French their attorneys and agents.

this matter, because it was in the way of their business as bankers to transact such business, and that it was for the same reason that the Plaintiffs continued to permit Sparks & Lee to act for them; I think also that the relation which subsisted between the firm and the Plaintiffs, was precisely the relation subsisting between bankers and their customers who have given to the bankers powers of attorney to receive dividends and sell stock.

Now in Marsh v. Keating, the Judges state the facts, as appearing by the special verdict, to be, that the broker paid the money, the produce of the stock deducting one half of the usual commission, by a cheque payable to Marsh & Co., into the hands of Martin & Co., the city agents to the account of Marsh & Co., and they observe, that at the precise time of such payment, there can be no doubt that it was as much money under the control of Marsh & Co. as any other money paid to Martin & Co. by any customer under ordinary circumstances. The house of Marsh & Co. might have drawn the whole of the balance into their own hands. If the same money had been paid to Martin & Co., as the produce of the Plaintiffs' stock, under a genuine power of attorney, it would unquestionably have been received by all the Defendants to the use of the Plaintiffs, and would not less be money received by the partners of the firm, because it was entered in the account as "cash per Fauntleroy." It appeared, in Marsh v. Keating, that Fauntleroy had deceived his partners, but the Judges held that this fraud afforded no answer [330] to the Plaintiffs' claim after the money once came into their power.

But in the present case the distinguishing and important facts are, that the power of attorney was genuine, and was intrusted to the joint care of three partners. It enabled each to act severally after it was removed from their joint custody, and placed in the hands of their joint agent without special directions, or after it was deposited in the proper office, without which, the dividends, the receipt of which was the object of the trustees, could not have been received; but it was optional with the bankers, collectively, whether they would accept the power and assume the responsibility. They did assume it, as it appears to me, in the ordinary course of their business; having done so, and having sent it to their broker, to be acted upon in the way most suitable to their own convenience, I am of opinion, that they all became answerable for the several acts of each other under the power, and I think that all the partners would have been answerable for the sale by the direction of William Sparks, even if the money had not been paid to the account of the firm with the London bankers.

Under these circumstances, it is less important to consider, whether Richard Sparks ought to be deemed to have known the facts which are now established, but I am of opinion, upon the evidence produced, that Richard Sparks, if he had used ordinary diligence and attention in the management of the business, might and must have discovered all the facts which are material to this case; the means of knowledge appear to me to have been in his power; he would, with very little trouble, have found confusion and irregularity in the accounts, and a proper investigation of the sources of such confusion and irregularity would have led to the discovery of all [331] that had been done. In such a case as this, and under such circumstances, Courts of Justice, for the protection of those who deal with partnerships, must impute the knowledge which the partners, acting for their interests and in discharge of their plain duty, might and ought to have obtained.

It is said, indeed, that Richard Sparks had become imbecile, and that although he regularly attended at the bank, and took a small share in the management of the business, was yet incapable of investigating or understanding the state of the affairs, especially as William Sparks used constant endeavours to conceal the transactions from him. The evidence upon this subject is by no means satisfactory. If it were much stronger than it is, I own that I could not conclude from it, that a man, ostensibly taking an active part in the conduct of such a business, could be held free from responsibility in respect of the acts of the firm in which he was a partner. Confirmed and incurable insanity is a ground for dissolving a partnership, but I apprehend that, before a decree can be made that a partnership shall be dissolved on this ground, it must be shewn, not merely that the party alleged to be insane, is not, for the time, so capable as he may previously have been of attending to or conducting the business, but that he is really insane. (See Kirby v. Carr, 3 Younge & Col. 184.) If not, the partnership cannot be dissolved on that ground, and his responsibility continues. But in this case, the evidence has failed to shew, that at the times when the sums of stock were sold, Richard Sparks was, in any respect, incapable of investigating or understanding the accounts, or of managing the business. And, on the whole, I am of opinion, that Richard Sparks and William Sparks were, at the [332] respective times of their deaths, indebted to the Plaintiffs in respect of their transactions.

The next question is, what is the amount of the debt, or how it is to be ascertained. The bill prays, that it may be declared that the real and personal estates of Richard and William Sparks are liable to replace the stocks sold out; or, at the option of the Plaintiffs, to make good the amount of the proceeds of the sales. (See Watts v. Girdlestone, 6 Beav. 188.) The Defendants representing the estates of Richard and William Sparks say, that if they are subject to any liability, it can only be to the extent of the monies actually received, for that the bankers were agents only and not trustees, and cannot be answerable as such, especially in the absence of the cestui que trust. To which it is replied, that though the bankers were not trustees, the Plaintiffs are entitled to damages, and that the value of the stock at the date of the decree is the right measure of the damage. I think, that there is nothing in this case, or in the form of the pleadings, to prevent the Plaintiffs from demanding against the Defendants a full pecuniary compensation for the loss they have sustained by the improper sales of stock, but it does not appear to me that they are entitled to have the stock specifically replaced. The bill alleges that the Plaintiffs, being trustees for other persons, are bound to make good, and intend to make good, the loss which would otherwise be sustained by the cestui que trust, and that the cestui que trust have elected to treat the Plaintiffs as their debtors, and not to make any claim against the assets of the firm, or the estates of the Sparks'. I think that the loss sustained by the Plaintiffs is to be measured by the amount of money which they have properly paid in replacing the stock, [333] or otherwise satisfying the just claims of the cestui que trust. The Plaintiffs state that they have replaced the stock, but I do not understand that there is any proof of it.

DECREE.—Inquire what sums of money have been properly laid out and expended by the Plaintiffs in replacing the sum of £10,963, 7s. 11d. 3½ per cent. annuities; and declare that the estates of Richard Sparks and William Sparks are liable to make good to the Plaintiffs the full amount of such several sums of money, together with the amount of so much as has not been accounted for, of the dividends on such annuities, which ought to have been received up to the time when the same were replaced.

[333] BAKER v. THURNALL. May 11, 27, 1843.

Application to the Court to examine, on behalf of the Plaintiff, a Defendant, to whom answer a replication had been filed, refused.

Mr. Shapter, on behalf of the Plaintiffs, moved, that they might be at liberty to examine the Defendant Barker as a witness, saving all just exceptions, and without withdrawing the replication filed to his answer. He urged, that although an order of course for such a purpose was not regular, still that such an order may be made on special application to the Court.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The general rule is, that you cannot examine as a witness a Defendant to whose answer you have filed a replication. By filing a replication you admit that he has an interest which you are contesting in the cause. You had better see if there are any authorities on the subject.

[334] Mr. Shapter now referred to the case of Crookhall v. Smith (2 Fowler Practice, 101. See Holmes v. The Corporation of Arundel, 4 Beavan, 155. Ross v. Clarke, 1 Y. & C. (C. C.) 538), where a Defendant, as executor, and not in his own right, was ordered to be examined as a witness to prove the execution of deeds, &c. his answer being replied to.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. That case only applies to the proof of documents. I have understood the rule to be universal, that if you desire to examine a Defendant you must, as to him, withdraw the replication. I cannot introduce a new rule. (NOTE.—By the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, a Defendant may now be examined on behalf of the Plaintiff or Co-defendant.)

[334] EDMONDS v. NICOLL. May 11, 1843.

Liberty for the Plaintiff to enter an appearance for the Defendant will not, after a delay of two months, be granted ex parte. The practice in such a case is not to make an order nisi, but to require notice of the application to be given, or that there should be fresh service of the subpoena.

Mr. Shebbeare, on the part of the Plaintiff, moved ex parte, under the 8th Order August 1841 (Ord. Can. 165), for liberty to enter an appearance for the Defendant. There had been two months' delay in making the application, and this having been objected by the Court, he asked that the order might be in the form of that made by Sir James K. Bruce in Bointon v. Parkinson (19th April 1843), viz., "that the Plaintiff should be at liberty to enter an appearance for the Defendant at the expiration of [335] ten days, unless the Defendant entered an appearance within that time, and the Plaintiff should undertake to serve the Defendant with notice of this order within eight days."

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I cannot make an order to enter an appearance ex parte when the Plaintiff has so long delayed to make his application for it. The practice in such a case has been, not to make an order nisi, but to require that notice should be given to the other side or that there should be fresh service of subpoena. Having always adopted that course, I think it must be followed in the present instance. (See Radford v. Roberts, 2 Hare 96.)

[335] ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. RAY. May 11, 1843.

In a civil proceeding at law, the office copies of the depositions in Chancery being good evidence, the originals will not be ordered to be produced.

Mr. Maule applied that the original depositions taken in this cause might be produced at the trial of a civil action at law, but

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after inquiry, refused the application, on the ground that the production and proof of the office copies were sufficient. See Highfield v. Peake, Moody & Mal. 109. Hennell v. Lyon, 1 B. & Ald. 182, and Attorney-General v. Ray, 2 Hare, 518, and 3 Hare, 335.)

[336] ASHBY v. JACKSON. May 31, 1843.

A common injunction to stay trial will not be extended, if it appears from the pleadings, contrary to the usual affidavit, that the discovery will not assist the Defendant at law in his defence to the action.

On the 19th of April 1843 an action at law was commenced by the Defendant against the Plaintiff, who, on the 10th of May, filed this bill, praying an injunction. The common injunction was obtained on the 26th of May, and on the 25th of May notice of trial for the second sitting in term (9th of June) was given.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh now moved to extend the common injunction to stay trial on the usual affidavit.

Mr. Greene, contra, objected, that after the delay which had taken place, the Plaintiff was not entitled to extend the injunction on the eve of trial, and that from the facts it appeared that the discovery would be of no avail to the Plaintiff in the action at law. Thorpe v. Hughes (3 Myl. & Cr. 742).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I quite agree with the doctrine of the case cited, and if it appeared to me that the nature of this action was such that the discovery could not be of any use to the Plaintiff in his defence to the action at law, I should certainly refuse this motion, but that does not in any way appear nor is the delay such as to disentitle the Plaintiff.

Injunction extended.

[337] In re MARTIN. May 30, 31, 1843.

Solicitor struck off the rolls for fraudulently abusing the confidence of his client.

It is the duty of the Court to protect solicitors in the fair discharge of their difficult and delicate duties, but when a solicitor is found to have availed himself of his honourable and confidential position, for the purpose of taking advantage of and defrauding his clients, it is not less the duty of the Court to withdraw from him those privileges, and that certificate of character, which are afforded by his being permitted to remain on the roll of solicitors.

This was a petition presented by Miss West, to have the name of the Respondent a solicitor of the Court, struck off the rolls under the circumstances stated in the Master of the Rolls' judgment.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Shebbeare, in support of the petition.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Collins, contra, amongst other arguments, urged that the application ought not to be granted in consequence of the delay which had taken place. In the Matter of ——— (2 Barn. & Ad. 766). That the matter had been brought forward by the Petitioner for the private purpose of compelling payment of the debt, and that it appeared that she would willingly have compromised the matter if the Respondent had paid the amount.

Mr. Shebbeare, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS postponed giving his judgment, observing that he did not think that the reasons adduced for not entertaining the petition ought to prevail. That there was no such delay as ought to prevent his interposing, and that it was no reason why the Court, in a proper case, should refuse to relieve the public because the party prosecuting the complaint had been negotiating for a compromise.

[338] May 31. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Respondent was the solicitor of Miss West in a cause of West v. Funge, in which a decree had been obtained. She seems to have placed great confidence in him. He says that great intimacy arose between him and Miss West, and he states his belief, that if she had possessed £5000, and he had required it, she would have lent it to him.

In November 1840 he requested her to assist him in obtaining £1000, which he wanted, as he says, for the purpose, amongst other things, of lending a portion of it to Sir John Scott Lillie on security. She had then no money to lend, and attempts having been in vain made, to obtain it from one or two other sources, he suggested that she might compromise the suit, and thereby obtain money, out of which she might advance what he wanted. To this she consented, and it was agreed that the suit should be compromised; under the agreement she became entitled to receive £1700 from Funge and Bland, two of the Defendants, and also the fund in Court which consisted of £1276, 12s. 3 per cent. annuities, and £76, 12s. cash. To avoid delay in procuring the money before the agreement to compromise could be carried into effect, Miss West was prevailed upon to consent to an arrangement, by which Mr. Martin was to receive £1000 from the Metropolitan Bank on her credit as security; and accordingly the bank advanced, nominally to her, but really to Martin, the sum of £1000 for two months, and she executed a deed, dated the 12th of December 1840, whereby she assigned to Courtenay and Abbott, two of the directors of the bank, the funds to which she was to become entitled on the compromise of the suit, on trust to receive the same, and thereout pay the £1000 and interest, and [339] of the surplus to her. At the same time, Miss West signed a bill, drawn on Martin, and accepted by him, for £1000, payable to the bank in two months.

When the money was obtained, Miss West was induced to receive from Martin £1000, a part of it, for her own use.

Miss West thus subjected herself and her property to the payment of £1000, of which £950 was placed at the disposal of Mr. Martin, her solicitor, and Mr. Martin gave her a memorandum thus expressed:—"I have received £950 value from Miss West to place out, and I hereby undertake that she shall receive at least 5 per cent. for the same, and incur no risk of loss thereof.—December 12th, 1840."

The sum mentioned in this memorandum is the sum which he now alleges was a sum lent to him to employ in his business.

But however great her confidence in him may have been, it is plain that she misdirected security, and did not choose that he should have her money or money placed on her security, without his acknowledgment in writing that it was to be paid out, and it is clear that the loan from the Metropolitan Bank was no more than a temporary arrangement, until her own money could be obtained. Mr. Martin says, and recollects it was stated, that when the suit was settled, the loan made by the bank would be discharged.

The Metropolitan Bank, having obtained the assignment, put a stop order upon the fund in Court, and very soon afterwards, viz., by two payments, one of £700 on the 22d of December 1840, and the other of £1000 on [340] the 20th of January 1841, the £1700, which Miss West was entitled to receive from Funge and Bland on the compromise of the suit, was paid to Mr. Martin, who ought to have taken the earliest opportunity of paying off the money borrowed from the bank. The two months, indeed, for which the money was lent, had not then elapsed; but it is plain that Mr. Martin had no intention of applying the money in making the payment, for on the same 20th of January on which he received the £1000 from Funge and Bland, he presented a petition in the cause, in the name of Miss West, and thereby prayed that the stock in the cause which belonged to her might be sold, and that the debt due to the bankers might be paid out of the proceeds, and it was soon afterwards ordered accordingly, and the bankers were so paid.

Under these circumstances, Mr. Martin had obtained from the bankers at Miss West's expense the £950, for which he had given the memorandum of the 12th of December 1840, and he had also obtained the £1700 from Funge and Bland, for which he had given no memorandum.

Miss West states, that Mr. Martin informed her that he had received the £1750 from Funge and Bland, and applied £1000, part of it, in payment of the bankers, and that the remainder was at his banker's; and she says further, that, until the 3d of March 1841, she did not know that the stock had been sold. That she was very ignorant about her money appears not only by her own affidavit, but by the letters of Mr. Martin, the purport of which he accounts for by saying, that they were written in a hurry: and after carefully reading the affidavit of Mr. Martin and Mr. Funge, I see no reason to doubt that the other statements which I have made are substantially true. After the 3d of March, when she was informed of the sale of the stock, she received the money which remained after payment of the bankers—she used her best endeavours to obtain the money still due to her from Mr. Martin; he paid her in the whole £1500, and she obtained an order requiring him to transfer so much of the stock which he had caused to be sold as produced the £1010 to the bankers. He was afterwards arrested at Deal upon a writ of ne exeat issued by the order of the Lord Chancellor; and seeking to obtain the benefit of the Insolvent Debtors Act, he was ordered to be imprisoned for a period of ten months, which expired in April last.

The Respondent has no doubt suffered severely for the conduct he has pursued, and now asked that he may be struck off the Rolls, and after very anxious consideration of the case, I feel myself compelled to make the order.

Except in making the repayment of parts of the sums which he received, it appears that every part of the conduct of Mr. Martin in the matters in question was improper, and I think, on the examination of the matter and of every affidavit, that he fraudulently abused the confidence placed in him by his client, and endeavoured to effectuate and continue the fraud, by misrepresentations, in a manner and under circumstances which make it my imperative duty to declare, so far as depends upon me, that he is not to be permitted to act as a solicitor, and to continue in a situation which may enable him to conduct himself towards other clients in the same manner.

It is undoubtedly the duty of the Court to protect solicitors in the fair and honest discharge of their difficult and delicate duties; but when a solicitor is found to have availed himself of his honourable and confidential position, for the purpose of taking advantage of and defrauding his clients, it is not less the duty of the Court to withdraw from him those privileges and that certificate of character which are afforded by his being permitted to remain on the roll of solicitors.

Let the order be made as prayed.

[342] FLINT v. HUGHES. June 7, 1843.

[S. C. 7 Jur. 523.]

Bequest of residue to A. for life, "and whatever she can transfer to go to her daughters," B. and C. Held, that the gift to B. and C. was void for uncertainty.

The testator, by his will dated in 1842, after giving an annuity, proceeded in the following terms:—

"After this, I bequeath everything I may die possessed of to my dearly-beloved daughter Frances Elizabeth, married to the Rev. Robert Hodgson Fowler of Southwell, Notts, for her own use during her natural life, and whatever she can transfer to go to her daughters, Frances, wife of the Rev. Charles Ramsay Flint, and to Mr. Fowler, spinster." He named Frances Elizabeth Fowler, Charles Ramsay Flint, and Richard Hughes, executors.

This bill was filed by Mr. and Mrs. Flint and Mary Fowler against Mr. and Mrs. Hodgson Fowler and Mr. Hughes, praying the establishment of the will, and that the trusts might be carried into execution.

To this bill the Defendants Mr. and Mrs. Fowler put in a general demurrer.

[343] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Malins, in support of the demurrer, submitted that the gift over was void for uncertainty, it being impossible to say what the testator intended by the expression "whatever she can transfer." That the Plaintiffs therefore had no interest in the property and could not maintain this suit.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Bacon, in support of the bill, argued that it was a valid gift of the whole property to Mrs. Fowler for life, with remainder to her two daughters.

Pope v. Pope (10 Sim. 1) was referred to.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said that the objects of the testator's bounty sufficiently appeared, but it was impossible to say what was the subject intended by the expressions "whatever she can transfer," or whether it was to pass to the daughters by a transfer from the mother, or by the operation of the will. He thought therefore that the gift to the daughters was void for uncertainty, and allowed the demurrer.

[344] DE LA GARDE v. LEMPRIERE. June 5, July 3, 1843.

The wife's equity to a settlement does not attach upon filing a bill; if, therefore, the wife dies without making any claim to a settlement out of her legacy, her children after her death, have no right to one.

John Lempriere, by his will dated the 19th of May 1821, gave to his daughter Louisa Moore £2500. A bill for the administration of the estate was after-died, to which John Bury Moore and Louisa his wife (the legatee) were made Defendants, and in 1836 a decree was made for taking the accounts and for making certain inquiries.

In 1837 Louisa Moore died.

The Master made his report in 1838, by which he found, amongst other things, that the testator's daughter Louisa married the Petitioner in the lifetime of her father, and died at the age of forty-one in March 1837, leaving five children.

By the order on further directions in 1839 it was declared, that the pecuniary legacies to the daughters were absolute legacies upon their attaining the age of twenty-four years, and were not subject to a direction for a settlement which was contained in the will; but the children claiming a settlement in right of their mother Louisa, it was directed that the amount of her legacy, when ascertained, should be carried to the account of "Louisa Moore and her children," subject to further order.

Several further proceedings being afterwards had in the cause, the amount due on the legacy to Louisa Moore was found to be the sum of £1941, 12s. 9d.; and which, according to the order of 1839, had been carried [345] to the account of Louisa Moore and her children. Mr. Moore now presented a petition for payment of him of the legacy, and the question now was, whether Mr. Moore was entitled to it as the representative of his deceased wife, or whether the children, in right of their deceased mother, had any and what right to a settlement.

Mr. Flather, in support of the petition.

Mr. Whitmarsh, contra, for the children.

Murray v. Lord Elbank (10 Ves. 84, 92), Lloyd v. Williams (1 Mad. 450), Steinmetz v. Halthin (1 Gl. & Jam. 64), Groves v. Clarke (1 Keen, 132) were cited.

July 3. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I conceive it to be settled, that if there be a decree for a settlement on the wife, the children are entitled to the benefit of it, although the wife may have died before any proposal for a settlement was carried into the Master's office.

In this case, the wife filed no bill claiming a settlement, and she died before any order for a settlement was made. In Scriven v. Tapley (Amb. 509; 2 Eden, 337), the child after the death of her mother filed her bill for a settlement. It was decreed to her by Sir Thomas Clarke at the Rolls, but as to that part the decree was reversed by Lord Northampton.

And in the case of Lloyd v. Williams, Sir Thomas Plumer, after a careful examination of all the authorities, [346] said (1 Mad. 464), that no case had trenchanted upon Scriven v. Tapley, and the conclusion to which he came was, "that the right of the child can arise only out of contract or under a decree."

This case would therefore be very clear, if it were not for the case of Steinmetz v. Halthin (1 Glyn. & J. 64), which was decided by Sir John Leach when he was Vice-Chancellor; who, after admitting that the equity was personal to the wife, and that the Court acknowledged no original right in the children, and that the children could claim only such provision as the wife thought fit to secure for herself, nevertheless was of opinion, that when a suit was instituted for the administration, out of which the legacy was to be paid, and the wife was a party Defendant to such suit, the equity of the wife attached upon the property on the filing of the bill, and that the equity having attached upon the property, and the wife having died without waiving it, the children became entitled to the benefit of it.

If this case had been followed by others, I should have considered myself bound by it; but standing alone, and being as it appears to me, contrary to the previously existing rules on this subject, I do not consider myself to be at liberty to act upon it, without considering the principle on which it is founded.

In all cases, the equity of the wife is personal, and it arises upon the vesting of the legacy in her: it may be defeated by a voluntary payment of the executors to her husband, who has a legal right to receive it, and give a discharge for it. If the payment is to be made through the medium of the Court, her equity will be [347] enforced, if she desires it, but not otherwise; she may abandon it, in which case her children can claim nothing, and if she claims it for herself, the Court requires the benefit to be extended to her children: her equity and the equity of the children are treated as one equity, to be enforced or not at her option. If the equity were to be considered as attached to the property on the filing of the bill, it must, I apprehend, be considered for the benefit of her children at the same time, but if so, she could not afterwards waive it for herself, because her equity and theirs are one; and as it is admitted that she can waive it after the institution of the suit, it seems to me to follow that it is not an equity, which, upon the filing of the bill, attaches upon property for the benefit of the children.

It is true, that after the filing of the bill, the discretion which the trustee or executor had to pay the wife's legacy to the husband is greatly altered. The filing of the bill has, it has been said, made the Court the trustee, and if the wife be living the Court will not pay the wife's legacy to the husband if she desires a settlement, unless she waives it; but when death has made any option on her part impossible when nothing has occurred from which it can be concluded that she has made an option, there seems to be no reason why the legal right of the husband should prevail, and I am therefore of opinion, notwithstanding the case of Steinmetz v. Hall, that in this case the wife's equity did not attach to the property for the benefit of the children on the institution of the suit, or before her death, but that upon her death before decree, and before any arrangement for a settlement, her legal personal representative became entitled to the legacy.

[345] TOGHILL v. GRANT. In re BOORD. June 5, July 3, 1843.

Where taxation is directed after action brought, this Court does not give the client the costs of taxation, though more than one-sixth be taxed off.

On the 18th of September 1839 Mr. Morris, who had been the agent of Mr. Board, a solicitor, delivered three bills of costs.

On the 12th of November 1839 Mr. Morris commenced an action against Mr. Board to recover the amount of those bills.

And on the 13th of January 1840, two months after the commencement of the action, and nearly four months after the delivery of the bills, the Petitioner obtained an order for the taxation of the bills. (2 Beavan, 261.)

On taxation, more than one-sixth of the amount of the three bills was taken off, and Mr. Board now presented a petition to compel Mr. Morris to pay the costs of the orders of reference and of the taxation.

The matter had been referred by the parties to Mr. Mills, of the Six Clerks' Office, who directed the costs to be paid by Mr. Morris, but it was alleged that his attention had not been called to the authorities on the subject.

Mr. Beavan, in support of the petition.

The Court, by analogy to the rule which the statute lays down, throws upon the solicitor the costs of the [349] taxation, where his bill is reduced by more than one-sixth of the amount; Barton v. Pyne (1 Hare, 496).

Mr. Corrie, contra. At law, an agent's bill cannot be taxed at all. When the order for taxation is obtained after action brought, the client is not entitled to the costs of the taxation, even if more than one-sixth be taken off his bill. This is the rule of Courts of law, Jay v. Coaks (8 Barn. & Cr. 635), and of this Court; Smith's Practice (vol. i. p. 706 (2d ed.)).

Mr. Beavan, in reply. The rule stated has been adopted by the Courts of law only, and has never been followed in this Court. Mr. Beames (Beames's Costs (2d ed.) 201) refers to the rule as applicable only to Courts of law: he says the rule may be usefully and justly followed in equity, this assumes that it has never yet been adopted there. The foundation for what is stated in Mr. Smith's book is merely the common law decision. It seems to have been the opinion of Mr. Mills, an experienced sworn clerk, that the Respondent is liable to pay the costs.

Hatherway v. Hatherway (2 Mad. 329) was also referred to.

July 3. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It was objected that the reference was not obtained till after the action had been brought by the Respondent, and that according to the practice of the Courts of law, the costs of taxation are not given, although more than one-sixth may be taken off the bill; and it being alleged [350] that the practice in this Court was different, I thought it right to cause inquiry to be made, and it has been certified to me, that where an action to recover a bill of costs is brought before the order to tax the bill is obtained, it is not the practice in this Court to give the client the costs of taxation, although more than one-sixth may have been taken off the bill.

And this being so I must decline to make any order upon this petition.

NOTE.—The law has since undergone an alteration by the passing of the 6 & 7 Ed. c. 73, under the thirty-seventh section of which it has been held, that under the circumstances stated in the text, the Attorney is liable to the costs. Ex parte Wollett, Chequer, 23d Jan. 1844.

[350] JORDAN v. LOWE. June 23, 1843.

wise of leaseholds on trust for A. for life, and afterwards to his issue male severally and respectively, according to their seniorities, and in default to his heirs, according to their seniorities, and in default over. Held, that A. took an absolute interest.

The testator, being possessed of a leasehold estate renewable every seven years, devised it to trustees, upon trusts which he declared as follows:—"I direct my said trustees to remain and continue seized and possessed thereof, and to pay the rents and profits thereof to or to the use of, or to permit and suffer my cousin Robert Jordan, of my uncle Jonathan, to hold and enjoy, or to receive and take the rents, issues, and profits thereof, to his own use and benefit, during the term of his natural life; and from and immediately after the decease of the said Robert Jordan, then I direct said trustees to pay the rents and profits thereof to his issue male lawfully gotten, severally and respectively according to their respective seniorities; and for want of such issue male as aforesaid, I devise the same to the [351] use of the said and all other the daughters and daughter of my said uncle Jonathan, according to their respective seniorities; and in default of such issue of my said uncle Jonathan, I devise the same to the eldest daughter of my said cousin Robert for all my life and interest therein. And I direct the said leasehold estate shall be, from time to time, renewed by and in the names and name of my said trustees."

The question was what interest Robert Jordan took in this leasehold.

Mr. Malins, for Robert Jordan, the Plaintiff, contended he took the leasehold absolutely.

Mr. Bird, for Thomas Jordan, the eldest son of the Plaintiff, and

Mr. Borton, for the younger children, contended that the Plaintiff took a life interest only.

Mr. Heathfield, for the trustees of the will.

Mr. Malins, in reply.

The following authorities were relied on:—Jones v. Morgan (1 B. C. C. 206. commented on in Fearne's Cont. Rem. 134), Knight v. Ellis (2 B. C. C. 570; and see Gray-General v. Bright, 2 Keen, 57; 2 Jarman on Wills, 496), Lyon v. Mitchell (Ibid. 467), Stoner v. Curwen (5 Sim. 264).

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS was of opinion that the Plaintiff took a quasi estate, and said he must make a decree in favour of the Plaintiff, according to the prayer of the bill.

[352] HUGHES v. GARNONS. June 8, 22, 1843.

A correspondence took place between a client and his solicitor during the progress of a suit. A compromise was effected, but afterwards a second suit was instituted to set it aside, and to prosecute the original suit. Held, that the correspondence was privileged in the second suit.

The object of this bill was to set aside a compromise which had been entered into in a suit of Garnons v. Hughes, and to enable the Plaintiff to proceed on the decree which had been made in the original suit.

One of the Defendants, by his answer, admitted that he had in his possession divers letters, and copies of letters which passed between Henry Rumsey Williams deceased (a solicitor), and Mr. Smedley, his agent, and others, during the progress of the said suits, and with reference thereto, but he said, "that all the said letters and copies of letters were confidential communications between Henry Rumsey Williams deceased and Richard Garnons, the solicitor and client respectively in the said suit, and with reference thereto."

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Renshaw, for the Plaintiffs, moved for the production of these, amongst other documents admitted to be in the Defendant's possession. They referred to Addis v. Campbell. (Not reported on this point.)

Mr. Cockerill, contra. The correspondence took place between the solicitor and his client in the other suit, which it is the object of the present suit to prosecute, notwithstanding the compromise. The documents are therefore privileged, and ought not to be produced; Bolton v. The Corporation of Liverpool (1 Myl. & K. 88).

[353] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think the Plaintiff must be content with the production of the other documents. These cannot be ordered to be produced.

[353] ADNAM v. COLE. June 26, 1843.

Gift of residue to pay income to widow for life, subject to the payment thereof of an annuity of £10 to A. for his life. After the decease of his widow, a disposition was made of the property, and amongst other gifts there was one of the dividends of £1000 stock to A. for life. Held, that the annuity to A. ceased upon the death of the widow, and that A. then took the dividends on the £1000 in substitution.

Bequest of chattels real to trustees to erect such monument as they should think fit, and build an organ gallery. The first object was valid, the second invalid under the Statute of Mortmain. Held, that the trustees were wrong in applying the whole to the first object, and an inquiry was directed to apportion the gift.

The testator being seised of a freehold cottage at Long Parish, and being possessed of a leasehold at Vale Place, devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to his executors, upon trusts which were expressed as follows:—"Upon trust to pay and apply the rents, use, enjoyments, and profits thereof to my wife Frances Adnam, for and during the term of her natural life, subject nevertheless to the payment thereof to Charles Adnam of £10 a year during his life, and after his decease, £10 a year to Elizabeth, his wife, if she survive him, during her life;" and from and after the decease of my said wife, upon trust to sell my messuage, &c., at Vale Place aforesaid, "as soon as conveniently may be after the decease of my said wife, and the monies arising therefrom to sink into and become part of the residue of my personal estate; and from and after the decease of my said wife, I give my cottage and garden at Long Parish aforesaid, with the appurtenances thereunto belonging, unto the said John Thompson, his heirs, &c., subject and charged with the yearly payment thereof of £3 to be applied as hereinafter mentioned; and upon further trust, after the decease of [354] my said wife, to pay and apply the interest and dividends of £1000 stock in the 3 per cent. Reduced Bank annuities unto the said Charles Adnam during his natural life, and from and after his decease, to pay the like interest and dividends to his wife, the said Elizabeth Adnam, if she shall survive him; and from and after the decease of the survivor of them, upon trust to pay and divide the said principal sum of £1000 stock, unto and amongst all and every of the children of the said Charles Adnam and Elizabeth his wife equally." He then bequeathed certain legacies after the decease of his wife, and proceeded as follows:—"And as to all the residue of the said trust monies, it is my will and desire, and I do hereby direct my said trustees, &c., to lay out the same for the purpose of erecting such a monument to my memory, as my trustees shall think fit, and for building a neat, substantial Gothic organ gallery, over the north door, within the parish church of Long Parish aforesaid, and for purchasing and putting up an organ within the said gallery, which gallery and organ are to be erected and placed, with the consent of the vicar and churchwardens, under the directions of my said trustees or trustee for the time being."

There were two questions, the first, whether the annuity of £10 a year to Charles Adnam ceased upon the death of the testator's wife; and the second question related to the monument and organ gallery, with regard to which the bill alleged that the gift was void, and with respect to which the following circumstances took place.

The Defendants, the executors, said, "they were advised by counsel, that the executors of the testator were authorised, by the will, to apply and expend such part of the testator's residuary personal estate as they, in their discretion, might deem fit, or even the whole [355] thereof, if they should think fit, in the erection of a monument to the testator's memory.

"That they, acting upon such advice, had applied a sum exceeding, as they believe, the whole amount of such residue, in erecting such monument, and in and about the expenses connected therewith."

"That the monument they had so erected to the memory of the testator, and which was called Adnam's Chapel, had cost in the actual erection thereof the sum of £294, 19s. 3d. or thereabouts."

"That they had not applied any part of such residue, and that there, in fact, remained no part applicable to the building or erection of an organ gallery, or of putting up an organ therein."

Mr. Pemberton Leigh insisted, first, that the £10 a year was payable to Charles Adnam and wife for life, even after the death of the widow.

Secondly, that the trustees had not exercised a due discretion in laying out the whole residue in the monument, and he insisted that there ought to be an inquiry to ascertain what proportion ought to have been laid out on the organ and organ gallery, which amount, so far as it was connected with realty, would belong to the representatives of the testator, in consequence of the gift of realty for such a purpose contravening the Statute of Mortmain.

Mr. Lloyd, contra. The annuity ceased on the death of the widow, because it was given out of a subject which was only to endure during that period. This construction is corroborated by the subsequent parts of the [356] will, which disposes, in another way, of the whole subject out of which an annuity of £10 was to be paid, and gives to the annuitants the dividends on £1000 as a substitute.

The gift of realty for the purpose of erecting a monument is not within the Statute of Mortmain (9 George 2, c. 36); Mellick v. The President, &c., of the Asylum (Jacob, 180). The trustees were empowered to erect such a monument "as they should think fit." They therefore had a discretion, and were justified in laying out any part of the residue they thought fit in erecting a monument. In Cooke v. Farrand (7 Taunt. 122), the widow had the power to will any part or proportion of the residue, and it was held that she might dispose of the whole. In Talbot v. Tipper (Skinner, 427), a party had the power of leasing at such rent "as he should think fit:" it was held that he might make a lease without reserving any rent.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. If this were a residuary gift to be divided between three persons as the executors thought fit, a distribution excluding one could not stand. We have a right to have a due and proper part apportioned to the second of two purposes, namely, the building the organ gallery, &c., and if there be any difficulty, the Master must settle the proportions.

As to the annuity, the gift to Charles Adnam is distinctly for his life. The payment is not to be made out of the life-estate of the widow, but out of the estate of the trustees. I admit, that if the gift had been to A. for life, she paying thereout an annuity to B. for his life, it must have ceased on the death of A.; but here the [357] duration of the estate of the trustees is quite sufficient to pay the annuity during the life of the annuitant.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This will is very inaccurately expressed. The testator directs the whole income to be paid to his wife for life subject to the payment of an annuity of £10 to Adnam during his life, and after his decease £10 a year to his wife for life; after the death of the widow, there was to be a sale of part of the property, and there is a disposition of the residue and amongst other gifts, there was one of the dividends of £1000 stock to Adnam for life, and afterwards to his wife. I think, taking the whole together, that the dividends on the stock were given by way of substitution for the annuity of £10 a year, and that the annuity has ceased.

As to the other point, there can be no reasonable doubt: the testator had two objects in view, viz., the monument and the organ gallery; both were to be considered with reference to the amount of the residue. He intrusted, to a certain extent, a discretion with the trustees: they were to erect such a monument as they thought fit, but they were not to expend on one object whatever they thought fit without regard to the other object. The testator could not have meant that.

The rules of law do not permit chattels real to be applied to one of those purposes. I must so declare, and refer it to the Master to ascertain in what proportion the residue ought to be divided between these two objects.

[358] TARBUCK v. GREENALL. July 1, 1843.

Certain persons were properly made parties to a suit, previous to the orders of August 1841, which made them no longer necessary parties. Held, that they may properly be dismissed at the subsequent hearing.

This bill was filed previously to the General Orders of August 1841 coming into operation. By the 30th of these orders (Ord. Can. 173) it is directed, "that in suits concerning real estate which is vested in trustees by devise, and such trustees are competent to sell and give discharges for the proceeds of the sale and for rents and profits of the estate, such trustees shall represent the persons beneficially interested in the estate or the proceeds or the rents and profits, in the same manner and to the same extent, as the executors or administrators, in suits concerning personal estate, represent the persons beneficially interested in such personal estate and in such cases, it shall not be necessary to make the persons beneficially interested in such real estate or rents and profits parties to the suit; but the Court may, upon consideration of the matter on the hearing, if it shall so think fit, order such persons to be made parties."

The case came within this order, but the bill having been filed before it came into operation, the parties beneficially interested had been made parties to the suit and were numerous.

The cause now came on for hearing, when the usual accounts were directed, in addition.

Mr. Pemberton and Mr. Chapman, for the Plaintiff, proposed, that as, under General Order referred to, [359] the trustees sufficiently represented the estate, parties beneficially interested should be dismissed from the suit and their costs provided for.

Mr. Turner submitted, whether the order applied to such a case as the present and whether it could have been intended by the Court to alter the rights of parties and the frame of a record, in a suit instituted previous to the orders coming into operation. He suggested that a difficulty might occur on the part of the purchaser of the estate under the decree.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Dixon, Mr. Bigg, Mr. Faber, Mr. Piggott, and Mr. Jervis, for other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that the orders applied to existing cases (51st Order. See Ord. Can. 178), and, therefore, that parties whose presence had become unnecessary might be dismissed at any time, upon making a proper provision for their costs.

[360] BENNETT v. MERRIMAN. July 22, 1843.

quest to widow for life, and afterwards to transfer to testator's children then living, with a gift to the issue of such children if dead, the issue to take only the share their father would have been entitled to. Held, that the issue took by substitution, and that to entitle them they must survive the tenant for life. Compromise under the Court, held not to exclude a point of construction not then under consideration.

The testator gave his real and personal estate to trustees, on trust to convert and sell, and pay the interest to his wife for life. He then proceeded in the following words, "and from and after the decease of my said dear wife, then upon trust, to pay, sell, assign, transfer, and assure unto each and every of my said daughters who shall at the time remain unmarried, the full sum of £1000 sterling, to and for her and their sole and separate use and benefit, and the residue of the said principal monies, dividends, and interest, unto and amongst all and every my said children (including my said son William), who shall then be living, or if dead leaving(1) lawful issue, in equal shares and proportions if more than one, and if but one, then to such only child; the share of my said son to be paid or assigned and transferred to him, when he shall attain his said age of twenty-one years, and the share or shares of my said daughters, when she or they shall respectively attain that age or be married; the issue of any of my said children to take only the share their father or mother would have been entitled to, and if such issue should consist of more than one child, to take the share of their father or mother in equal proportions, and if but one, then such one child to take the whole of their father's or mother's share.

"Provided always, that if any of my said children or child shall die without leaving issue, before he, she, or [361] they shall respectively have attained his, her, or their said ages of twenty-one years, or without having been married, then the share or shares of him, her, or them so dying shall, from time to time, go, accrue, and belong to the survivors or survivor of them, and be paid or assigned and transferred to him, her, or them, if more than one, equally, at such times and in the same manner as is hereinbefore declared touching their original share or shares."

The testator died in 1811. Kezia, one of his daughters, married in 1820, and died in 1822, leaving one child, Kezia May Bennett, who died an infant in 1841, without having been married.

The testator's widow died in 1842.

The first question which arose on this petition, was whether the legal personal representative of Kezia May Bennett was entitled to a share in the testator's residuary estate.

Another question arose under the following circumstances:—Suits having, in 1818, been instituted for the administration of the testator's estate, praying accounts, &c., that the rights and interests of all parties in the estate and effects of the estates might be ascertained by the Court, the usual decree for accounts was in 1820 made, but it was not prosecuted, for in 1826 it was referred to the Master to consider and report to the Court, whether, under the circumstances of the case, it would be for the benefit of the parties beneficially interested in the estate of the testator, that the said estate should be compromised, upon the terms and conditions therein mentioned.

[362] The Master, by his report, dated the 24th of March 1827, after setting forth the state of the assets, and certain irregular dealings therewith, certified, that he was of opinion, that it would be for the benefit of the parties, that the before-mentioned suits should be compromised upon the terms following, that is to say:—the Petitioners (the children of one of the testator's daughters), "being considered to be entitled to one-third part of the estate of the said testator William May, in the stead of their late mother Ann Elizabeth Merriman deceased; the said Kezia May Bennett, as being considered to be entitled to one-third part thereof, in the stead of her late mother the said Kezia Bennett deceased; and the Petitioner Caroline Davis and the trustees of the settlement on her marriage with William Davis, as being considered to be entitled to one-third part thereof, that the suits should not be further prosecuted as to the accounts and inquiries directed by the decrees." That certain sums of stock and cash in the report mentioned should be considered as forming the residue of the testator's estate; that the same, subject to certain costs, should be considered as belonging to, and be divided between and amongst the several parties thereinbefore mentioned in equal third parts, and should, upon the death of the testator's widow, be carried over to their several separate accounts; and that the interest and dividends should be paid to her for life.

(1) On production of the original will it was doubtful whether this word was "leaving" or "leaving."

The report was confirmed, and the funds were carried over with directions to pay the dividends to the widow for life, "and upon her death, any person or persons entitled to or interested in the residue of the said testator's estate, were to be at liberty to apply to the Court concerning the same as they should be advised."

[363] A petition was presented upon the death of Mrs. Bennett, for payment out of Court of the fund.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Shebbeare, in support of the petition. There are two questions, first, as to the construction of the will; and, secondly, as to the effect of the compromise. On the first point, we contend that the representative of Kezia May Bennett is not entitled to any portion of the fund, she not having survived the widow of the testator; first, because those only could take to whom transfer and payment was directed to be made; and, secondly, because the gift to the issue of the children was by way of substitution, and, therefore, the issue could only take in the same event in which their parents could take.

The children were to be ascertained at the time the gift was to take effect. There is this peculiarity also in the language of this will, which distinguishes it from the other cases. The gift is in the form of a direction to transfer to persons who are to be then in existence, and these words alone constitute the gift. (See Jones v. Mackintosh, 1 Russ. 223.)

The compromise does not affect this case, as the point was never referred to or brought before the consideration of the Master.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. H. Williams, for the representative of Kezia May Bennett.

The compromise entered into between the parties, approved of by the Master, and confirmed by the Court, has determined all questions between them. [364] The order made thereon binds even the infants. The original and supplemental bills prayed that the rights and interests of all parties might be ascertained; if the suits had proceeded, their rights would have been determined, but they were disposed of by the compromise.

Secondly, by the terms of the will, the representative of K. M. Bennett is entitled to share in the fund.

The gift is to the children of the children, unaffected by any such condition as that of surviving the widow, the Court has no authority to introduce such a contingency. If there had been a direct gift, it could not be contended that it was not vested, and there being a mere direction to transfer makes no difference; it is a mere modification of the same sort of gift. The issue would mean the issue living at the death of the parent, and not of the tenant for life; and if the construction of the other side be adopted, the words "if dead, leaving lawful issue," must be rejected. The testator's daughter Kezia died, leaving issue, and the only condition was performed. The language which requires the legatee to be alive at the death of the tenant for life, applies only to the children of the testator.

Mr. P. Leigh, in reply. It was never referred to the Master to approve of a contingent gift being converted into an absolute interest.

Gray v. Garman (2 Hare, 268), Pinbury v. Elkin (1 P. Wms. 563), Barnes v. Allen (1 Bro. C. C. 181; and 3 Ves. 208, n.), Stanley v. Wise (1 Cox, 432), Tytherleigh v. Tartin (6 Sim. 329), [365] Christopherson v. Naylor (1 Mer. 320), Butler v. Ommamey (4 Russ. 70), Waugh v. Waugh (2 Myl. & K. 41), Peel v. Catlow (9 Sim. 372) were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In the first place, it does not appear to me, that the orders which were made for the purpose of compromising the former suit, do determine this question in any way whatever. The Court sanctioned a compromise, and Kezia May Bennett was to be considered entitled to one-third part of the estate in the stead of her late mother deceased. Was she to be entitled to it absolutely, by arrangement between the parties, and independently of the will, or as legatees under and according to the terms of the will?

If this question had been raised at the time, and upon consideration of the matter, and on looking at the Master's report, the Court had determined that she was absolutely entitled, the fund would, without doubt, have been placed to her account absolutely. If, on the other hand, the Court had determined that it was contingent upon her living at the death of the tenant for life, then it would have been carried to her contingent account. I therefore consider this question to be open.

I do not delay putting a construction on this will, for I think I could not acquire greater certainty by further consideration. There is, I think, great inaccuracy and uncertainty in the expressions. The testator, speaking of the residue which he had given to the trustees, says this, "upon trust to pay, assign, transfer," &c., "the residue unto and amongst all and every my said children who shall be then living," that [366] is simple enough; but then he proceeds "or if dead, 'leaving,' or 'having' lawful issue, in equal shares and proportions, if more than one, and if but one, then to such only child."

This clause, by itself, is ambiguous; but the next clause shews clearly that he meant the issue to take, for he says "the issue of any of my said children to take the share their father or mother would have been entitled to." So it is clear he intended the issue were to take under the former clause; he assumes that, as appears from that which follows immediately afterwards.

Then what issue were to take? Clearly the issue of any child of his own who might be dead at the time of the death of the tenant for life. And then comes the question, whether the issue of any daughter living at the time of her death, but who afterwards died in the lifetime of the tenant for life, could take. That is the question decided on the present occasion.

Now with regard to the general rule as to gifts in remainder, there is no doubt. The question is, whether the peculiar wording of this will does not lead to a different construction. I conceive that the expression in the first part, construed by the last, applies a gift to the children who should be living at the time of the death of the tenant for life, and to the issue of any child who may have previously died, such issue being living at the death of the tenant for life. I think so, because the words which follow shew that he clearly intended the issue to take by substitution, for "the issue of any of his said children are to take only the share their father or mother would have been entitled to."

[367] The gift also is to be by a transfer or payment, and not in any other way; the transfer or payment is "to be made to those children of the testator who might be then living," namely, at the time of the death of the widow. The issue of any daughter who might have previously died, is to take, by way of substitution, "the share the mother would have been entitled to."

The words "transfer and pay" constitute the gift both to the children living at the time of the testator's death, and to the issue. And I do not think it unworthy of consideration here, that if you construe it in any other way, you apply the same words in one case to the class of children living at the death of the tenant for life, and in the other case, to the issue not only who were then living, but who had previously died.

The case is attended with considerable doubt and difficulty; but, on the whole, it appears to me, upon the construction of the words of this will, that the gift was intended to be for the benefit of those persons only who were living at the death of the tenant for life, and the whole issue of one of the children of the testator having died in the lifetime of the tenant for life, I think that the other children are entitled [363] HEARN v. WAY. July 28, 29, 1843.

The Plaintiff upon a demurrer being filed wrote to say he submitted thereto, and would obtain an order to amend. More than two months afterwards, he obtained an order, as of course, to amend, it was discharged for irregularity. Practice as to filing, entering, setting down, and submitting to a demurrer.

On the 7th of March 1843 the Defendant filed a demurrer to the Plaintiff's bill and gave notice thereof to the Plaintiff's solicitors on the same day.

On the 11th of March the Plaintiff's solicitors wrote to the Defendant's solicitors stating that they were instructed to submit to the demurrer, and that an order to amend would be obtained forthwith.

The demurrer was neither entered by the Defendant, nor set down by the Plaintiff. The Plaintiff took proceedings to obtain administration to the parties, whose absence was the cause of the demurrer, which he effected on the 4th of May, and on the 12th of May he obtained an order of course to amend the bill, on payment of 20s. costs. The order was in the common form, and contained no statement of the special facts which had occurred in the suit.

It was now moved to discharge this order for irregularity, with costs.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, for the motion.

Bullock v. Edington (1 Sim. 481), Nicholson v. Peile (2 Beavan, 497), Charles v. Richmond (4 Beavan, 397), Jordan v. Sawkins (3 B. C. C. 372).

[369] July 29. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Defendant having filed a demurrer, is to give notice to the Plaintiff of his having done so (Ord. Can. 216.)

And within eight days after the filing, he is to enter the demurrer with the registrar. Neglecting to do so, the demurrer will be overruled, or deemed to be abandoned. (Beames' Orders, 287; and see Dalton v. Hayter, 7 Beav. 250.)

After the demurrer has been entered, either party may set it down for argument. Upon the demurrer being filed, the 34th Order of August 1841 (Ord. Can. 17) declares, that it shall be held sufficient, unless the Plaintiff shall, within twelve days from the expiration of the time allowed to the Defendant for filing such demurrer, cause the same to be set down for argument.

Before the demurrer is set down, the Plaintiff may obtain an order, as of course, to amend the bill, on payment of 20s. costs. (Warburton v. The Blackwall Ropewalk Company, 2 Beavan, 255.)

If the demurrer has been set down, the Plaintiff submitting thereto, is not to amend without the payment of additional cost. (Anon. 9 Ves. 221; 32d Ord. April 1828; Ord. Can. 17.)

On the 12th of March before the notice was given, it was the duty of the Defendant to enter and set down the demurrer, and the Plaintiff was at liberty to amend on payment of 20s. costs.

[370] The Plaintiff did not then amend, and he put a stop to any further steps on the part of the Defendant, by giving notice that he submitted to the demurrer, and intended to amend.

I am of opinion, that the Plaintiff's notice relieved the Defendant from the necessity of entering the demurrer, and that after it, the Plaintiff would have had reason to complain, if the Defendant, instead of trusting to the notice, had proceeded to enter and set down the demurrer.

The Defendant had reason to complain that the Plaintiff did not amend his bill till more than two months after his notice.

And I am of opinion, that if the Plaintiff had stated on his petition for leave to amend, the time which had elapsed since the demurrer was filed, or that he had given notice two months before, that he submitted to the demurrer and intended to amend, the order ought not to have been granted, as of course.

[371] STOCKEN v. DAWSON. May 5, 8, 1843.

A surviving partner being the executor of his deceased partner, is not entitled to an allowance for carrying on the business after his partner's decease, for the benefit of the estate; nor is an executor and legatee of such surviving partner.

This case came before the Court upon exceptions and for further directions.

The facts, so far as relates to the point intended to be reported, are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Court.

July 31. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In and before the month of May 1820 John Stocken and William Stocken carried on the business of brewers, in partnership together. John Stocken, being entitled to some real estate, and also to some personal estate, besides that which was employed in the brewery, died on the 31st day of May 1820, having made a will, dated the 6th of July 1818, whereby, after devising as therein mentioned to his son James Julius Stocken (the Plaintiff), and his daughter Maria Mattam (a Defendant), and reciting that he was jointly with his brother William Stocken possessed of or entitled to certain property, including the brewhouse, garden, cooper-[372]-age, maltlofts, and appurtenances then used and occupied by himself and his said brother, he devised his undivided moiety thereof to William Stocken, Thomas Carlton and Benjamin Dawson, in trust to receive the rents, and apply the same towards the support of his son and daughter during their minorities; and when the youngest of them come of age, he devised the same to them in equal shares. He directed that within a reasonable time after his death, his share in the brewery and the good-will thereof, and the stock and things used therein, should be valued and ascertained, and should be offered for sale to his brother William, on fair and reasonable terms. And that he, if he would consent to purchase the same, should be put in possession thereof, on his giving or giving security to the testator's executors for payment of the value, at such reasonable times as they should think proper; and that the monies arising therefrom, and from the joint debts due to the brewery partnership, when got in, should fall into the residue of his personal estate. And he directed, that if his brother William should take his moiety of the brewery, stock and appurtenances, he should have the option of purchasing any part of the testator's moiety of the copyhold premises in the will mentioned; but if his said brother should decline to take and purchase his moiety in the brewery, &c., he directed that it should continue and be carried on in the same manner in which it then was, for the better maintenance and support of his wife and children. And he gave the residue of his estate equally between his children on their attaining twenty-one years of age; and appointed William Stocken, Thomas Carlton and Benjamin Dawson, executors of his will, and trustees for the purposes thereof.

In the month of October 1820 the will and a codicil thereto were proved by William Stocken and Benjamin [373] Dawson. In the preceding months of June and August, a valuation of the brewery and part of the property connected therewith was made, with a view to the purchase thereof by William Stocken; and the rest of the property connected with the brewery being afterwards valued in February 1822, the whole was stated to amount to the sum of £6429, 17s., from which being deducted the debts of the concern and other sums, the testator's moiety of the remainder was stated to be £2413, 4s. 9½d.

The business was, after the death of John Stocken, carried on by William Stocken, up to the time of his own death. He appears to have considered himself absolute owner of the business and property, under the leave to purchase given by the will and upon the valuations which had been made. He died on the 23d day of February 1824, having first made a will, dated the 1st of November 1823, whereby he gave to his son the Defendant Oliver Thomas Joseph Stocken, all his interest in the brewery and in the freehold, copyhold, and leasehold premises in which the business was carried on, and whereby he appointed Oliver Thomas Joseph Stocken, James King and Benjamin Dawson executors thereof.

The executors of William Stocken having proved his will, they, or Oliver Thomas Joseph Stocken with their assent, took possession of the brewery, and he, considering himself to be owner under his father's will, carried on the business thereof as though for his own benefit.

It was alleged on the part of the Plaintiff during his minority, that either no valuations as were stated to have been made by William Stocken had in fact been made, or that if made, the same were inaccurate and improper; and on the 13th January 1827 the bill was filed by the Plaintiff then an infant, by his next friend [374] against Benjamin Dawson, the surviving executor of John Stocken, and one of the executors of William Stocken, Oliver Thomas Joseph Stocken and James King the two other executors of William Stocken, and Peter Mattam, and Maria his wife who was one of the residuary legatees of John Stocken; and the bill, alleging that William Stocken had not become the owner of the brewery and property connected therewith, prayed the usual accounts of the personal and real estates of John Stocken, and also an account of the profits of the brewery which accrued from the death of John Stocken to the death of William, and what was due from Dawson the executors of William in respect thereof. The bill also prayed an account of debts, funeral and testamentary expenses and legacies of John Stocken, and that the clear residue of his estate might be ascertained, and the Plaintiff's interest therein secured for his benefit, and that the trade and business and the good-will thereof might be sold, and one moiety thereof secured for the Plaintiff, and for a receiver.

The cause came on to be heard in the month of November 1830, and by decree then made, after referring it to the Master to take the usual accounts of the real and personal estates of John Stocken, it was declared, that the interest of John Stocken in the brewery was not affected by the valuation and purchase in the pleadings mentioned. And it was referred to the Master to take an account of the profits of the brewery, which accrued due since the death of John Stocken up to the death of William Stocken, and of the profits accruing therefrom from the time of the death of William Stocken, come to the hands of Benjamin Dawson and William Stocken in his lifetime or either of them, or to the hands of Benjamin Dawson, Oliver Thomas Joseph Stocken and James King since the death of William Stocken, and [375] the Master, in taking the accounts, was to make unto the parties all allowances.

The cause was reheard before the Lords Commissioners on the 24th of August 1835, and an error was corrected, but in substance the decree was confirmed.

The Plaintiff's second exception complains of the allowance of two sums £100, 2s. 9d. and of £15, 15s. for payment made in respect of valuations of partnership property made in the months of April and June 1822; and as it appears to me that these valuations were made with a view to the purchase of the partnership stock by William Stocken, which purchase has been set aside, I think that the expense of the valuation should not be charged against the estate of John Stocken and consequently that the Plaintiff's second exception should be allowed.

The fourth exception must, I think, also be allowed, as it does not appear that the valuation therein mentioned and charged for was an expence properly incurred in carrying on the brewery business. If it had appeared, as was suggested, that the valuations mentioned in the second and fourth exceptions had been made in the direction of William Stocken in the proper discharge of his duty, as executor of John, the expence ought to have been allowed.

The eleventh and twelfth raise, and depend upon, the question whether William and Oliver were entitled to allowances for their trouble in carrying on the business. As to the allowances, John and William Stocken were partners in trade, carry-a business in which they were equally interested, without articles. William Stocken [376] survived, and carried on the trade. The will of John Stocken enabled him to purchase John's share of the business, and he intended to do so, but the decree declares, that the interest of John is not affected by the valuation and purchase of William, so that we must see what was to be done in the absence of a purchase by William, and the will of John directs that if William declines to purchase, the business shall continue and be carried on in the same manner it then was, for the maintenance and support of the testator's wife and children. This case appears to me to fall directly under the authority of Burden v. Burden (1 Ves. & B. 407); and I am therefore of opinion, that William Stocken was not entitled to the allowance claimed for his trouble; and, I think that Oliver, who succeeded to the management of the business, as the legatee and an executor of William, can be in no better situation, and I therefore disallow these exceptions.

equity, a transfer of goods for valuable consideration by a consignee for a limited purpose, does not destroy the consignor's right of stoppage in transitu, ultra the particular lien of the transferee.

consigned goods of the value of £1800 to B., who transferred the bill of lading to C. to secure £1000. B. having become bankrupt, C., as B.'s factor, claimed, as against A.'s title to stop in transitu, a right to retain the whole in satisfaction of a general balance due to him from B. Held, first, that he was not entitled beyond the £1000; and, secondly, that A.'s remedy against C. for the surplus, was in equity.

The Plaintiffs were merchants residing at Stralsund; on the 17th of May 1841 their agent Mr. Schleicher, on their behalf, sold to James Williams Thomas a quantity of wheat, at 35s. per quarter free on board, the shipment to be made with to London, at the current rate of freight, and the amount to be [377] paid for on Thomas at three month's date, payable in London on handing invoice bill of lading.

The Plaintiffs accordingly, on the 1st of June 1841, shipped at Stralsund, by the "Ceres" 714 quarters of wheat; a bill of lading was signed by Zillmer the master of the ship in the usual form, and the Plaintiffs, having made out and signed invoice of the wheat, sent the same with the bill of lading to Thomas, and, at the same time, drew upon them three bills for the amount in the whole of £1264, 2s.; by letter requested Thomas to protect those bills.

Thomas received the bill of lading and invoice on the 8th of June 1841, and he thereupon requested Ruding to accept for him a bill of exchange for £1000, payable three months after date, which Ruding agreed to do, on receiving from Thomas a memorandum or letter signed by Thomas to this effect:—

"London, 9th June 1841.—Messrs. J. C. Ruding & Son.—Gentlemen,—In consideration of your having this day accepted my draft on you at three months' date for £1000 on a cargo of wheat (viz., 3825 scheffels), from Stralsund per the "Ceres," a ship of Zillmer, of which I have handed you the policy of insurance for £1600 and a bill of lading, I authorise you to dispose of the same on my account, subject to your usual commission and charges, before such bill becomes due; or, I undertake to provide you with cash to the amount of your advance, should I wish you to hold it good at that time.

JAMES W. THOMAS."

On the 1st of July 1841, the ship "Ceres" with the wheat on board, arrived in the port of London. About [378] this time, Mr. Thomas stopped payment. On the 2d of July Schleicher, the agent of the Plaintiffs, gave a verbal notice, and on the 3d of July a written notice to Zillmer the master of the "Ceres," not to part with the wheat, without the orders of the Plaintiffs. On the 5th of July a fiat of bankruptcy was issued against Thomas, and on the same day Schleicher again gave notice to the master not to part with the wheat, but being then informed that the bill of lading had been indorsed and delivered to Ruding as a security for monies lent, he permitted the wheat to be delivered to Ruding, but on the same day gave him notice, that the Plaintiffs claimed to be entitled to the wheat and the proceeds thereof, and did so by removing the stop placed upon the delivery to Ruding, abandon their claim, and that in case Ruding should be entitled by law to any part of such proceeds, the Plaintiffs claimed the balance which should remain, after satisfying such claim, if any as Ruding might by law have.

Ruding claimed to be entitled to apply the proceeds of the wheat, not only to payment of the £1000 bill which he had accepted, and the freight and other charges of the shipment, but also in satisfaction of the balance of a general account which was alleged to be subsisting between himself and Thomas. Under these circumstances the Plaintiffs offered to pay him £1200 in satisfaction of his acceptance, and the charges on the wheat, and requested to have the wheat thereupon delivered to them. This was on the 23d of July. Mr. Ruding refused to accept the money offered to him, or to deliver up the wheat, and he afterwards, on the 21st of August 1841, sold it for £1822, which he retained to his own use. Having subsequently, in December 1841, declined to acknowledge that the Plaintiffs had any claim whatever, this bill was filed on the 31st of December 1841.

[379] The bill prayed, that an account might be taken of the monies which had come to the hands of the Defendant Ruding, in respect of the wheat, and also of the monies due to the same Defendant on the security of the bill of lading. That the Defendant might be allowed such last-mentioned monies, and might pay to the Plaintiffs the balance of the monies arising from the wheat.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Fisher, for the Defendant Ruding.

[380] July 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I apprehend it to be clear, that the indorsement and delivery of the bill of lading by Thomas the consignee to Ruding, for valuable consideration, gave to Ruding the legal right to the delivery and possession of the goods. That right is not disputed by this bill, but the Plaintiffs insist, that under the contract subsisting between Thomas and Ruding, the right to the possession of the goods was vested in Ruding, only as a security for the repayment to him of his advance and charges, and that subject to that security, the Plaintiffs, in the consideration of a Court of Equity, retained their right to a stoppage in transitu against the assignee or indorsee of the bill of lading; it appears that in the case of Westzinthus (5 B. & Adol. 817) the Court of Queen's Bench held, that in such a case, a Court of Equity would hold such a transfer to be a pledge or mortgage only, and that the attempt to stop in transitu gave a right to the goods, in equity, subject only to the lien for the advance.

The propriety of that opinion was questioned, but, as it appears to me, without sufficient reason. As against Thomas, I think that the Plaintiffs had a right to stop the goods in transitu; and, although the legal right to the goods was transferred with the bill of lading, yet I think, that in equity, the transfer took effect only to the extent of the consideration paid by the transferee, leaving in the Plaintiffs an equitable interest in the surplus value.

In the argument for the Defendants it was urged, that they, in the character of factors for Thomas, had an interest of their own to retain the surplus value in [381] satisfaction of a balance due to them from Thomas; and, secondly, that any interest of the Plaintiffs, though of an equitable nature, might be made available in an action to be brought by them against the Defendants in this cause; but the goods came to the hands of Ruding under a special contract, interfering with any general right which he might have as factor; and, even if the Defendants were entitled to be considered as factors of Thomas, having a balance due to them, it does not appear to me, that, as against the Plaintiffs the owners and shippers of the goods entitled to them in transitu, they could, by virtue of the bill of lading, have a right to retain more than the consideration they paid for the advantage which the bill of lading gave them; and as to the action, the legal right to the goods being clearly in the Defendants, it does not appear to me that the Plaintiffs could have obtained, at law, that relief which I think them entitled to here.

I am therefore of opinion that the Plaintiffs are entitled to the decree which is made by the bill, and that an account must be taken of the monies received by the Defendants in respect of the wheat in question, and of the monies due to the Defendants on the security of the bill of lading, and that the balance may be ascertained and paid to the Plaintiffs by the Defendants.

[382] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE DRAPERS' COMPANY. (HOWELL'S CHARITY.) May 3, 1843.

A bequest was made to a corporation, in terms which devoted the whole improved income to a charity. In 1559, the corporation, by their answer in a suit, offered to apply the whole income to the charity. The decree directed the distribution of the whole existing income, and provided that in case of an increase, the objects should receive an increase limited to £16, but it made no disposition of any surplus. Held, that under this decree the corporation was not, by implication, entitled to such surplus.

Generally, a charitable gift must be accepted according to the declared intention of the giver; but a corporation not being bound to accept an accession to its foundation, may consent to receive it with qualifications, which may be collected either from documents, or constant usage adopted at the time and persevered in afterwards.

Charity informations, the account is sometimes carried back to the date of the report of the Charity Commissioners, sometimes it is directed from the filing the information, and sometimes from the decree, according to the circumstances of each case.

This was an information filed by the Attorney-General, on the certificate of the Charity Commission, under the following circumstances:—

The testator, Thomas Howell, being resident at Seville, made his will in 1540, whereby he bequeathed in the words following:—"Item, I comaunde myne exors, that I leve in Syvall that incontinnt after my deathe, doo send to the City of London 12,000 duckats of golde by billes of Cambio, for to delyver to the house called the Drapers' Hall, to delyver theyme to the wardaynes therof, and the wardaynes as sone as they have received the same 12,000 duckats, to bye thereunto 400 duckats of rent yarely for ever more, in possession for ever more. And it is my will that the saide 400 duckats be disposed vnto foure maidens, being orphans, out of my kynne and of bludde, to theire marriage, if they can be founde, every one theyme to have 100 duckats; and if they cannot be founde of my lynnage, then to be given to other foure maydens, though that they be not of my lynnage, so that they be orphans honest and of good fame, and every of theyme 100 duckats, and every yere, for to marry foure maydens [383] for ever. And if the saide 12,000 duckats will bye more lande, then the saide 12,000 duckats to be spent to the marriage of maydens, being orphans, increasing the foure maydens aforesaide, as shall come by the discretion aforesaide of the master and wardaynes of the saide house of Drapers' Hall, and that this memoria to remayne in writing, in the booke of memoryes in the saide howse, in suche manner as it shall at no tyme be undon for ever."

The sum of 8720 ducats only was transmitted to the Drapers' Company.

In 1543 the Drapers' Company purchased from Henry VIII. some property in the City of London, which had been forfeited by the attainder of Cromwell, Earl of Essex, which was conveyed to them; and the company covenanted with the king to distribute the clear rents "to and for the marriage of poor maidens, being orphans."

About 1559 a suit was instituted in this Court (Cryssly v. Chester) by certain female orphans, alleged kinwomen of the testator, stating that the Defendants had purchased lands of the yearly rent of £105, but had disposed of the residue of the said bequest to their own benefit, and claiming the benefit of the said charity. The Drapers' Company, by their answer in that suit, admitted that the rent of the premises purchased with the charity funds amounted to £105 a year, but said that £30 a year was expended in the reparations; and they stated "that they always intended, and still did intend, God willing, as near as they could, to perform the said will and testament of the said Thomas Hoell, with as much of the rents of the premises as should come clearly to their [384] hands, over and above all charges, if they were ascertained, or hereafter should be ascertained, what maidens or orphans of his kin or lineage ought of right to have the same legacies according unto his will, which thereunto they could not perfectly attain to know."

By the decree in that suit, it was ordered that £84 a year should be paid "out of the rents and revenues" by the company amongst four orphans, £21 to each; and it was provided that if the premises should be decayed by casualty by fire, so that the £84 could not be levied, the company should be charged with an apportioned part only; and it was further provided, that if the property should be improved, above £84 payable to the orphans and £21 allowed to the company for their ordinary and extraordinary charges, that then the same improvement, over and above the sum of £84 and £21, should be equally divided and paid, yearly, to the said four orphans, portion and portion alike, in form thereinbefore recited; forseeing always, that the same improvement yearly to be divided to the said four orphans did not exceed the value of £16 by the year. And it was provided, that if the company should receive the remaining 3280 ducats, or such portion as would purchase an increase of lands, &c., to the yearly value of £16, then the company should pay the four orphans so much as the increased rent should amount to, "forseeing that in the whole the said orphans should not be paid above the yearly sum of £100."

The property now consisted of the hall of the Drapers' Company, and other premises producing more than £2000 a year. The company paid £84 a year to the maiden orphans, and carried the residue to the account of the company's income, but they expended a considerable part of their general income in charitable purposes.

[385] The information insisted, that the company were bound to apply the whole income towards the purposes of the charity.

The company, by their answer, relied on the former decree, and submitted, whether they were entitled to appropriate the surplus income to their own use; however, they said, that it had always been considered by the company, that, fulfilling the requisitions of the former decree, which they were willing to do, they were entitled to the property, and were freed from all further demands.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL, Mr. Pemberton Leigh, and Mr. Blunt, in support of the information, contended that, under the terms of the will, no benefit was given to the Defendants. That, both by their covenant with King Henry the Eighth, and their answer in the former suit, they were bound to apply the whole income to the charitable objects. That the decree did not give to them any interest in the surplus, and that if it did, still that the decree was not binding on the Attorney-General, he not having been a party to the suit.

Sir Thomas Wilde, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Lloyd, contra, insisted, that under the decree the benefits to be taken by the objects of the charity were expressly limited to £100 a year, and that, by implication, the company was to receive the surplus. That every presumption ought, at this distance of time, to be made in favour of the Defendants who, were shewn, by constant usage, to be entitled to the surplus; and that, as the gift was to a class of relatives of the testator, it was not necessary that the Attorney-General should be made a party to the former suit.

[386] The Attorney-General v. The Coopers' Company (3 Beavan, 29) was cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears perfectly clear, from the terms of the will, that the testator intended that the whole of the rent of the purchased property should be applied to the purpose indicated by him; and subsequently, on the occasion of the purchase, when the company obtained the grant from the Crown, they expressly covenanted, that the whole rents should be so applied.

In the answer of the Defendants in the former suit, there is a passage which is of the utmost importance in this case, not only as shewing their view of the uses to which they were bound to apply the gift they had accepted, but also for the purpose of ascertaining the questions raised in that case, and what was then decided by the Court. It is also of some importance, as shewing in what way the gift was accepted, because there have been instances, in which the Court has held, that, from contemporaneous transactions, you may infer the nature and extent of the trust assumed by the persons who accepted a gift. No doubt, generally speaking, a gift must be accepted according to the intention of the giver as declared at the time, but where the object is to make a corporation undertake the management of a trust, then, as was stated by Lord Eldon in The Catherine Hall case (Jacob, 381; and see The Attorney-General v. Caius College, 2 Keen, 150), the college, being under no obligation whatever to accept an accession to its foundation, may only consent to receive an increase subject to certain qualifications, which the Court may collect from the transactions that took place at the time, as evidenced by documents, or as [387] proved by a constant usage adopted at the time, and persevered in downwards. This is not a case precisely of that sort, but here we have the Defendant's declaring, by their answer, "that they always intended, and still do intend, God willing, as near as they could, to perform the will and testament of Thomas Howell, with as much of the rents of the premises as shall come clearly to their hands."

It is to be observed, that at this time, the rents, being £105, were unequal to answer the full purpose of the founder. The decree approves of a scheme by which the whole was disposed of. It gives £21 for the reparation and maintaining the property, and £84 for the portions to be given to the poor maidens; and, it is to be observed, that nothing whatever is reserved to the company. If the company were to have been supposed by the Court to be entitled to a beneficial interest in the rent, surely it would not have been very just to abandon and neglect such interest altogether.

No such declaration was however made, nor could it have been made, because the company had stated in their answer that they were willing to apply towards the charity all that clearly came to their hands. This decree being made with reference to the rents then received and exhausting the whole, it certainly might be expected, that some provision would have been made in the case of any increase or decrease of the rents, especially as the sums to be applied by the company were to be paid out of the rents. Accordingly provision is made for the event of a decrease by destruction by fire. It is true that no direction is contained for a decrease by any other event; but is it to be collected, that in every other event, the decrease was to be made good by the com-[388]pany out of their own funds? when they were directed to apply these sums "out of the rents."

On the other hand, there might be an increase, either by the improvement of the rents of the estates already purchased, or by new purchases to be made with that part of the money which had not then been transmitted from Spain; in both these cases, a provision was made for an increase to the extent of £16, which, added to the £84, would make £100, or four sums of £25 for each maiden. Now, without having arithmetical demonstration of it, I feel strongly persuaded that it was intended to increase the sum to that intended by the testator himself to be the endowment of each poor maiden, and I do not entertain a reasonable doubt that this was what the decree had in view. There is not one word as to any other further surplus that might probably arise; there was an offer by the Defendants to apply everything, and in that state of things the Court was silent, and did not proceed any further.

The question is, whether I am to collect from that decree that the Court declared, by implication (an express declaration is not found or contended for in any way), that because it had not disposed of the surplus beyond £16, the rest was to be applied for the benefit of the company. I confess I am totally unable to follow the reasoning by which that is attempted to be made out. If it had been intended, there ought to have been an express declaration, but there could not on those pleadings have been any such a declaration; because it would have been contrary to the offers of the company by their answer. The question never did arise or could arise upon the pleadings in that case, and I am of opinion, that the decree does not, by anticipation, decide the question which is brought before me to-day.

[389] I must, therefore, look at these documents, and see whether (according to the rules of construction which have been adopted in this Court, where funds are given to a charity with a direction to apply them all to the purposes of the charity, in a manner to exclude all notion of a beneficial interest being vested in the trustees), the trustees have a right to apply all the funds, beyond what was disposed of by the decree, to their own benefit; I am of opinion that I cannot do so, and that, on the contrary, I must make an opposite declaration.

As to the time from which the account against the Defendants should be taken, I must say that nothing can be more satisfactory in an investigation of this kind, than to find, that there is no possibility of any imputation of bad or corrupt conduct on the part of the Defendants. The present Defendants, beyond all question, have applied this fund just in the manner in which it has been applied by their predecessors; in all probability, they never looked at the original foundation at all, but instead of applying it to any beneficial purposes of their own, it is now shewn by the evidence and by their answer, and it is admitted by the Attorney-General, that they have applied the funds in a beneficial manner for the most useful charitable purposes.

It is, therefore, quite satisfactory to me to find, that the Attorney-General confines his claim for an account from the filing of the information, and the account, therefore, must be directed from that time alone, and I may say, that if it had been pressed further back, I think I must have come to the same conclusion; and that I could not, with any justice, have charged this company with applying to its own purposes any of those funds. Every case depends upon its own circumstances; there [390] are cases in which the account has been taken from the time when the information of the erroneous application was made known, namely, from the publication of the report of the Charity Commissioners. Other cases in which it has been directed from the time of filing the information, and others from the date of the decree. Those three periods of time have, according to the various circumstances of each case, been adopted; but I think that which is now proposed by the Attorney-General, is what is quite right to be done in this case.

With respect to the costs, the company have thought fit to have this question tried, in order that they might have the application of this money, according to their own view of what was right. (The Attorney-General v. The Drapers' Company (Kendrick's Charity), 4 Beav. p. 72; The Attorney-General v. Christ's Hospital, 4 Beav. p. 75.) If the costs are asked against the company by the Attorney-General, he must have them.

I think, therefore, there must be a declaration that all this income is applicable to the purposes of the testator's will. The account must be taken from the filing of the information, and the costs must be paid by the Defendants.

[391] DE WEEVER v. ROCHFORD. July 14, 1843.

Special order for allowance of maintenance to an infant resident with her father out of the jurisdiction.

A reference was made to the Master, to inquire if the father of the infant Plaintiff was of ability to maintain her, and if not, to approve of a proper allowance for that purpose.

The Master reported that the father was not of ability, and he submitted, that the income of the property in Court ought to be paid to the Plaintiff's father for her maintenance and education during her minority.

A petition was presented to confirm the Master's report, and for an order for payment to the father.

The infant Plaintiff and her father were both living in Demerara, out of the jurisdiction of the Court.

Mr. Freeling, in support of the petition.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, he doubted whether it was the practice of the Court, where an infant and her father were living abroad, to direct payment of maintenance to the father, and he suggested that the order should be, that some person resident in this country should be appointed guardian to whom the money should be paid. He, however, directed the petition to stand over in order that the authorities might be looked into.

The case was mentioned again, when [392] Mr. Freeling referred to a case of Bliss v. Putnam (Rolls, 19th November 1840), in which the infant and her mother, who was her guardian, were residing in Canada, and it was ordered, that upon production, from time to time, to the Accountant-General of this Court, of an affidavit of Mrs. Putnam, the mother, that she had duly applied in the maintenance and education of the infant Petitioners, all moneys received by her on that account, up to the time of making such affidavits, respectively, an allowance of £600 a year should be paid to the attorney for the father in England, during the respective minorities of the infant Petitioners, for their maintenance.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] now ordered as follows:—That Mr. De Weever should appoint an attorney to receive the maintenance, and, upon the appointment of such attorney, the dividends of the funds in Court should be paid to the attorney, half-yearly, upon the production to the Accountant-General of an affidavit that he had duly applied, in the maintenance and education of the infant, all moneys received by him on that account, up to the time of making such affidavits respectively. The infant was entitled to real estates in England and Ireland, his father was dead. Infant's mother proposes that Richard Reynell, the maternal uncle of the infant, who was resident in Ireland, and had been appointed guardian of the infant's estate in Ireland by the Court of Chancery there, should be appointed guardian of the estate in England.

Order accordingly, Mr. Reynell entering into a recognizance with two sureties to account; and a commission directed to take the recognizances in Ireland.—Reg. Lib. 1796, B. fol. 618.

In re Daly, 22d May 1798.

Infant entitled to estates in England and Ireland, his father dead.

His mother resident in Ireland, had been appointed guardian of person and estate in Irish Chancery.

Order that she be appointed guardian of person and estate in England, entering into recognizances to account for what she received, and for a commission to take the recognizances in Ireland.—Reg. Lib. A. 1797, fol. 1029.

Similar order as to brother of the infant.—Reg. Lib. A. 1802, fol. 142.

[368] DAVIS v. BLUCK. July 14, August 1, 1843.

Bill ordered, upon motion, to be taken off the file, on the ground that it was a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, which ought not to have been filed without the leave of the Court.

A contract was entered into for the sale of the vendor's interest in a lease and premises at Doncaster, known as the Betting-Rooms, for the remainder of the lease granted by A. A bill for specific performance was filed by the purchaser, in which and in the decree the agreement was treated as comprising the premises held of A, and an account of the rents was directed. It turned out that the rooms and premises were partly under A. and partly under B., whereupon the vendor filed a second bill, praying a declaration that the whole was comprised in the agreement. Held, however, that the Plaintiff could not, upon a rehearing, obtain the relief asked by the second bill, nor could he, by such second bill, obtain the relief thereby prayed, whilst the decree stood in its present form; that to obtain the relief asked, the original cause must be reheard with the second, and, consequently, that the second bill was a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, which ought not to be filed without leave of the Court.

In this case, the Plaintiffs, by their original bill, stated, that Charles Bluck alleged himself to be entitled to a moiety of and in certain premises situate in High Street, Doncaster, called the Subscription Betting-Rooms, consisting of the new betting-rooms and other buildings erected thereon, for the residue of a term of twenty-one years, commencing from the 25th of March 1828, under a lease granted to Anne King, whereby the entirety of the premises were demised to him and John Goodered [304] for twenty-one years. That the said Charles Bluck, alleging himself to be so entitled, signed an agreement in writing, dated the 30th day of October 1840, and which was in the following words, i.e. :—

"Newmarket, October 30th, 1840.—I, Charles Bluck, do agree to sell and assign, and we, James Hollick Davis, and James Adkins, do agree to buy of said Charles Bluck, his half-share of the lease and premises, situate in Doncaster in the county of York, known as the Subscription Betting-Rooms, for the remainder of a lease granted by Anne King to John Goodered and Charles Bluck, for the sum of £1200, to be paid by the aforesaid James Hollick Davis and James Adkins as follows: £300 to be paid on the assignment of the lease to the said James Hollick Davis and James Adkins, within twenty-one days from the date of this agreement, £500 to be further paid on or before the 30th of January 1841, and an additional sum of £400 on or before the 20th day of July 1841, making altogether the sum of £1200 of lawful money of Great Britain. Either party failing to perform said agreement, to forfeit the sum of £200 of lawful money of Great Britain. Provided the parties, James Hollick Davis and Charles Adkins, continue in quiet possession of the premises eight years from the date hereof, the said James Hollick Davis and James Adkins agree to the further sum of £100 to the said Charles Bluck.

"CHARLES BLUCK.
"JAMES HOLICK DAVIS.
"JAMES ADKINS."

Of this agreement the bill prayed a specific performance, and it was asked that the Defendant might produce to the Plaintiffs the said lease, and make to the Plaintiffs a proper assignment thereof.

[395] By the decree, dated the 7th of June 1842, it was ordered, that the agreement of the 30th of October 1840 should be specifically performed and carried into execution; the Defendant was to pay the costs of the suit to the Plaintiffs, and the Master was to "set an annual value, by way of rent, on the premises agreed to be sold to the Plaintiffs" by Charles Bluck.

It is now alleged, that during the proceedings in the Master's office to set an annual value, by way of rent, on the premises agreed to be sold, the Defendant Thomas Henry Bluck (the legal personal representative of Charles Bluck who had died) pretended, that the agreement did not comprise all the Subscription Betting-rooms, but only such part of them as was comprised in the lease granted to Anne King.

It was now further stated, that the premises comprised in the lease granted to Anne King, were, by indenture dated the 4th of July 1828, assigned by her to Frederick and Charles Bluck who was the Plaintiffs' vendor; and it was alleged, that Frederick and Charles Bluck, being in the year 1830 desirous of enlarging the premises comprised under the lease to Anne King, obtained from Robert Liddell the lease of a stable outbuilding which adjoined a building of two stories comprised in Anne King's lease. The lease granted by Liddell was dated the 27th of September 1830.

It was further alleged, that after the date of Liddell's lease, buildings were made upon, and the premises were so dealt with, as to be known, together with the premises comprised in Anne King's lease, as "the Subscription Betting-Rooms." The Plaintiffs thereupon insisting that the agreement of the 30th of October 1840 ought to be deemed to comprise, not only [396] the premises comprised in Anne King's lease, but also the premises comprised in Liddell's lease, filed a bill, which they (on a present argument) desired to have considered as a supplemental bill; and they prayed for a declaration, that the premises comprised in the leases of the 4th of July 1828 (being Anne King's assignment of her lease), and the 27th of September 1830 (being Liddell's lease), were and are, as to one moiety thereof, comprised in the agreement of October 1840, and that the agreement might be specifically performed in conformity with that declaration.

It was now moved that the second bill might be taken off the file for irregularity. Mr. Kindersley, in support of the motion, contended, that the relief sought by the second bill was different from that obtained by the decree in the first. That it would be necessary to revive the first decree in order to obtain the relief prayed by the second suit; that the second bill was, therefore, in its nature, a bill of review, and ought not to have been filed without the leave of the Court.

That the proceeding was irregular; and that the proper course was to order the second bill to be taken off the file; Hodson v. Ball (11 Sim. 456; and 1 Phil. 177).

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Sidebottom, contra. This is a supplemental bill in aid of the former decree, and not a bill of review. Lord Redesdale, in his Treatise, (page 61 (4th ed.), "Where the imperfection of a suit arises from a defect in the original bill, or in some of [397] the proceedings upon it, and not from any event subsequent to the institution of the suit, it may be added to by a supplemental bill only. Thus a supplemental bill may be filed to obtain a further discovery from a defendant, to put a new matter in issue, or to add parties, where the proceedings are such a state that the original bill cannot be amended for the purpose. And this may be done as well after as before a decree; and the bill may be either in aid of the decree, that it may be carried fully into execution, or that proper directions may be given upon some matter omitted in the original bill, or not put in issue by it, or by the defence made to it, or to bring formal parties before the Court, or it may be used as a ground to impeach the decree, which is the peculiar case of a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, of which it will be necessary to treat more at large in another place." So in Dorner v. Fortesque (3 Atk. 133) it is said, "Supplemental bills are often brought even in aid of a decree of this Court, as in a decree to account for want of full directions before; and directions are given under the supplemental bill, that the new matter should be connected with the former decree."

Here, the property bought was "the Subscription Betting-Rooms and premises;" and therefore comprised the two parts as incorporated together. There was an inaccurate description of the tenure, but this was undoubtedly the property sold. The decree perhaps imperfectly describes the property; and this bill is to supply the defect, and to carry out the decree, according to the real intention of the Court at the hearing.

[398] There is no doubt of the principle, that you cannot file a bill to impeach a decree without leave of the Court; the Court considers its decree right, unless, on the matter being again brought to its attention, it entertains reason to doubt it.

Hodson v. Ball was quite a different case. The original bill was for a simple account, and was in the nature of an action of assumpsit; the second bill sought to charge the Defendants with the consequence of wilful default and in forti. Lord Lyndhurst there observed, "I apprehend that a supplemental bill in aid of a decree cannot vary the principle of the decree. Its province is to carry out the principle of the decree; to give full and complete effect to the decree, as it exists."

The character of this bill is a supplemental bill, seeking additional but not inconsistent relief, and therefore, the leave of the Court was not necessary.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said, he would read over the pleadings to see whether the Plaintiffs were authorised in filing such a bill as the present without having previously obtained the leave of the Court.

August 1. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The Defendant has moved that this bill may be taken off the file for irregularity, and the question is, whether it is a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review or a supplemental bill filed, as it is said, in the aid of the decree. I am of opinion that this is a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review.

There can, I think, be no doubt, but that the title stated in the bill and the agreement therein set forth, as [399] literally interpreted, have reference only to the premises comprised in the lease therein stated to have been granted to Anne King, or to have been assigned by her to Goodered and Charles Bluck. The premises comprised in the agreement are stated to be premises comprised in the lease granted to Anne King, and no others are noticed.

The original bill and the decree treat the agreement as comprising the premises comprised in Anne King's lease, and the Plaintiffs could not, by having the cause reheard, obtain the relief which is asked for by the supplemental bill; and I am of opinion that they cannot, by the supplemental bill, obtain the relief thereby asked for whilst the decree in the original cause stands in its present form.

To obtain the relief which is asked, the original cause must be reheard, at the time when the supplemental cause is heard; and the whole matter being before the Court, the full relief to which the Plaintiffs may be entitled will be considered. I think that a supplemental bill thus brought to supply a defect in the pleadings and decree in the original cause, and the decree upon which it is to be obtained on a rehearing of the decree in the original cause, is a supplemental bill in the nature of a bill of review, which ought not to be filed without the leave of the Court.

I must therefore grant the motion with costs. (NOTE.—See also Wilson v. Todd, 1 Myl. & Cr. 42; and Swan v. Swan, 8 Price, 518.)

[400] KIRKMAN v. HONNOR. April 3, 1843.

Substituted service of an injunction ordered.

In August 1842 an injunction was granted, restraining the Defendant from receiving monies on some Portuguese titulos.

The Plaintiff being unable to serve the injunction, and the Defendant's solicitor in the cause refusing to accept service on the ground that he had no authority to do so,

Mr. Rogers moved, that service on the Defendant's solicitor might be deemed good service.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] made the order. (NOTE.—See Pr. Reg. 232, Hinde, 595; Pearce v. Crutchfield, 14 Ves. 206; Pulleney v. Shelton, 5 Ves. 147.)

[401] SHERWOOD v. WALKER. March 30, April 7, 1843.

[S. C. 7 Jur. 293; affirmed on appeal, 13 L. J. Ch. 258; 8 Jur. 229.]

A suit was instituted by a son against his mother. A compromise was effected, whereby the mother agreed to settle a sum on the son and his family, and pay £170 amongst such of the son's creditors "as should be willing to accept the same in full discharge of their respective debts, and should express their consent" before a given day. None of the creditors assented, and no payment was made to them. The son became insolvent. Held, that the mother was not liable to pay the £170 to the assignees.

John Walker was, under the will of his father, who died in 1814, entitled to the residuary estate. His mother Ann Walker and another were executors of the will. John Walker at the death of his father was an infant, but, having in 1830 attained twenty-one, he, in the same year, instituted a suit against the executors for an account and administration of his father's estate. A compromise of the suit was arranged, which was carried into effect by a deed executed in September 1831, made between Mrs. Walker of the first part, John Walker of the second part, and trustees of the third part; and thereby John Walker, in consideration of the covenants therein contained on the part of Mrs. Walker, assigned to her all his interest in any property to which he was entitled under his father's will; and Mrs. Walker thereby covenanted with her son that she would, within two months, pay £400 in discharge of [402] two of his debts, amounting together to £229, 10s., and pay the remainder of the £400 among such of his creditors "as should be willing to accept the same in full discharge of their respective debts, and should signify their consent to Mrs. Walker on or before the 1st of November next ensuing;" and Mrs. Walker thereby covenanted with the trustees that she would, on or before the 1st of December next, pay to them £800 on certain trusts for John Walker, and his wife and children.

At the time of the execution of this agreement, a list of debts then owing by John Walker was handed to his mother, which amounted to about £505 inclusive of the two debts which were to be paid in full.

Mrs. Walker paid the £800 and £229, 10s., and notice was given to the creditors that the £170, 10s. (the residue of the £400) would be divided among such of them as should accept the same in full discharge of their debts, and should signify their consent before the 1st of November, but none of them assented thereto, and Mrs. Walker therefore made no distribution of the £170, 10s.

John Walker was arrested in November 1831, and was discharged under the Insolvent Act in July 1832. His assignees filed this bill against Mrs. Walker to recover the £170, 10s. in her hands.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Smythe, for the Plaintiffs. John Walker was entitled to the whole of his father's estate, which he assigned to his mother in consideration of the £800 settled, and the £400 to be applied for his benefit. As the creditors did not consent to accept [403] the provision intended for them, there was a resulting trust in favour of John Walker, and not for his mother, who had received the full consideration for it. Where creditors are not parties to the arrangement, a trust for the payment of a person's debts is a trust for the person himself. Walkers v. Coutts (3 Mer. 707), Garrard v. Lord Lauderdale (3 Sim. 1; and 2 Russ. & Myl. 451). Here the particular mode of paying the fund has failed, it therefore belongs to the person for whose benefit it was to be applied, and has passed to his assignees under the insolvency.

Mr. George Turner and Mr. F. Bayley, contra. The question is this: is there or not a covenant in this deed for the payment, at all events, of this sum of money; if there is, the Plaintiffs' remedy is at law and not in equity. The sum of £170 was not to be paid at all events, but only in case the creditors consented to accept it in full discharge of their debts. The event has not happened on which payment was to be made, and, therefore, the Defendant is not liable either at law or in equity. This was a mere family arrangement between the mother and her son, to relieve the son from his pressing liabilities; but if this suit were to succeed, the sum in question will not only be applied in payment of other debts than those agreed upon by Mrs. Walker, and on different terms, but John Walker will be left still liable to those very debts, from which it was the object of his mother to relieve him.

They cited Toovey v. Milne (2 Barn. & Ald. 683).

[404] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question arises on the construction of the deed executed in September 1831, whereby an arrangement was come to between Ann Walker and John Walker her son, she being the legal personal representative of her late husband, and he being entitled to the personal estate.

It seems that a suit had been instituted for the administration of the personal estate, and that the parties came to a settlement of the questions between them upon the terms stated in the deed. It does not appear that any creditor signified his consent, or that there was any offer of any one of the creditors to accept any portion of the remaining sum in satisfaction of his debt. John Walker became insolvent, and this bill is filed by his assignees to recover the £170, the residue of the money, and the principal ground on which this claim is rested is, that there is a resulting trust in favour of John Walker.

I am of opinion that there is no such resulting trust. The intention was plainly to settle family disputes then existing, and to apply £400 in a specific and particular manner in payment of the son's creditors, viz., in payment among such of them as should be willing to accept the same in full discharge of their debts, and should signify their consent. They did not assent, and I therefore think that the £170, 10s. did not become payable in consequence of the events contemplated not having taken place.

Affirmed by the Lord Chancellor 24th February 1844.

[405] ALEXANDER v. ANDERDON. May 31, June 3, July 29, 1843.

The Court has no authority, upon a petition by a client against his solicitor, to give relief founded on a special agreement.

In this case the Defendant Richard Brough Anderdon presented an original and also a supplemental petition, the original petition praying a declaration that certain matters of business, in respect of which Mr. Henry Jackson, a solicitor, claimed to be entitled to charge him for costs, were unauthorized by the Petitioner, and that such parts of the bills of costs as related to such business were fraudulent and improper, and ought not to be charged, and that the rest of Mr. Jackson's bills might be taxed; and the supplemental petition praying that it might be referred to the Master to ascertain what was due to Mr. Jackson, generally, upon his bills of costs on the footing of an alleged agreement, and that it might be declared that a certain promissory note had been satisfied. Both the petitions prayed that Mr. Jackson might be restrained from proceeding at law in respect of the matters alleged.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Turner and Mr. Mylne, in support of the petition.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bagshawe, contra.

July 29. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. On the hearing of the petitions it appeared that, according to the allegations of the Petitioner, the relation subsisting between him and Mr. Jackson was not the ordinary relation subsisting between solicitor and client; and that the ground on which he claimed relief rested, [406] principally, on some special agreement, or on some special understanding, upon which he alleged Mr. Jackson had attended to his business.

I consider it to be settled that, upon a petition presented by the client against the solicitor, the Court has not authority to give relief founded on a special agreement, and, on that account, it appeared to me probable that the petitions could not be sustained, but as the dismissal of the petitions would leave it open to the Petitioner to file a bill for the same matter, upon which bill, if there was a good foundation for his claim, he might obtain relief, I was desirous to give the parties an opportunity of settling the matter in some way that might prevent a prolonged litigation.

As the opportunity has not been taken advantage of, it has become necessary to dispose of the petitions; and, after a careful consideration of the petitions and of the evidence, I am now of opinion that the petitions cannot be sustained, and must be dismissed.

Upon the evidence, I cannot say that the Petitioner may not, under some such agreement or understanding, as he has alleged, be entitled to some relief, if applied in a proper form; but, on these petitions, I cannot say that there are merits upon which I could decide that Mr. Jackson is not entitled to issue execution on the judgments which he has obtained, and if I had come to that conclusion, I do not think that I have jurisdiction to restrain him. As the petitions charge fraud and misconduct, and the case is not supported by sufficient evidence, or shewn to be within the jurisdiction, I think that the petitions must be dismissed with costs. (NOTE.—See In re Smith, 4 Beav. 309.)

[407] NOWELL v. WHITAKER. June 23, 1843.

The Defendant obtained a reference under the Contempt Act, to enquire whether by poverty he was unable to answer. The Master reported in the negative. By an order of the Vice-Chancellor the bill was taken pro confesso, without prejudice to the Defendant applying within ten days to put in his answer. The Defendant, suppressing the previous circumstances, then obtained an order of course for leave to defend in forma pauperis. The order was discharged.

The Defendant having been brought to the Bar of the Court in contempt for want of answer, and his poverty being alleged as a reason for his default, a reference was made to the Master, under the Act (11 G. 4, and 1 W. 4, c. 36, s. 15, rule 6), to enquire whether, by reason of poverty, he was unable to employ a solicitor to put in his answer. The Master reported that he was not unable by poverty, &c.

The Plaintiff proceeded to take the bill pro confesso, and on the 8th of June the Vice-Chancellor made an order for taking the bill pro confesso, without prejudice to the Defendant applying to the Court, within ten days, for leave to put in his answer.

Two days after, the Defendant obtained, at the Rolls, an order of course to stand the suit in forma pauperis. The Defendant, on his application for the order, fully suppressed the circumstances which had previously taken place in the cause.

Mr. Elmsley now moved to discharge the order to defend in forma pauperis, on the ground that it had been obtained as of course, upon a suppression of material circumstances.

Mr. M'Christie, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, that if the Defendant, on his application, had stated the previous circumstances [406] as he ought, they would have received due consideration; but having obtained the order as of course, and upon a suppression of material facts, the motion must, on that ground, be granted, without prejudice to any other application.

[408] EGREMONT v. COWELL. May 5, 1843.

The cause came on in 1839, and was ordered to stand over for want of parties. A bill of revivor and supplement was afterwards filed, stating that A., the sole Plaintiff, had died in 1838, insisting that the order of 1839 was a nullity, and praying a revivor. A common ex parte order to revive was obtained on petition, placing the cause "in the same plight and condition as at the death of A." The Defendant moved to discharge the order on the ground that the order of 1839 must be discharged before the cause could be put in the same plight as at the alleged death of A. Held, however, that it was regular.

The original suit of Vickers v. Cowell having come on for hearing, on the 18th of July 1839, an objection was taken for want of parties, which was allowed. An order was then made, whereby the cause was ordered to stand over with liberty to the Plaintiff to amend by adding parties. (1 Beavan, 529.)

Instead of amending, a bill of revivor and supplement was filed by an administrator, stating that the Plaintiff Ann Vickers had died on the 15th of August 1838 (nearly a year previous to the hearing), and insisting that as she was dead at the hearing of the cause in July 1839, the order then made was a nullity. It stated also supplemental matter, to shew that the persons who had been held to be necessary parties, were not so, under the circumstances; and it prayed that the suit might be revived and placed in the same plight as at the death of Ann Vickers the Plaintiff, and that the order of July 1839 might be set aside.

[409] The Defendant having appeared, the Plaintiff, after the expiration of eight days (Ord. Can. 46), and on the 5th of April 1843, obtained, as of course, an order to revive the suit, and place it "in the same plight and condition as the same was in at the death of Ann Vickers."

The Defendant now moved to discharge the order.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Beavan, in support of the motion. The 10th Order of December 1833, by which, "If the Defendant shall not within eight days after appearance to a bill of revivor, shew cause by plea, answer, or demurrer filed, the Plaintiff shall be entitled, as of course, upon motion or petition, to the common order to revive," &c., does not apply to a case like the present, where the object of the bill is, not to continue the suit from the point at which it left off, but first to set aside the order of the 18th of July 1839, and then to place the cause in the state in which it was in August 1838, when it is alleged the Plaintiff died. Until the order of 1839 has been set aside, which can only be done at the hearing, the cause cannot be placed in the same plight as it was in 1838.

It appears from Hinde's Practice (page 48), that the common order to revive can only be obtained where the bill is merely for a revivor, and only upon reviving all orders made. It is there stated, "A cause cannot be revived in part, but the whole proceedings, bill, answer, and orders made in the cause must stand revived, for the revivor is but a continuation of the same suit, and it cannot be a continuation of the same, unless it proceeded where the other left off." "In a bill of revivor merely, the Defendant must appear, &c.; and in eight days after [410] appearance, either shew cause against the bill, or submit to answer, and in default the suit may be revived without answer, if none be required, upon motion as a matter of course." The orders of 1833 did not alter the former practice, for having extended the time for answering to eight weeks, and it being desirable not to extend the time for obtaining the common order to revive, the latter part of the 10th Order provided for it, but it does not extend the right of obtaining, ex parte, the common order to revive to cases not within the rules according to the old practice. The 10th Order, therefore, only applies to "a bill of revivor merely."

Costs were improperly occasioned by bringing the cause to a hearing after an abatement. By reviving ex parte the Plaintiff escapes his liability to pay them, for the Court would only have set aside the order in July 1839, upon payment by the Plaintiff of the costs of the other parties.

Mr. Koe and Mr. Shee, contra. The order is perfectly regular, for in all cases where the suit abates, whether the abatement requires merely a bill of revivor, or a bill of revivor and supplement, the suit must be revived by an order to revive, and it is not regular to wait till the hearing, and then to revive the suit by decree. (3 Daniell's Pr. 217.) Unless the Plaintiff had revived, he would have been unable to go on with the supplemental matter. [THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Does not the order to revive leave the equity of the bill open?] Yes; the Defendant may, at the hearing, shew that there is no title to revive. The only way to prevent the order to revive is by plea or demurrer.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. It is not necessary to discuss what is the rule in ordinary cases: here the [411] case is very peculiar and special, and the supplemental part has not been occasioned by the abatement, but is alleged to have taken place since. The objection to this order is, that it is a partial revivor of the suit, it omits a portion of the proceedings which the Plaintiff thinks objectionable, and leaves the last order unrevived, which it treats as a nullity.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The original cause having been brought on, was ordered to stand over with liberty to amend by adding parties; it now appears that nearly a year before the order was made, the Plaintiff had died, so that the bringing on of the cause at that time was an irregularity on the part of be solicitor, who ought to have known whether his client was living or dead, and notice of which fact must be imputed to him.

A bill of revivor and supplement has been filed stating the abatement, which not only insists that the order previously made was a nullity and void, but prays a declaration to that effect, and that the cause may be revived.

The real difficulty is as to the costs of the previous proceedings; but as the plaintiff has stated them all by his bill, the Defendant will have the opportunity of demanding, by his answer, such costs as he may be entitled to.

I cannot say that the order to revive is irregular: it was obtained on matters showing a right to revive, and I think I cannot discharge it. (1)

[412] SIMPSON v. ASHWORTH. April 28, May 1, 1848.

[S. C. 7 Jur. 410.]

The words "lawful heirs," held, upon the context of a will, to mean "heirs of the body."

The testator, having several children, directed the purchase of an estate for one of his daughters, "for her use and her lawful heirs," to be returned "if she died without lawful heirs," to the other children that had heirs. Held, upon the context, that "lawful heirs" must be construed "heirs of the body:" that the daughter took an estate tail, and that the gift over was also an estate tail.

The testator gave his daughter a sum of money, and directed his executors, "as soon as convenient after his decease, to purchase an estate," and when she attained twenty-one, she was to receive the money if the land was not bought. There was a gift over. The estate was not purchased, and she invested the money in the funds. Held, on the daughter's death, that the money was impressed with the character of realty, and passed as such.

The testator, having a son and four daughters, devised one real estate to his son "and his lawful heirs or assigns for ever," subject to the payment of £10,450 to the testator's daughters.

He then devised a second freehold estate to his eldest daughter "and her lawful heirs," and £1500; and he devised, similarly, to two other daughters "and their lawful heirs," two other freeholds, together with a sum of money. As to these daughters he declared as follows:—"It is my will and mind, that the lands which I have bequeathed as above to my daughters Ellen, Isabel and Agnes, in case all or any of them die without lawful heirs, the same to return to my other children that have lawful heirs, share and share alike."

He then proceeded to provide for his youngest daughter in the words following:—"I give and bequeath unto my daughter Catherine, the sum of £4000, out of my personal estate, and I here direct my executors to pay her the interest of £2000 till she attains the age of twenty-one years. I likewise direct my executors, or the survivor of them, as soon as convenient after my decease, to purchase an estate not to exceed £2000 for her use and her lawful heirs, and come into possession, with the accumulations arising, at the age of [413] twenty-one years. This £4000 to be paid out of my personality at the end of twelve months." In a subsequent part of the will, he proceeded as follows:—"It is my will and mind, that when my daughter Catherine attains the age of twenty-one to receive her £4000, if the land above mentioned is not bought, to give security for £2000, to be returned if she dies without lawful heirs, to my son and daughters that have heirs, share and share alike, and provided the land be purchased, to be returned in the same manner." The testator bequeathed his residuary personal estate to his son.

No estate was purchased for Catherine and her lawful heirs as directed by the will. She attained twenty-one in 1785, and received the £4000, but gave no security for returning the £2000 in the event provided for, and this £2000 she afterwards invested in the purchase of £3216 3 per cents.

Catherine married in 1807, previously to which a settlement was executed by her and her intended husband, which recited the purchase of the stock with the £2000 subject to be returned. The stock was settled on her for her separate use for life and subject thereto, upon the trusts declared by the testator's will. The testator's son was a trustee under this settlement. He survived his co-trustees, and died in 1837, having appointed the Plaintiffs his executors, who thus became possessed of the stock upon the trusts of the settlement.

Catherine died a widow, in 1841, without having had any issue.

The bill was then filed by the executors of the son, praying the direction of the Court in the distribution of the fund.

[414] Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Little, for the Plaintiffs, stated that the questions were, first, whether the £3216 stock was to be considered realty or personalty.

Secondly, what estate or interest Catherine took.

And, thirdly, as to the validity and extent of the gift over.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Lewin, for the heirs of two children, argued that the stock must be considered as impressed with the character of realty; Johnson v. Arundel (1 Ves. sen. 169), Earlom v. Saunders (Ambler, 241), Cowley v. Horstonge (1 Dougl. 361; and see Cookson v. Reay, 5 Beavan, 22), and Hereford v. Ravenhill (5 Beavan, 51).

Secondly, that as the brothers and sisters would be the heirs general of Catherine in the event of her having no issue, the words "lawful heirs," in the gift over to them, must necessarily mean heirs of the body of Catherine, and that she therefore took an estate tail. (See 2 Jarman on Wills, 238, and the cases there cited.)

Thirdly, that the gift over to the brothers and sisters was valid, and gave to them either the fee or an estate tail; Bailis v. Gale (2 Ves. sen. 48).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Haddan contended that there had been no conversion of the fund into realty, and that the gift over was valid. They cited Nicholls v. Skinner (Pr. Ch. 528; 2 Roper on Legacies, 470), Hughes v. Sayer (1 P. Wms. 531; 1 Jarman on Wills, 526).

[415] Mr. Koe and Mr. Renshaw, for the real and personal representatives of Catherine, claimed the whole of the fund, contending that it was personal estate, the estate being only purchasable while she was under twenty-one, and if not done, the money itself was to be "received" by her. They contended that the gift over, being on a general failure of "lawful heirs," was void; Campbell v. Harding (2 Russ. Mylne, 390; and 8 Bli. 469); and that, therefore, Catherine was absolutely entitled. They argued further that, in any event, the stock was only a security for the return of £2000 sterling; and that the surplus value at least belonged to Catherine's estate.

Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. Milne, for the only surviving child, contended that the fund was impressed with the character of real estate; that Catherine took an estate tail, and that the gift over was valid; that the settlement had identified the stock as the produce of the money, and had declared the trust of the whole of it accordingly; that, by reason of Catherine's neglect originally to give security for the return of the £2000, there would have been an equity to treat the investment made for the general benefit of the parties entitled under the will, even supposing the settlement had not declared the trust upon that footing.

Mr. Little, in reply, contended, that the conversion into realty was only co-extensive with the gifts to Catherine and to the son and daughters; which gifts, in devises of lands, would make Catherine tenant in tail, with remainders to the son and daughters for life; that the words, "that have" heirs, vested nothing in the heirs or in the ancestors, but only limited the class of son and daughters who were to take. That the surplus [416] interest, after satisfying the above gifts, retained its original character of personalty, and not being otherwise disposed of, passed to the residuary legatee; and that the Plaintiffs, as his executors, were therefore beneficially entitled, subject to the life-estate of the surviving child in her share of the fund. 1 Jar. on Wills, p. 553, and the cases there cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The construction of this will is certainly very doubtful; but according to the best opinion that I can form, I think that this sum was intended to be converted into real estate, and that there is nothing to shew that it was, on any subsequent event, to be reconverted.

It was intended to pass as real estate; and though the testator had provided for the case of his younger daughter attaining twenty-one, in which event it was to be given to her on certain terms, yet it was intended on a contingency to come back; and I think that there is nothing to shew it was not to come back in the character of real estate.

The first question is, what estate is given; and the second what is the effect of the limitation over. The expression "lawful heirs," by itself would mean heirs general; but it is to be observed that he had used the same words in the previous bequest of all the real estates given to the other children in every one of the gifts over. In the construction of these words I am therefore bound to conclude that he did not mean heirs general, but heirs of the body; the consequence of which is, that he has limited the effect of the words "lawful heirs," and makes it heirs of the body: the result is to give an estate tail to the daughter.

[417] As to the gift over, I think I must collect he meant the same quantity of estate to go over which he had given in the first instance.

I think also that the gift over is not too remote.

The result is that the first gift is an estate tail, the gift over is valid, and that the gift over is of the same estate previously given; viz., an estate tail.

The plan of the will is the only thing which is clear. He gave the largest real estate to the son, charged with a sum which he contemplated giving to the daughters. He gave to three of his daughters respectively a real estate and a sum of money, and having (as it has been truly said) exhausted his real estate, and having no other real estate to give to his youngest daughter, he gave a sum of money with a direction to invest part in real estate.

All parties ought to have their costs out of the fund.

[418] PERRY v. TRUMFITT. July 5, 1844.

Motion being made for an injunction, it stood over with liberty to the Plaintiff to bring an action to establish his right. The Plaintiff neglecting to proceed therein, the motion was refused with costs.

On the 8th of December 1843 the Plaintiff moved for an injunction. (6 Beav. 66.) The motion was ordered to stand over with liberty to the Plaintiff to bring an action, and either party was to be at liberty to apply.

The Plaintiff not having commenced any such action, the Defendant now moved, that the motion might be refused with costs.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. James Parker, for the Defendant.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Trotter, for the Plaintiff.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], having stated that the Defendant was entitled to have the motion refused with costs, the suit was also at the same time, by arrangement between the parties, dismissed with costs.

[419] CHAMBEAU v. RILEY. July 13, 1843.

Depositions under a commission having been suppressed with costs, the payment of those costs was made a condition for granting a new commission.

A commission had been issued for the examination of witnesses on the part of the Plaintiff in France, in support of the state of facts of the Plaintiff upon an enquiry before the Master.

The depositions were afterwards suppressed for irregularity, with costs to be paid by the Plaintiff, and which, on taxation, were found to amount to £197.

Mr. Lloyd now moved, on the Master's certificate, for a new commission.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Kindersley resisted the application, on the ground that the former costs had not yet been paid.

Mr. Lloyd. The Defendant has taken proceedings in France against the Plaintiff, whereby his property has been attached. Either the Defendant has been paid there-with, or the Plaintiff is prevented, by that attachment, from complying with this order and making payment. The Defendant has taken some proceedings since the order; he is not therefore entitled to prevent the Plaintiff's further prosecuting his suit until the costs have been paid. Onge v. Truelock (2 Molloy, 41), was cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. Take the order upon payment of the former costs, but let the Plaintiff have liberty to shew that the amount has been paid, or that the Defendant's proceedings in France have prevented his making payment.

[420] STANLEY v. BOND. July 19, 1843.

[S. C. 6 Beav. 423.]

Where the bill is amended before answer, it is not necessary to serve a subpoena to answer the amendments.

Where a bill is amended before answer, the Defendant is not entitled to eight weeks from the amendment to answer it.

The original bill was filed on the 24th of October 1842, and on the 24th of March 1843, and before the Defendant had answered, an order to amend was obtained. The bill was accordingly amended, but no new subpoena was served.

On the 9th of May an attachment was issued for want of answer. More than eight weeks had then elapsed since the service of the subpoena, but less than eight weeks from the amendment.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Toller, moved to discharge the attachment. They argued that it was irregular, first, because no subpoena to answer the amended bill had been served; and, by the original subpoena, the Defendant was required to appear in eight days, and "answer concerning such things as should be then and there alleged against" him (Ord. Can. 60), and, therefore, this command could not extend to matters afterwards alleged by amendment.

Secondly, that where a Defendant had not answered, and the bill was amended he was entitled to the same time to answer the amended bill as he had to answer the original bill, namely, eight and not five weeks, otherwise a Plaintiff might introduce a few trivial amendments to his bill the day after it was filed, and thus reduce the Defendant's time for answering from eight weeks to five. That, therefore, for this purpose, a [421] bill amended before answer should, under the 10th Order of December 1833 (Ord. Can. 46), be regarded as an original bill, filed at the time of the filing the amendments; Spencer v. Bryant (9 Ves. 231). That, as forty-five days only had elapsed from the amendment, the Plaintiff was premature in issuing the attachment on the 9th of May, and that it ought therefore to be discharged.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, contrâ, was not heard by

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, who said, I have no doubt of the regularity of the attachment, and I must refuse this motion with costs. If the Defendant had been entitled to any indulgence, he should have made an application for it; the Court would be disposed to grant it, if he could make out a proper case.

The cause being set down, in order that the bill might be taken pro confesso under the orders of the 11th of April 1842 (Ord. Can. p. 195),

Mr. Pemberton Leigh proposed to take such decree as he could abide by; but

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] said, you must take such decree as you are entitled to upon the record: you must state your case. (NOTE.—See Evans v. Williams, 6 Beav. p. 118, and Hayes v. Buerley, 3 Dr. & War. 274.)

[422] GIBSON v. NICOL. July 20, 1843.

A motion for an injunction and receiver being brought on, stood over at the request of the Defendant, who filed his answer the next day. Held, that the Plaintiff might use affidavits subsequently filed, in contradiction to the answer, and which, under these circumstances, must be treated as an affidavit.

A notice of motion having been given for a receiver and an injunction, and affidavits having been filed in support, the motion, at the request of the Defendant, was directed to stand over, to enable him to put in his answer, which he did the next day.

Subsequent affidavits were filed by the Plaintiff, in respect of title, and in contradiction of the answer, and a question was raised whether they could be received.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Wood, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Calvert, contra.

Mr. James Parker and Mr. Rolt, for other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], under these circumstances, thought that the answer was to be treated as an affidavit.(1)

[423] STANLEY v. BOND. July 28, 1843.

A bill for the delivery up of securities on which the Defendant had commenced proceedings at law, was taken pro confesso. Held, that the Plaintiff was entitled to the costs at law, though the bill did not specifically pray for them.

The bill was filed for the delivery up of securities alleged to have been improperly retained by the Defendant from the Plaintiff, and on which he had commenced proceedings at law.

The bill having been taken pro confesso (see 6 Beav. 420) against the Defendant, Mr. Pemberton Leigh asked that the Defendant might be ordered by the decree to pay the costs of the proceedings at law: he submitted that though the bill did not pray for them, yet that the Plaintiff was entitled thereto under the prayer for general relief.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. You are to have such decree as is just; and I think it is just that you should have the costs of the proceedings at law.

[424] FUTTER v. JACKSON. Feb. 11, 1843.

A trustee admitted he had sold out trust stock, but he stated that he had invested the produce in other securities. A motion was made before decree, that he might repurchase the stock and transfer it into Court. Held, that the Court could make no such order.

The bill was filed by parties interested in the estate of the testator, who died in 1838. It alleged that the debts and legacies had been paid; that the residue had been invested in the sums of £2606, 11s. 9d. 3½ per cents. and £478, 8s. 9d. consols; and that the Defendant, the trustee and executor, had, in 1841, in breach of trust, sold out these funds and applied the produce to his own use. The bill sought to charge the Defendant with these sums.

The Defendant, by his answer, stated his belief that the debts and legacies had been paid; and that, at the latter end of May 1841, in consequence of the high value of the public funds, and in the hope of increasing the trust estate, he did sell out the sums of £2606, 11s. 9d. 3½ per cent. and £478, 8s. 9d. consols, "and temporarily invested the produce thereof in other securities." The Defendant gave no further explanation of the manner in which the produce of the sales had been applied or invested.

(1) See Maden v. Veavers, 5 Beav. 512; Norway v. Rowe, 19 Ves. 143; Morphett v. Jones, ib. 350; Shirreff v. Barnard, 8 Sim. 161; Smith v. Cleasby, 10 Sim. 93; Wright v. Tickell, Jac. 154; Clapham v. White, 8 Ves. 35; Lloyd v. Jenkins, Beav. 230.

A motion was now made that the Defendant might repurchase and transfer into Court these two sums.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Parsons, for the motion, contended, that, as the Defendant had admitted the possession of the trust funds and had sold them out, and as he had not accounted for the produce, or shewn that it had been properly invested and secured, he was clearly liable to replace it, and that it ought at once to be brought into Court.

[425] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Elderton, contra, contended that there was no such admission of the possession of the fund as to entitle the Plaintiff to this order on motion before the hearing. That, as the answer stated that the fund had been reinvested, the Court must assume that the fund was now upon a proper investment, and that to make such an order as that asked on an interlocutory application was contrary to the practice of the Court.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I am asked, on motion, to order the Defendant to purchase stock, and then transfer it into Court. I am of opinion that this Court cannot make any such order.

I cannot give credit to the statement that the funds have been properly invested. Though the Defendant has not been asked by the bill, still he would do well to explain the matter. (NOTE.—See Meyer v. Montrieux, 4 Beavan, 343, and the cases there cited.)

[426] HARRIES v. LLOYD. Feb. 24, 25, 1843.

A. being entitled to three debts, covenanted with B., that in case he received them in full, he would pay him £1000, but in case he should receive part only, he would pay one-sixth of the sum recovered. A. received one of the debts, which he wholly retained. Afterwards, and within three months before A.'s imprisonment and taking the benefit of the Insolvent Act, he (without pressure) assigned one of the debts to B., to secure one-sixth of the debt recovered and those still unpaid. It set aside as fraudulent under the Act. Held, also, that B. had not, as against the insolvent's assignees, any lien on the remaining debts, for the one-third of the first debt improperly retained by A.

This bill was filed by the assignee of an insolvent debtor, to set aside a deed alleged to have been voluntarily executed by him, within three months before the commencement of his imprisonment.

By the Insolvent Debtors Act (7 G. 4, c. 57, s. 32, re-enacted by the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 59) it is enacted, "That if any such prisoner shall, before or after his or her imprisonment, being in insolvent circumstances, voluntarily convey, assign, transfer, charge, deliver, or make over any estate, real or personal, &c., to or in trust for any creditor, every such conveyance, &c., shall be deemed fraudulent and void as against the assignees. Provided always, that no such conveyance, &c., shall be so deemed fraudulent and void, unless made within three months before the commencement of such imprisonment, or with the view or intention, by the party so transferring, &c., of petitioning the said Court for his or her discharge from custody under this Act."

The circumstances under which the assignment took place were as follows:—In 1835 David Williams was entitled to three debts, one of £3900 due from Sackville Gwynne, another of £2000 due from W. Rice, and the third of £1060 due from Sackville Gwynne and Elizabeth Lewis.

On the 2d of June 1835 David Williams, upon the marriage of his daughter with William Jones, executed [427] a settlement, by which he covenanted with David Lloyd and Stephen Jones that in case the said several sums of £3900, £2000, and £1060 should be recovered in full, and not otherwise, he would, within six months next after such recovery, pay to Lloyd and Jones the sum of £1000; but in case he should not be the sums in full, then he would, at the time and in manner to Lloyd and Jones one-sixth part of and in such part he should be able to recover; the amount was to be held upon the trusts of a marriage settlement.

The Plaintiff commenced an action at law against David Williams, and obtained a verdict for £2750, subject to a reference. The reference was made on the 16th of December 1837, the amount due from David Williams being £2750, and by the arbitrator; he made his award in January following, for £2750 to the Plaintiff. For this sum David Williams was arrested in January 1838, and he thereupon took the benefit of the Insolvent Act. He was, however, and on the 19th of December 1837, David Williams was the debtor of Sackville Gwynne and Elizabeth Lewis for £1060 to David Williams, upon trust to retain £333, 6s. 8d. (being one-sixth of Rice's debt which had been received by David Williams previous to November 1837, and wholly retained by him), and such further sums as should be paid out of the sums received on the other debts of £1060 and £3900. Having been executed within three months before the commencement of the action, this bill was filed to set it aside, on the ground of its being void.

The debt of £3900 was considered desperate, and had been sold for £200.

The defence alleged for the defence was this: That William Jones, on or about the 1st of November 1837 had discovered that David Williams had received the sum of £2000, one of the sums comprised in the marriage settlement, and one-sixth part ought to have been paid and invested upon the trusts of that settlement, and thereupon applied to David Williams, and requested him to pay over the sixth part of such sum to the trustees of the settlement, and pressed him further to secure the payment, in like manner, of the sixth part of such further sums as should be paid out of the other sums of £3900 and £1060. That David Williams, having received the whole of the sum of £2000 to his own purposes, and being then unable to pay such sixth part, did, upon the application and instance of the Defendant William Jones, and not voluntarily or fraudulently, agree to secure the due payment of such sixth part thereof, and also of the other sums which might thereafter be due, by an actual assignment to the trustees of the settlement of the debt of £2000, and the security for the same, upon express trusts for that purpose; and accordingly, and some time in the month of November 1837, instructions were given to William Jones to Messrs. Jones & Bishop, as the solicitors of William Jones, to execute such assignment.

The only proof of the insolvency was the schedule in the Insolvent Court, which was being objected to by the Defendants, was received de bene esse.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Freeling, for the Plaintiff, contended, that the debt had been executed without pressure, within three months of the imprisonment, and was therefore void. Stuckey v. Drewe (2 M. & K. 190), Herbert v. Wilcox (6 M. & W. 103), Binns v. Towsey (7 Ad. & E. 869), Davies v. Acocks (2 C. M. & R. 461), Smith (2 M. & W. 191); and see Margareson v. Saxton (1 Y. & C. (Ex.) 525). It was unnecessary to shew that the debts of the insolvent exceeded the value of the property at the time; De Tastet v. Le Tavernier (1 Keen, 161); that if there existed any doubt an inquiry should be directed; Townsend v. Westcott (2 Beavan, 340); and that the trustees of the settlement had no lien on the debts for the sixth of the sum; Watson v. The Duke of Wellington (1 Russ. & M. 602).

Kindersley and Mr. James, contrâ. To avoid an assignment under this Act, it must be proved to have been made spontaneously, and without any pressure; Bean (8 Bing. 87, and 1 Moor. & Scott, 151). Here there was no spontaneous assignment by the part of the insolvent; he did no more than he was liable to do, and what he had been compelled to do, if a suit had been instituted against him for that debt.

He had received £2000, one-sixth of which ought to have been paid to the trustees, and under the settlement, the trustees had a lien on the other debts for payment of the sums agreed by the settlor to be paid. There was no fraud in perfecting the assignment, and such an act is not sufficient to avoid the transaction. Mogg v. Mogg (1 M. & W. 195).

There is no proof of insolvency; the schedule is not evidence as against the parties claiming under the as-[430]-signment. A settlor himself might, in the Insolvent Court, have made statements purposely to avoid the deed.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Some time previous to November 1837, but what is not stated, David Williams received the £2000 due from Mr. Rice; he committed a breach of covenant by not paying over £333, 6s. 8d., or one-sixth part to the trustees of the settlement. It is said, that about this time and before the completion of the reference to arbitration, application was made by the parties claiming under the settlement for some security for this £333, 6s. 8d., and that the deed of the 19th of December 1837 was in consequence executed.

That the deed of the 19th of December 1837 was executed within three months before the commencement of the imprisonment, is not disputed; but two points are raised, first, that it was not voluntary; and, secondly, that David Williams is not proved to have been in insolvent circumstances at the time.

As to the first question, it is said that it was not voluntary, because David Williams gave to the parties claiming under the settlement no more than what they were entitled to before; that he, being bound by covenant to pay to the trustees one-sixth of the monies recovered, did, in order to repair the breach of trust, assign the £1060 to the trustees, who were to retain thereout £333, 6s. 8d. (being one-sixth of the £2000), and then to retain one-sixth of the other sums. Was this any more than what the trustees were entitled to? It would have been an absurdity to have executed this deed, if the parties were entitled to what it gave independent of the deed. I am of opinion, that it was in-[431]-tended to give a benefit to the parties claiming under the settlement which they had not before, and that it was the intention to put themselves in a better position than the other creditors, and to obtain for themselves an additional benefit. I think the deed was voluntary, and that it was not the less voluntary, because the parties called on the insolvent for the additional security; being voluntary it is void, provided the party was at the time in insolvent circumstances.

The next question then is, whether the insolvency is proved, and I think that it is not sufficiently shewn to me that David Williams was insolvent at the time. His schedule alone is produced, but this does not enable me to adjudicate on the point without an inquiry.

Mr. Kindersley admitted the insolvency.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Then the assignment must be declared void against the Plaintiff.

Feb. 25. The Defendants having claimed to have a lien on the £1060, for the £333, 6s. 8d. (being one-sixth of the £2000 received by David Williams), the case came on to be argued as to that remaining point.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Freeling contended that there was no lien on the debt for the monies received in respect of another. That there had been a breach of covenant, in respect of which the Defendants must come in as creditors under the insolvency.

Mr. Kindersley, contra, contended, that assuming the three debts could not be received in full, the trustees [432] of the settlement were entitled to one-sixth of what was received, and had a lien on the whole for that amount.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question is, what was the intention of the parties; it seems to have been this: if all three debts were received £1000 was to be paid to the trustees of the settlement, but if part only was received then one-sixth of the sum actually received was alone to be paid to them. What happened? one sum of £2000 was received by David Williams, and was applied by him to his own use, and no part was paid over to the trustees of the settlement; thereby committed both a breach of trust and a breach of covenant.

I do not mean to say that, in this state of things, and to prevent the further breach of trust, the persons claiming under the settlement might not have filed the bill, and, by means of the equitable jurisdiction of this Court, have prevented David Williams from receiving any further part of the debts, and by getting the funds into Court, they might not have worked out their equity; but before any relief had been granted, or any order had attached on the funds, David Williams became insolvent, and ceased to have any control over the property. It became vested in other persons for the benefit of his creditors, so that any right established by this Court on the funds, would be to the prejudice of those creditors.

I do not think that the trustees of the settlement are entitled to have the £1060 applied in satisfaction of the £333, 6s. 8d. They will however be entitled to one-sixth of the £1060 when received.

[433] MILLAR v. CRAIG. March 7, 9, 27, 28, April 3, 4, 1843.

[A note in the Addenda to 10 Beav., states that the Defendants appealed, but, before judgment, the cause abated, and was afterwards compromised by the payment of a large sum. See Alfrey v. Alfrey, 1849, 1 Mac. & G. 94; 41 E. R. 1198 (with note).]

An account was settled, and releases executed between the residuary legatees of a partner and the representatives of the surviving partner. Numerous and important errors in the account having been proved, the release was set aside, but having regard to the lapse of time, and the loss of books and documents, the Court declined opening the accounts altogether, but gave liberty only to surcharge and falsify.

A stipulation that interest should be allowed on the capital of partners presumed under the circumstances.

In a partnership between A. and B. interest was allowed on the capitals. C., who was a clerk and relative, was cognizant of the terms on which this partnership was carried on. B. retired, and A. and C. continued the business: the whole capital embarked therein belonged to A. There was an absence of all proof of any agreement between A. and C. in respect of interest on capital. D. and E. were afterwards admitted into the business, and an interest account of capital was then resumed. Held, under these circumstances, and from the knowledge that C. had of the terms on which the first partnership had been carried on, that it must be assumed that interest on capital was to be allowed in the second partnership.

Partnership accounts having been directed to be taken by the Master, in a case in which some of the books had been lost, the Court directed the Master, if it should appear in taking the account that any necessary books, &c., should be wanting, to report the same specially; and whether, in consequence of the want of such books, he was unable to proceed satisfactorily in taking the accounts.

Where a release has been executed, and the parties have for a long space of time acquiesced in it, the mere proof of errors will not, in the absence of fraud, induce the Court either to set it aside or to give leave to surcharge and falsify; but the nature and amount of the errors alleged and proved, may have a very considerable effect in the consideration of the question, whether the release was fairly obtained.

The object of this bill was to set aside a release executed by the Plaintiffs in 1823, and to have the accounts of the estate of the testator James Craig (which at his death was wholly embarked in a partnership business), taken, as if no such release had been executed, or for liberty to surcharge and falsify such account.

The testator James Craig carried on a very extensive business as a merchant, in partnership with Joseph Corrie, down to the month of March 1804, when the latter retired from the concern.

James Craig afterwards took his nephew into partnership. The period at which this partnership com-[434]-menced was a matter of controversy between the parties to this cause, the Plaintiffs alleging it to have been about the year 1810, and the principal Defendant, on the other hand, contending that it commenced in 1804, when Corrie retired.

The business was however carried on by James and John, but with the capital of James, until 1814; Charles Nicholls and William Lewis were then taken into the partnership, and that partnership continued down to the death of the testator James Craig, which happened in January 1818.

The testator, by his will, bequeathed his residuary estate to John Craig, but if he should die without issue living at the time of his death (which happened), then he bequeathed the residue principally to the Plaintiffs, and he appointed Ann Craig, the said John Craig, William Millar and the said Charles Nicholls, his executors, who proved his will. The business was continued after his death by the surviving partners.

In 1821 an account of the testator's estate was made out by an accountant, while William Millar the executor was pressed by the three other executors to sign, he having declined doing so, another account was thereupon made out and passed at the Legacy Duty Office by the three other executors.

John Craig the nephew died in January 1823, having appointed the Defendant James Craig his executor and residuary legatee. After the death of John Craig, the representatives of James, proposed to the residuary legatees, who resided in Scotland, to divide the residue on the basis of the account passed at the Legacy Duty Office, which shewed that the testator's estate consisted [435] of £38,266, and that the residue, after deducting certain charges, amounted to £22,251. This being agreed to, the amount was divided between the residuary legatees, and they, in July 1823, executed a release to the executors of all claims, &c. It did not appear that any explanations were then given of the accounts, or that they were vouched.

The Plaintiffs, as they alleged, subsequently discovered numerous and important errors and omissions in the account, and they filed this bill in 1831, specifying the errors, and praying that the release might be set aside, and that the accounts might be properly taken, or that they might be at liberty to surcharge and falsify the account. It appeared that many of the partnership books and papers were not forthcoming.

It is unnecessary, for the purpose of this report, to state the specific errors complained of, except one, which related to a claim made on behalf of the residuary legatees, to have interest on James Craig's capital in the concern paid out of the partnership assets. The circumstances relating to which are as follows:—Upon John Craig being taken into partnership, the whole of the large capital employed in the business was the property of the testator, his uncle; and it was not pretended that John Craig had any other property to bring into the partnership except the arrears of his previous salary as clerk to his uncle. No deed of partnership appeared ever to have been executed; no stipulation as to any allowance of interest on the capital was proved; besides which, no account seemed to have been made out or settled during the partnership between the testator and his nephew, from which the terms on which they carried on their trade could be collected.

[436] It appeared, that in the previous partnership of Craig & Corrie, interest had been allowed in the accounts on each partner's capital, and an interest account kept; and though nothing in this respect appeared in the partnership between the testator and his nephew, yet interest was again allowed after Nicholls and Lewis had been admitted partners in the concern, but there was no allotment of the interest, between James and John Craig. It appeared also, that in the first account prepared for passing at the Legacy Duty Office, an item of £8161 was inserted for interest on the testator's capital, which was subsequently struck out, the opinion of counsel being unfavourable to the claim. The Plaintiffs now claimed to have interest allowed on the amount of the testator's capital in the partnership concern.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Turner, and Mr. Rolt, for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Dixon, for the principal Defendant.

Mr. Romilly, Mr. Cankrien, Mr. Wright, and Mr. Toller, for other parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case, the bill is filed for the purpose of setting aside a release executed on the 5th of July 1823, on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, and that the accounts in respect of which it was executed, contain very numerous and important errors. Very numerous and important errors have been proved in this case. I cannot help saying that I do not recollect any case, in which errors of such an amount and number have met with faint an answer as has been given in this case. [437] Errors have been distinctly proved, but it is not necessary that I should observe on them, for unless the release is to cover all the errors detected in the accounts, the accounts, in some way or other, must be reconsidered.

I quite agree with the argument that has been used, that where a release has been executed, and the parties, have, for a long lapse of time, acquiesced in it, the mere proof of errors will not, in the absence of fraud, induce the Court either to set it aside, or to give leave to surcharge and falsify, but the principle must be taken with this qualification, that the nature and amount of the errors alleged and proved, may have a very considerable effect in the consideration of the question whether the release was fairly obtained.

Beyond all doubt, the Plaintiffs, who were in Scotland, never had an opportunity of examining those accounts. I do not find any proof whatever that the Plaintiffs relied on William Millar as their agent in the treaty with the other executors; on the contrary, I find that they employed their own solicitor or law agent in Scotland: I do not even find that William Millar assumed to act for them; and he himself, it must be observed, was an executor and an accounting party.

Looking at all that has taken place between these parties, what reason is there to think that the Plaintiffs had any means whatever of examining the accounts, or that they signed the release, except upon the mere confidence that these accounts had been truly and properly stated? This would entirely preclude the argument that these parties must be considered as having settled each and every disputed item, for the purpose of coming to an arrangement, agreement, or compromise. This release was signed in confidence: it was signed in the [438] belief that these accounts had been truly stated, a confidence, in some degree no doubt, reposed in William Millar, but a confidence which, if reposed in William Millar, was certainly reposed without any just or proper foundation. Seeing that the release was obtained under such circumstances, in respect of accounts containing errors so great as have been proved, I cannot think that it is consistent with justice to say, that, because a considerable length of time has elapsed, before these parties, resident in a remote part of the United Kingdom, discovered the errors, the account is for that reason to stand.

I confess, therefore, that I have felt no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the Plaintiffs must be at liberty, at the least, to surcharge and falsify the accounts. Whether they ought to be at liberty to open them altogether, is a matter of difficulty, and I must take time to consider it. I conceive it may not altogether depend upon the question of fraud or no fraud, because, having regard to the lapse of time, all parties are entitled to be treated with some consideration. Though the lapse of time will not protect them from having the account examined, still it may protect them from the necessity of proving every item contained in the account. The difficulties of taking the account, together with the loss of some of the books, which might, by possibility, contain entries which would explain the errors, might render it very fit that the Plaintiffs should merely have liberty to surcharge and falsify the account, and also that the Master should have power to state special circumstances, with the particular view of stating whether any of those books containing entries which might possibly tend to clear up those errors, have been lost.

[439] The next point is as to when the partnership between James and John Craig commenced. The evidence is such that I am afraid it does not enable me satisfactorily to dispose of it. I will however consider it, and, if I cannot satisfy myself, I must direct an inquiry.

The question of interest rests in a strange state of ambiguity; but the question is, what is to be collected from the situation in which these parties were? In the business carried on by Corrie and James Craig, it is admitted that the parties were credited with interest on the amount of their respective capitals; therefore, according to the usage of the persons then engaged in this business, an interest account was kept. In that early period of the business, it is not left to what the legal presumption or conclusion might be, in a case where persons carry on a partnership without any agreement, and without any account being kept or made out from which an agreement might be implied, for at this period, each of the persons carrying on that business was credited with interest on the amount of his capital. This continued until March 1804.

It does not appear when John was admitted a partner, but the whole capital which the partnership business was carried on after 1804, whether it was a partnership with John or not, was the property of James, and all that John had, was the amount of certain arrears of wages that had become due to him in the service of Corrie Craig, and which was quite a trifle in comparison with what his uncle had embarked. Supposing John to have become a partner in the year 1804, the business was carried on for about ten years, without any account being stated between them. In this singular state of things, whatever property James had, whether it was properly plainly and avowedly in the business or exclusive of the business, all his income, and everything that he had, seems to have been brought [440] into the concern. If John Craig's notion was, that his uncle really intended that he James Craig should have had no property or income of any kind, in which he, his nephew John, was not to participate to the extent of one-half, I confess it appears to me to have been a very singular notion to have entertained, in the absence of any legal proof, memorandum or document of any kind from which such an intention could be collected. We are unfortunately left for ten years without the least light thrown on the subject, except that all the income which James was entitled to was brought into the concern, and is alleged by John to have been brought into the concern, for the purpose of being consolidated with that capital, to a moiety of the profits of which he considered himself to be entitled.

After the 1st of January 1814, when Nicholls and Lewis were admitted into the partnership, we again find that there is a computation of interest commenced. The capital, treated as the capital of James and John, was credited with interest against Nicholls and Lewis, and it so went on until the death of James Craig. That was the usage of Corrie and James Craig before John could have had anything to do with it, became again the usage of James and John Craig, the instant they admitted any other person into the concern. But we are again under the same ambiguity as to John and James, because even then there was no account stated, as between John and John, in respect of any interest whatever. Now supposing it to be the case (which I do not think is quite so clear), that, when you find partners equally laborious and equally attentive to the business, as I think is proved they were in this case, you allow no interest on any excess of capital, and that therefore you do not put the parties on equal terms in that respect, still you would clearly give to the party who has contributed the capital, from the circumstances, or from the usage between the parties, that there ought to be, or was intended to be, such a computation of interest. Can one believe that the party to whom the whole capital belonged renounced all advantage in that respect, and continuing to take an equally laborious part in the transaction of the business, should bring in his whole income, both partnership and private, and yet intend to reserve no advantage of that income upon the settlement of accounts between himself and co-partner? I must say, I have great difficulty coming to such a conclusion as that. My present opinion is, that interest ought to be charged. I will look a little further to see whether there are any authorities to the contrary: and I will reserve that point.

With regard to the length of time that has elapsed, I feel considerable apprehension in opening these accounts altogether, from the possible loss of documents during that time, and particularly, in consequence of John Craig being represented by Defendant James Craig, and of a great number of the partnership documents having got into the possession of Mr. Nicholls independent of James Craig. I confess, unless bound, I should be reluctant to do it.

April 3. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. On the best consideration I can give to this case, I think that John Craig must have known all the arrangements which took place in the business of Corrie & Craig, and the principles on which it was carried on, and the mode of computing interest on the capitals of the partners. My opinion, therefore, is, that interest ought to be computed on James Craig's capital. On the other point, I think that the justice of the case will be sufficiently answered by giving the Plaintiffs liberty to sur-[442]-charge and falsify the account. The case may be in the paper to-morrow.

April 4. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. On consideration of this case, I retain the opinion I before expressed, that interest ought to be charged on the capital of the partners engaged in this concern. I think, that the circumstance of John Craig being perfectly aware of the nature of the accounts kept as between James Craig and Corrie, and the fact that there was no agreement entered into and no act done, in any way to shew that the business between James Craig and John Craig was to be carried on on any other footing than it had been previously carried on between James Craig and Corrie, make it almost a necessary inference that an allowance of interest upon the capital must have been intended.

As to the relief which ought to be afforded, it appears to me, that under the circumstances of this case, justice will be sufficiently answered by giving the Plaintiffs leave to surcharge and falsify the accounts. Under all the circumstances, some considerable risk of undue loss to the legal personal representative of John Craig might be incurred, if the accounts were altogether opened.

The decree I propose to make is this:—Declare that the indenture of release of the 15th of July 1823 shall stand only as a discharge for the several sums of money hereby stated to be retained by, or paid to, the several parties thereto as therein mentioned. Declare that the account in the indenture mentioned to be stated shall stand, with liberty to the Plaintiffs and the Defendant, the legal personal representative of John Craig, to surcharge and falsify the same. Direct the Master to [443]—certain and state, what, at the date of the indenture, was the just amount and value of the residuary estate of James Craig deceased. Direct an inquiry at that time John Craig deceased was admitted to be, and became, a partner with James Craig, in the business in the pleadings mentioned. Direct that, so far as it may be necessary for the purpose stated, the Master is to take an account of the dealings and transactions of the partnership subsisting between John Craig deceased and James Craig deceased, from the commencement thereof to the time when Charles Nicholls and William Lewis were admitted partners in the said business, and also of the dealings and transactions of the partnership subsisting at the decease of James Craig, and at the decease of John Craig, between Charles Nicholls and William Lewis, from the commencement thereof up to the time of the death of James Craig. Let the Master ascertain and state what was due to James Craig deceased, from the said partnership firms, or either of them, at the time of his death; and, in taking those accounts, interest is to be allowed to each partner for the amount of his capital, from the time, employed in the concern. Let the Master also, so far as it may be necessary for the purpose aforesaid, take an account of the personal estate and effects of James Craig deceased, possessed by John Craig deceased, William Millar and Charles Nicholls, or any or either of them, the Plaintiffs waiving all relief against John Craig, the estate of John Craig deceased, and William Millar and Charles Nicholls, in respect of any acts and receipts of Ann Craig on account of the estate of James Craig. Let the parties produce before the Master all books, documents, &c., in the usual way, and if, in the proceeding to surcharge and falsify the accounts mentioned in the indenture of release, or, in taking any of the accounts hereby directed, it shall appear, that any books, documents, or writings necessary [444] or useful as evidence in respect of the matters aforesaid, or any of them, are wanting, let the Master report the same specially (see Turner v. Corney, 5 Beavan, 515), and also state, whether, in consequence of the want of any such books or documents, he is unable to proceed satisfactorily in taking the accounts, or in making the enquiries hereby directed.

Reserve all the costs.

[444] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. RICKARDS. April 26, 27, 28, 1843.

12 L. J. Ch. 393; 7 Jur. 362; 1 Ph. 383; 41 E. R. 677; 13 L. J. Ch. 238; 13 Jur. 230; 12 Cl. & Fin. 30; 8 E. R. 1306; 9 Jur. 383. For subsequent proceedings, see 8 Beav. 380.]

Objections for impertinence cannot be maintained, if the materiality of the passages is so connected with the merits of the cause as to render it proper matter for discussion and for the determination of the Court at the hearing.

An information was filed by the Attorney-General at the relation of A. B., to set aside a fraudulent deed executed by an outlaw in a civil action, between the judgment and inquisition. Held, that statements shewing the interest of the relators and the motives for the execution of the deeds, as against the creditors, were not impertinent.

The question in this case was, whether certain passages in the information were or were not impertinent.

The information was filed by the Attorney-General, at the relation of three persons named Engler, Stulz, and Housley, and the substance of the statement was this:—Mr. Annesley was indebted to Engler, who proceeded against him to outlawry. Judgment of outlawry having been entered up against Annesley in 1835, the sheriff held an inquisition under a capias ulagatum, and, on the 11th of January 1841, returned, that A. was not seised of any lands within his county. The information alleged, that such return had been made, in consequence of a fraudulent deed executed by Annesley, whereby his freehold property had been conveyed to Rickards and Walker, his attorneys. The information insisted that this deed was voluntary and fraudulent, and that it had been executed between the return to a former writ, which turned out to be defective, and the return to the present writ.

[445] The information prayed, that Her Majesty's Attorney-General, on behalf of Her Majesty, might have the benefit, in equity, of the said judgment of outlawry and of the said writ of capias ulagatum issued thereon; that the said indenture or deed of trust might be declared fraudulent and void, and of none effect, as against the right or title of Her Majesty under and by virtue of the said outlawry; that all the estate and interest which belonged to the Defendant Annesley in the lands and hereditaments comprised in the said indenture, or (in case the said indenture should be to any extent valid or effectual) then such estate as still belonged to him beneficially in or out of the same lands and hereditaments, might be answered to Her Majesty and for an injunction and receiver.

The information contained the following passages, which, it was contended, were impertinent:—

"That, by indenture of assignment, bearing date the 19th day of August 1835, the said Frederick Engler, for good and valuable consideration, duly assigned the said bond and all principal monies and interest due or to become due thereon, unto Stulz and Housley, the two other relators herein named," &c., "and thenceforth the debt remained "in trust as to the beneficial interest therein for the said Stulz and Housley."

"That the said indenture was devised and contrived fraudulently, for the purpose and intent to delay, hinder, or defraud the creditors of the Defendant, A. Annesley, of their just and lawful actions, suits, debts, and demands, and in particular to delay and defeat the debt of the said Frederick Engler, and his proceedings, in or under the said outlawry."

[446] "That, at and before the time of executing the said indenture, the said Defendant A. Annesley was residing at Holyrood House, for the purpose of avoiding his creditors, or of preventing or delaying the proceedings against him, and he was in very embarrassed circumstances, and indebted in very large sums of money, which he was wholly unable to pay."

These and the corresponding interrogatories and some other minor passages were objected to as impertinent, and the Master, upon exceptions, so found them. The Plaintiff thereupon brought the case before the Court upon exceptions to the Master's report.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Campbell, for the Plaintiff, in support of the exceptions to the Master's report. These statements are not impertinent. "Impertinencies are where the records of the Court are stuffed with long recitals, or with long digressions of matters of fact, which are altogether unnecessary and totally immaterial to the point in question: as where a man will tell a tale of a tub, when he sets forth a long deed, which is not prayed to be set forth, in hac verba, where he stuffs his answer with long recitals, which are nothing to the purpose." (Gilbert For. Rom. 209.)

Here it was necessary and proper to shew why these persons were made relators, and their real interest in the matter, and why, in substance, they proceed in the name of the Attorney-General. The deed is alleged to have been executed for the purpose of defrauding the creditors. The fraud, as against the Crown, flows from the fraud against the creditors, and, to shew that fraud, it is most important to state the objects and motives of [447] the parties. Though the forfeiture on an outlawry is nominally to the King, yet, in truth, it enures to the Plaintiff in the action, and the produce goes towards payment of his demand. If the debt and costs were paid, the outlawry would be reversed. The Crown, therefore, in substance, stands in the nature of a trustee for the creditors. (See Rex v. Wilkes, 4 Burr. 3549.)

If these passages were really impertinent, they are too trifling to make it reasonable to incur the expense of expunging them; the only object of the Defendant in getting these exceptions allowed is to enable him to demur to the information, long after the time for demurring has expired. If there be the slightest doubt of these passages being found material at the hearing, the Court would not now expunge them; it would be deciding the merits of a case upon exceptions for impertinence—a course so manifestly inconvenient that the Court would hesitate to adopt it.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Kenyon, for the Defendants. The statements contained in this information relative to the assignment of the debt by Engler, to the fraud alleged to have been practised on the creditors of Annesley, and to his residence at Plywood House, and his object in so doing, are wholly irrelevant to the issue, and to the case of the Crown; they are therefore impertinent.

The Attorney-General might, in a case of this description, have sued without any relator; Engler, Stulz, and Housley are not parties to this information, and it is therefore perfectly immaterial what claims they [448] may have against Annesley. If they have no recognised interest under the outlawry, the Crown alone would be entitled to any property seized under the capias utlagatum; Rex v. Fowler (10 B. & C. 38). It is true that the Crown usually makes a grant of the property to the outlaw; but this is an act of mere grace and favour; and the practice does not, until the grant has been made, confer on the creditor any acknowledged right or interest in law, to the outlaw's property. The case is similar to that of a bastard dying intestate, and without heirs, though the Crown, in such a case, usually grants the escheated property to the family, still they have no interest which would enable them to maintain any proceedings in respect of the bastard's property. "The Crown is not and cannot be a trustee for the creditors. It is merely matter of grace that the King makes such grant of the goods of persons outlawed to the Plaintiffs, who have no manner of right in the goods until the grant has been obtained from the Crown." — v. Bromley (2 P. Williams, 269; and see Cuddon v. Hubert, 7 Sim. 485).

The capias utlagatum has relation to the lands of which the outlaw was seized on the day he was outlawed, or at any time since (see Lilly's Entries, 465, 552); the deed was subsequent.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This is an information filed for relief, which is certainly of a singular description, and may require great consideration before the cause is ultimately disposed of.

[449] It contains some few allegations, which are not alleged to be tainted with prolixity or unnecessary length, with regard to the matter intended to be proved, but which are said to express matters wholly immaterial, and which, therefore, ought to be treated as impertinent. The matter complained of, independent of the interrogatories, contains twenty lines in the stating and charging part. I am not at all prepared to say that matter of this length introduced into pleadings ought not to be so plainly irrelevant, and so unlikely to afford any foundation for the relief prayed, as to make it proper to apply to the Court to expunge it as impertinent. I consider the questions which constantly arise at the hearing, as to the materiality or immateriality of an allegation. Those who are accustomed to attend Courts, hear, day to day, arguments alleged at the Bar by counsel on the one side, that a particular allegation is important, and by the other side that it is not; and the Courts, in their judgments, and upon the result of a careful examination, reject, I think, I may say without exaggeration, four-fifths of what is alleged to be material, and found their judgments on the remaining fifth. Those who are acquainted with this cause of proceeding, and with the real difficulty there often is in ascertaining whether an allegation is material or not, would not, in the least degree be disposed to concur in the opinion, that because a fact may, at the hearing or at the end of a cause, turn out to be immaterial, it is therefore to be treated as impertinent from the beginning.

I think that these exceptions to the Master's report ought to be allowed, and for this reason, that it will be matter of argument upon the merits of the cause, at the hearing, whether these passages are or are not material.

[450] The Court cannot go into all the merits of a case and consider what the ultimate rights of a Plaintiff may be, for the purpose of determining, and that upon an imperfect argument, whether certain allegations, the materiality of which may be doubtful, are actually to be considered as immaterial. It would have the effect of drawing the whole merits of a cause into question, upon an allegation of impertinence. This would certainly be an inconvenient mode of proceeding, and one not in the least degree, calculated to preserve any right which [the party who takes the] objection has in the cause; for if it should appear, upon the consideration of the case on the merits, that the allegations complained of are immaterial, they cannot, in any degree, support the equity of the case, or give the Plaintiff any right as against the Defendant.

It is a matter of importance to avoid unnecessary length; but it is of much more importance, in discussing a question of length or materiality, not to determine the merits before the Court has before it all that is material to the merits. It is for this reason that I think these exceptions had much better never have been filed; and for this reason also I think the Master has come to an erroneous conclusion; the exceptions to his report must therefore be allowed.

I wish to observe I have not at all determined whether these passages are material or not. If this matter had come on upon the merits, it would then have been necessary to consider whether these allegations were material, and whether they did or did not tend to support the equity raised by the information. I think the exceptions for impertinence, in respect of matters alleged to be immaterial, cannot be maintained, when the question [451] of the materiality is so connected with the merits of the cause, that it cannot be decided without going into the consideration of the whole merits of the cause. (NOTE.—Affirmed on other grounds by the Lord Chancellor, 1 Phillips, 383.)

[451] BRADSTOCK v. WHATLEY. May 9, 1843.

Where a cause is set down upon an objection for want of parties, the Plaintiff begins. Where a cause is set down upon an objection for want of parties under the 39th General Order of August 1841, the Court merely gives its opinion on the record, and it then stands. The objection can only be finally disposed of at the hearing when the record and evidence are complete.

Form of order in such case. Costs reserved.

The bill, in substance, alleged, that the Plaintiff had been induced by two solicitors who were in partnership, to consent to be appointed a new trustee of the will of Walter Woodcock, in the room of a deceased trustee. That he had been so appointed upon their undertaking to indemnify him, and that the solicitors afterwards acted on the Plaintiff's behalf, in the trust. The bill sought to make the estates of the solicitors liable for the receipt of trust monies.

The Defendants, by their answer, objected that the suit was defective for want of parties, and amongst other persons, they insisted that the personal representative of Woodcock was a necessary party. The Plaintiff, under the 39th Order of August 1841 (Ordines Can. 175), set down the cause for argument upon the objection that the personal representative of Woodcock was a necessary party, and submitted to the other objections.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, for the Plaintiff, insisted on his right to begin, he also having the right to set down the objection.

[452] Mr. Turner, for the Defendants. The objection being raised by the Defendants, they have a right to begin, in the same way as upon a plea or demurrer or want of parties. At the hearing, though the Plaintiff opens his case, the Defendant has the reply on an objection for want of parties.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS decided that the Plaintiff was entitled to begin.

The objection for want of parties was then argued.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Bevir, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Turner, contra.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply.

Beasley v. Kenyon (3 Beav. 544), Seddon v. Connell (10 Simons, 79), Slater v. Wheeler (9 Simons, 156), May v. Selby (1 Y. & C. (C. C.) 235), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale] decided that the objection was not enable, and during the discussion said: Where a Plaintiff declines to set down for argument, an objection for want of parties raised by the answer, he subjects himself to this penalty:—He will not at the hearing, be entitled, as of course, to an order to amend by adding parties. He would still, however, be at liberty to make out a special case for the exercise of the discretion of the Court in his favour, and the Court would then have to decide whether his bill should be dis-[453]-missed for want of parties, or retained with liberty to amend.

When a cause comes before the Court under the 39th Order, the Court can only give its opinion on the record as it then stands; the objection cannot finally be disposed of until the hearing, for it is impossible at the beginning of a cause to say who will be necessary parties at the end. The Court cannot finally determine the matter until the record has been completed and the evidence taken. Whatever the Court might decide on such an occasion, the Plaintiff might the very next day amend his bill and vary his case, and the suit might again undergo a variation by the further answer and evidence. The judgment of the Court on such an occasion cannot therefore be conclusive.

As to the form of the order, I think there ought to be some constat of what has been decided by the Court. The proper form of order would seem to be this:—The Defendants having by their answer objected that certain persons (naming them) are necessary parties to this suit, the Plaintiff caused the objection to be set down, and demanded the opinion of the Court, whether the personal representative of Woodcock was a necessary party to the suit. Whereupon, &c., the Court held, that as the record was now framed, such personal representative was not a necessary party.

The costs should be reserved until the hearing.

[454] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL V. LORD CARRINGTON. June 6, 1843.

An information related to two objects, one failed, and the decree dismissed so much of the information as related to it, without costs, and ordered the Defendant to pay the informant his costs of the suit. Held, that the Taxing Master was wrong in apportioning the general costs of suit between the two objects.

The Court will not interfere with the discretion of the Taxing Masters as to the quantum of fees to counsel.

Costs of process of contempt for not answering, not allowed in the taxation of costs of suit as between party and party.

By the decree the lands of the Defendant were declared chargeable with £40 a year, and the Master was directed to take an account of the arrears, and the Defendant was ordered to pay what should be found due. Held, that the Defendant was not, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 17, 18, liable to pay interest on the amount due, from the date of the decree to the date of the Master's report.

This case came before the Court upon petition, partly impugning the correctness of the Master's taxation of costs.

The information was filed, seeking to charge the estates of Lord Carrington with two perpetual annuities of £40 and £4. At the hearing, the relief in respect to the latter was abandoned, and by the decree it was ordered, that so much of the information as sought to charge the lands with the payment of the annuity of £4 should be dismissed without costs. And it was declared that the said lands were chargeable with the annuity of £40 per annum, and an account of the arrears was directed, and it was ordered that the Defendant Lord Carrington should pay into the bank what should be found to be the amount of the arrears, and it was ordered, that the Defendant should pay to the informant his costs of the suit, and also pay to the other Defendants their costs of the suit, the said costs to be taxed by the Taxing Master.

The Attorney-General took in his bill of costs for taxation, which amounted to £333. The Taxing Master taxed it at £101, having struck off several items, and having disallowed £79 by way of apportionment of the general costs of the suit common to the two annuities of £4 and £40.

[455] What took place on the taxation as to this latter item, will be explained by the following extract from the Taxing Master's note:—

"On the taxation of the bill of costs of the informant, it was insisted before me on the part of the Defendant Lord Carrington, that inasmuch as the information had been filed to establish two distinct annuities, and as the informant had failed as to one of two objects sought to be attained by his suit, there must be an apportionment of the pleadings, and also of the general costs of the suit applicable thereto, and that the informant could only be allowed for such part of the pleadings as sought to charge Lord Carrington's estate with the £40 annuity, and also of a proportionate part of the general costs.

"On the other hand, it was insisted, on the part of the informant, that inasmuch as the costs occasioned by the unsuccessful attempt to charge the Defendant Lord Carrington's lands with the payment of the annuity of £4, had not at all increased the length of the pleadings (the whole of such pleadings, with the exception of a very few words, being quite as much applicable to the annuity of £40 singly, as to the two annuities together); moreover, that as the decree, after directing the dismissal as to the charge of the £4 annuity without costs, had gone on to direct the Defendant Lord Carrington to pay the informant's costs of the suit, it must be understood to have given the latter the whole of the costs of the suit, without any apportionment in respect of the unsuccessful part of it.

"The terms adopted by the parties in the drawing up of this decree, are, as it seems to me, precisely in accordance with the view contended for either on [456] one side or on the other; and, accordingly, the intention of the Court with regard to the informant's costs, is by no means so clear as it might have been made. On the whole, however, it appeared to me, that the best construction to put upon this decree was, that it was not the intention of the Court to make this case an exception to the general rule, which precludes a party entitled to the costs of a suit generally, from having allowed to him the costs of that portion of the proceedings therein in which he has failed, but simply to direct that the informant should be allowed such costs as he is entitled to by the course and practice of the Court; I accordingly decided on disallowing a proportionate part of the pleadings, and also of the general costs relating to the £4 annuity on which the informant had failed, according to the decision in Heighington v. Grant (1 Beavan, 228).

"With regard to the mode of such apportionment, I found, on a perusal of the pleadings, that it had been correctly stated to me on the part of the informant, that the information and answers related quite as much to the annuity of £4 as to that of £40, and, consequently, there seemed to me to be no other course to be adopted, but that of allowing the informant one-half only of such pleadings and of the general costs applicable thereto, down to the decree; thus ascribing the other half of such pleadings and general costs down to the decree, to the part of the suit on which the informant had failed. (See the case of Heighington v. Grant before referred to.) The remainder of the costs subsequent to the decree I allowed in full."

This petition stated, that as to the claim in the information for the said annuity of £4, the information [457] was increased in length by reason thereof one hundred and twenty words, or one folio and thirty words, and no more, and the length of the Defendant's answer was increased, by reason of such claim, to seven folios and twenty-two words, and no more.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Blunt, in support of the petition. Although the Court has dismissed without costs so much of the information as related to the £4, still it subsequently directs the Defendant to pay the whole costs of suit. The length of the proceeding was scarcely, if at all, increased by the claim in respect of the £4 annuity; the intention of the Court was merely to relieve the Defendant from the costs of that small portion of the pleadings which related to the £4 annuity, and certainly not to release him from a half of the general costs of the suit which has succeeded.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Greene, contrà. The Master has proceeded according to the usual mode, in ascertaining the proportion of the costs attributable to the second object of the information; Heighington v. Grant (1 Beavan, 228).

If so much of the suit as related to the £4 annuity had been dismissed with costs, it is clear that the informant would then have been properly charged with the £79: the effect of dismissing it without costs, is merely to relieve him from the payment of that sum. To give it him will be to dismiss a portion of the information, and yet make the successful Defendant pay the costs of it.

It is said that the addition occasioned by the claim is small, but the same would have been said if the informant had succeeded as to the £4 and failed in the [458] £40. In reality, the whole information relates as much to one as to the other. Ought a Defendant who attempts to support his suit by two independent claims, to have the whole general costs if he succeeds in one, though he entirely fails in the other?

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. I think it clear that the Master has mistaken the effect of this decree.

Where various matters are comprised in a suit in equity, it is by no means an uncommon occurrence, that the Plaintiff may so succeed, as to entitle him to a decree with costs as to one of the objects of his suit, and yet may entirely fail in another object, and as to that, have his bill dismissed with costs.

The ordinary practice of the Court, when a Plaintiff obtains a decree with costs as to part, and has his bill dismissed with costs as to another part, is to direct an apportionment to be made of the costs, and that the costs of one part shall be set off against the costs of the other part. In order to obtain that end, an apportionment must necessarily be made of the pleadings, and of the different proceedings that have, from time to time, taken place. Whether that is effected in the best manner, according to the practice of the Court, is more than I will undertake to determine, for I confess there were things in the certificate in Heighington v. Grant which a little surprised me at the time I acted on it. The rule seemed to be this, that if matters relate exclusively to one object, then, in the apportionment, the costs relating to them were apportioned to that object alone; but if such matters were common to both objects, then the costs would be equally divided between them.

[459] The state of things may be this:—A decree may be made with costs as to part, and the bill may be dismissed with costs as to the other part, if there appears to have been considerable costs incurred with respect to that part of the demand which has failed; on the other hand, a different order would be made, if it appeared quite manifest, that the costs incurred upon that part which has succeeded have not been at all, or scarcely at all increased, by that part which has failed. This is peculiarly so in this very case. A great quantity of pleadings and different documents had been stated relating to the first object, and a few words were put in making a claim which failed. It is not alleged, that the costs of this suit have been sensibly increased by that claim. The contrary, appears by the certificate which the Master has, with great propriety, made in this case, and all parties have agreed in that fact. The matter being considered at the hearing of this case, and it being clear there ought not to be an apportionment as to the matter that related to the object which failed (it being so trifling as to be of no consequence at all), the information was dismissed without costs as to that. It is supposed that this is no exception to the general rule. The information was dismissed without, and not with costs, as to part, and a decree was made with the costs of the suit. Now the Master is said to have conceived, in his construction of the decree, that it was not the intention of the Court to make this case an exception to the general rule. In that particular I think the Master was mistaken. The case was an exception to the general rule. The taxation was not to be according to the general rule, but according to the particular direction given at the hearing. That being so, I think the report ought to be reviewed by the Master.

[460] Some other points arose in this case.

The fees paid to the Attorney-General and two counsel with him amounted to £39, 4s., of which the Master taxed off £15, 15s. The Petitioner insisted, that having regard to the time devoted to the case, the cause having occupied two days, the fees paid were reasonable and proper; and that the whole ought to have been allowed.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. This is a mere question of quantum, I cannot deal with it.

The Master had disallowed two items of £1, 4s. 8d., which were costs incurred in issuing process of contempt against two Defendants who had not answered within the limited time, but which had not been executed. The Petitioner sought to have these sums allowed.

It was said that it was contrary to practice to allow these costs, unless specially directed by the order of taxation.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. There is a rule that you cannot get the costs unless they are specially applied for. (1 Smith's Pr. (3d ed.) 208.) The Master is right.

By the decree, dated the 13th of December 1842, the lands of the Defendant were declared chargeable with an annuity of £40 a year, and the Master was [461] directed to take an account of the arrears of the annuity of £40; and it was ordered, that what the Master should find to be the amount of such arrears should be paid by the Defendant into the bank.

The Master by his report, made in April 1843, found £917 to be due, which was immediately paid into the bank.

The Attorney-General now contended, that, under the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110. ss. 1 & 18, the Defendant was liable to pay interest at 4 per cent. on this sum from the date of the decree to the date of the Master's report.

On the other hand, it was contended, that there was no decree whereby any sum of money was payable, at least until the amount had been ascertained by the Master, and to order interest to be paid would be to vary the decree.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS was of opinion that the Defendant was not chargeable with interest during this period.

[462] STURGE v. DIMSDALE. June 9, 1843.

[S. C. 7 Jur. 543. See Robinson v. Geldard, 1849-52, 3 De G. & S. 501; 3 Mac. & G. 740; 42 E. R. 444; Beaumont v. Oliveira, 1869, L. R. 4 Ch. 316. Observed upon Wills v. Bourne, 1873, L. R. 16 Eq. 487.]

A simple declaration that charity legacies are to be paid out of pure personalty, will not give to such legacies a priority upon the pure personalty over other legacies and charges; nor exempt any part of the estate, from the ordinary rules of applying and distributing the assets.

A testatrix created a mixed fund of realty and personalty for payment of her debts and legacies, but she directed the charity legacies to be paid out of pure personalty. She afterwards directed her trustees to set apart a sum of stock sufficient to provide for a number of annuities, and as the annuitants died, the stock let loose was to be applied in payment of the charity legacies. Semble, that the direction alone was not of itself sufficient to exempt the charity legacies from being payable out of the realty, in the proportion of the realty to the personalty, but held, that the second part created a demonstrative fund of pure personalty, out of which the charity legacies were to be paid.

The testatrix Ann Dimsdale devised her freehold, copyholds and leaseholds to trustees upon trust to sell, and stand possessed of the produce and of her personal estate, upon trust, in the first place, to pay her debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and then to pay the several legacies and annuities thereafter bequeathed, so far as the same would extend, and she then proceeded as follows:—"Provided nevertheless, and my will is, that none of the legacies hereinafter bequeathed to charitable societies or institutions, or for charitable purposes, shall be paid out of the monies to arise by the sale of my estates, messuages, lands, tenements and hereditaments, or any of them, but shall be paid, so far as the same shall or may become payable under and by virtue of the directions hereinafter contained, exclusively out of and from such part of my personal estate only, as is legally applicable thereto."

The testatrix then gave a number of annuities to individuals; and, for the purpose of providing a permanent fund for payment of the annuities, she directed her trustees to retain so much of the capital stock in the three per centum consolidated Bank annuities which she might have at the time of her decease, if she should have sufficient for the purpose, and if not, then to purchase with other part of her personal estate so much more of the said capital stock as, with the capital she [463] should have therein, should produce such annual interest and dividends as should be equal to the aggregate annual amount of the annuities which she had thereinbefore given.

She then gave a number of pecuniary legacies, and also a charitable legacy of £500 "to be paid out of her personal estate only," and twelve legacies of £500 to individuals. And in case her real and personal estate, after payment of her debts, funeral, testamentary and other expenses, and after making such investments in the three per centum consolidated Bank annuities, as she had directed, and payment of all the legacies and sums of money thereinbefore given (except the said last-mentioned twelve legacies of £500), should prove insufficient to pay the said twelve last-mentioned legacies of £500 each, then the deficiency was to be paid in manner thereafter mentioned. And she declared, that her trustees should stand possessed of the said sum of capital stock in the three per cent. consols., subject to the charges thereon, under and by virtue of that her will expressed, upon trust, as the said annuitants died, to sell out sufficient capital stock, to pay off so much of the twelve legacies as there should remain unpaid. And after full payment of all the legacies, annuities, and charges thereinbefore given, she bequeathed unto the British and Foreign Bible Society, and the Moravian Missionary Society the sum of £1000 each, and to the Bristol Infirmary, the Bristol Strangers' Friend Society, the Bristol Refuge Society, the Bristol Lying-in Society, the Bristol Guardian Society or House, the Bristol Misericordia Society, the Bristol Dorcas Society, and the Prison Discipline Society, the sum of £500 each, payable in manner thereafter mentioned without any interest.

[464] And as the annuitants died, she directed the trustees to sell such part of the said capital stock as they should think fit, and to pay the produce thereof rateably and in proportion to and amongst the said ten charitable societies or institutions, until the whole of the said legacies should be paid. And she gave any surplus of the said capital stock and residuary estate unto the said ten societies in proportion to their several legacies.

The value of the real estate of the testatrix amounted in round numbers to about £22,000: her personal estate consisted of about £46,000 consols, and £11,000 reduced, and a sum in cash.

By an order of the Court a sum of £28,081 consols had been set apart to answer the annuities. The cause now came on for further directions.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Piggott, for the Plaintiffs, the executors.

Mr. Spence, Mr. Wood, Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Kenyon Parker and Mr. Goodeve, for the charity legatees, contended that they were payable in full out of the personal estate, or at least out of the £28,081 which was a specific fund directed (subject to the rights of the annuitants) to be applied in payment of the charitable bequests.

Mr. Milne, Mr. Hellyer, and Mr. Rolt, for other parties.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Craig, for Baron Dimsdale, the heir at law. The direction that the charity legacies shall be paid out of the personal estate legally applicable thereto, is not of itself sufficient to give to the charity legacies a priority upon the pure personalty over the [465] other legacies and charges. The Philanthropic Society v. Kemp (4 Beavan, 581). There must, therefore, be an apportionment of the legacies between the real and personal estate, and the charity legacies will fail in the proportion of the realty to the personalty. The produce of the real estate thus released will belong to the heir at law; Roberts v. Walker (1 R. & M. 752) and The Attorney-General v. Southgate (12 Sim. 77) were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears to me that the effect of the first words of this will is, to create a common fund composed of realty and personalty, which would consequently be liable to the ordinary rules of apportionment between the parties entitled to the fund, who stand in different characters; but there follows a direction that the charity legacies are not to be paid out of the real estate, but are to be paid, "exclusively, out of and from such part of her personal estate only as might be legally applicable thereto." I do not feel disposed to alter the opinion which I am reported to have expressed on a former occasion. (4 Beavan, 581.) Certainly I very much doubt, whether words of this kind will be sufficient to exempt any part of the estate from the ordinary rules of applying and distributing assets. The words here do not contain any direction that the charities shall, in the distribution of the assets, have any priority over any other demands upon the general assets. If therefore it rested upon these words alone, I should have hesitated a great deal before I could give full effect to these charity legacies, but what occurs afterwards in the will seems to me to be most material.

[466] The testatrix was very anxious to have various annuities paid in full, and she directed that a sufficient amount of stock should be set apart for answering them; having created a fund for the payment of these annuities, she directed that if the other parts of her estate should not be sufficient for the payment of the twelve legacies of £500 each, then that the fund set apart for the payment of the annuities should be made answerable for any deficiency that might occur. When the annuitants die, and it becomes clear that a portion of the corpus of the fund provided for their payment can be safely applied, she directs the trustees to sell the released portion and apply the proceeds, first in payment of the twelve legacies of £500 each, and then among the persons entitled to the charity legacies.

But for this direction, I own I should have had great difficulty, but with it I feel none. There is a fund constituted, or, according to the term which is used on occasions of this sort, a fund "demonstrated" by the testatrix herself, for the payment of these charity legacies. If it were perfectly clear that the whole of that fund of £28,061 consisted of pure personalty, I think there would have been nothing more to be said about the matter; for it appears to me, that the charity legatees are entitled to be paid, by means of the specific fund out of which the testatrix has directed them to be paid, and which was to consist of pure personalty.

I should not have felt clear on it if the question depended on the first clause alone; for I doubt whether a mere declaration that charity legacies are to be paid out of pure personalty will give them a priority over the other legacies and charges.

[467] LLOYD v. CLARK. June 15, 1843.

A Defendant put in an insufficient answer; the Plaintiff obtained an order to amend, and that the Defendant might answer the exceptions and amendments together. Held, that the Defendant's answer to the amended bill was to be deemed sufficient at the end of two months, under the 4th Order of April 1828, and not at the end of three weeks under the 6th Amended Order of April 1828.

The 6th Order of April 1828 does not apply to a case, where a Defendant is ordered to answer amendments and exceptions together.

The bill in this cause was originally filed against Clark. The common injunction was obtained, for want of answer, and Clark's answer having afterwards been filed was found insufficient; whereupon,

On the 16th of June 1842 the Plaintiff obtained a common order to amend without prejudice to the injunction, and that Clark should answer the exceptions and amendments at the same time.

The Plaintiff by amendment made Argent a party.

On the 23d of February 1843 Clark put in a sufficient answer. Argent, the only other Defendant, having then already put in a sufficient answer, the injunction was continued as against Clark (6 Beav. 309) on merits confessed.

On the 31st of May 1843 the Plaintiff obtained an order of course to amend without prejudice to the injunction, undertaking to amend within one week. The question was whether this order of the 31st of May was regular, that is, whether it had been obtained in time.

By the 13th Amended Order of April 1828 (Ord. Can. 8), a Plaintiff must obtain an order to amend within six weeks after the last answer is to be deemed sufficient.

By the 4th Order of April 1828 (Ord. Can. 6), an original answer is to be deemed sufficient, if exceptions are not taken within two months from the filing.

[468] The 6th Order of April 1828 (Ord. Can. 6), directs that if the Plaintiff do not, within three weeks after a Defendant's second or third answer is filed, refer the same for insufficiency on the old exceptions, such answer shall thenceforth be deemed sufficient.

If, therefore, Clark's second answer was to be deemed sufficient at the end of three weeks (16th March), the order to amend (31st May) had not been obtained within the six weeks. If, on the other hand, the answer was to be deemed sufficient at the end of two months (20th April), the six weeks expired on the 1st of June, and the order to amend, obtained on the 31st of May, was therefore regular.

The Defendant, on the 5th of June 1843, gave notice of motion to discharge the order to amend of the 31st of May for irregularity, which motion was now brought on.

Mr. Kindersley, in support of the motion.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Bates, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The answer of Clark, to the amendments and to the exceptions, was filed on the 23d of February 1843, and the title of that answer was, I presume, in the ordinary course, the further answer to the original bill and the answer to the amended bill; and the question is, whether an answer so entitled, comes within the description of the 6th Order of 1831, by which, "if the Plaintiff do not, within three weeks after a Defendant's second or third answer is filed, refer the same for insufficiency on [469] the old exceptions, such answers shall thenceforth be deemed sufficient." This was not a second answer to the original bill, but an answer to the amendments conjoined with the unanswered portion of the original bill. Is it not the first answer, so far as regards the amended bill?

It is quite clear that the 6th Order contemplates an answer to the same bill, namely, the second and third answer to the original bill; but if you have an answer which cannot be called the second or third answer to the same bill, but to that bill conjoined with amendments, then the case does not fall under the provisions of this order.

If such an amended bill were within the 6th Order, then, however insufficient the first answer might be, however important the matters of amendment might be, and however long it might require to investigate the sufficiency of the second answer, yet such answer would be deemed sufficient at the end of three weeks, instead of two months, and the Plaintiff's time for amending would consequently be reduced by five weeks. I must refuse this motion without costs.

[470] THOMPSON v. BLACKSTONE. June 23, 1843.

A trustee entered into a contract for the sale of trust property, and it was agreed that the purchaser should, out of the purchase-money, retain a private debt due to him from the trustee. On a bill by the trustee: Held, that this Court would not decree the specific performance of such a contract.

This was a bill for specific performance.

The bill was rather vague in its statements, but it alleged that the testator, by his will dated in 1822, devised certain estates to his wife for life, and after her decease unto his sons, the Plaintiffs Richard, Thomas and Edwin Thompson, "in trust to sell and dispose of the same, for the best price, or sum or sums of money that could be had or gotten for the same;" and he declared that their receipts should be good as sufficient discharges to any purchaser for the purchase-money. The bill did not state any trusts on which the produce was to be held.

The widow became indebted to Blackstone during the Plaintiff's minority, and deposited with him the title-deeds of the estate: Richard also became indebted to Blackstone.

The widow died in 1839, and in 1840 Richard, on behalf of himself and the other Plaintiffs (Thomas and Edwin) agreed with Blackstone for the sale to him of the property for £620, of which sum £240 was to be retained for the debts due to him from the widow and Richard, but Richard Thompson was "to be accountable to the estate of the said testator for the sum of £620." An agreement in writing was executed, whereby Blackstone agreed to purchase the property for £380.

The bill prayed a specific performance, and that the Defendant might pay the residue of the £380.

[471] There were statements in the bill which tended, though not very distinctly to shew, that there were trusts to be performed; as, that a Mr. Charlwood and his wife were beneficially interested under the will of the testator, that the three sons "in the execution of the trusts of the will of the testator," prepared conditions of sale of the property.

The Defendant demurred to the bill for want of equity.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Hardy, in support of the demurrer, argued, that upon the face of the bill, it appeared that the trustee had entered into an engagement to sell trust property, a part of the produce of which was, according to the terms of the agreement, to be applied in payment of the private debt of the trustee and of the widow. That this Court would not enforce a contract involving a breach of trust (see Ord v. Noel, 5 Mad. 438; Wood v. Richardson, 4 Beavan, 174), and that, therefore, there was no equity to support the bill. They objected also that Charlwood and his wife were necessary parties.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Bromhead, contra, contended that, upon the face of the bill, there appeared no trusts to perform, except the trust to sell the property. That it must be assumed, that the purchase-money belonged beneficially to the vendors; at all events, there being no trusts declared, that it belonged, as a resulting trust, to Richard the heir at law.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. The bill shews that there are existing trusts under the will to be performed. It is not shewn that Richard is the heir at law; and [472] is a mere assumption that there is any resulting trust. A purchaser having notice of the improper mode in which the purchase-money is to be applied, cannot safely complete. He would be himself joining in a breach of trust.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This bill is filed for the specific performance of the agreement, for the sale of the estate in question. The Plaintiffs state that, at the time it was entered into, there was an agreement and understanding between them to this effect. The Plaintiffs agreed to sell this estate to the Defendant for £620, of which £240 was to be retained by the purchaser, in satisfaction of a debt due to him from the widow and one of the vendors, and the remainder was to be paid over to the Plaintiffs. The Plaintiffs, receiving £380 only, were to be accountable to the estate of the said testator deceased for the full sum of £620.

and the sum of £240, part of the purchase-money, was to be applied in satisfaction of a debt, which, from the other statements of the bill, appears to be a debt originally due, in part from the widow of the testator, and as to the rest, from the Plaintiff Richard Thompson himself. £620 is distinctly stated to be the sum for which the Plaintiffs were to be accountable to the estate, and £240 of that, by the arrangement, was to be applied to debts due from other persons, and not from the estate of the testator. Is not that necessarily a breach of trust, if there be any trust alleged?

There is a trust alleged, which, though not very distinct, is more than sufficient to prevent such a contract as this being carried into effect by the aid of this Court upon a bill for specific performance.

[473] A beneficial interest is alleged, as well as a trust for sale; yet I am desired to suppose, that the trust for sale was without any object, so that there was a resulting trust for the benefit of the heir; and I am further to assume, that one of these Plaintiffs is the heir, though he is not so stated to be. I cannot assume either of these facts, especially when I find this statement, that the trustees for sale are to be accountable to the estate of the testator for the whole amount of the purchase-money, and words which, though somewhat vague, shew an interest in Charlwood and his wife. I think there is sufficient to shew that there is a trust to be carried into effect under the will, and that that which is sought to be carried into effect is a deviation from those trusts. I think on that ground, that this demurrer ought to be allowed.

It is unnecessary to say anything as to parties. (NOTE.—Mortlock v. Buller, 10 Ves. 292; Ord v. Noel, 5 Mad. 438; Wood v. Richardson, 4 Beavan, 174.)

[474] ARCHER v. HUDSON. July 3, 7, 1843.

The Plaintiff having obtained the common injunction upon the allowance of exceptions for insufficiency, procured an order to amend without prejudice to the injunction, undertaking to amend within a week, and that the Defendant might answer the exceptions and amendments together. The amendments having been made accordingly, the Court extended the common injunction to stay trial.

The bill in this case prayed for the common injunction. On the 26th of June the Defendant's answer was found insufficient by the Master, and the Plaintiffs there upon obtained the common injunction.

On the 27th of June the Plaintiffs obtained an order to amend their bill without prejudice to the injunction; and that the Defendant might answer the exceptions and amendments at the same time, the Plaintiffs undertaking to amend within a week. The bill was amended accordingly.

On the 30th of June notice of trial was given for the next Assizes at York, where the commission day was appointed for the 12th of July.

A motion was now made, on the usual affidavit, to extend the common injunction to stay trial. The truth of the amendments was also verified by affidavit.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Rolt, in support of the motion.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Elmaley opposed the motion, insisting that, according to the practice, the common injunction could not be extended upon an amended bill, especially on the eve of trial.

Howard v. Cliffe, before Lord Cottenham (10th May 1839), Mellor v. Cresswell (2 Mylne & K. 616), Simes v. Duff (8 Sim. 270), and [475] the second and third orders of 9th of May 1839 (Ord. Can. 135, 136), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It is very important that this Court should strictly adhere to any rule laid down by the Lord Chancellor; and whatever I may think, yet, if the authority of Howard v. Cliffe applies, I must refuse this application. I will inquire what orders had been made in that case, and mention the case on Friday. If the authority applies, I shall not have the least hesitation in refusing this application.

The General Orders which have been now referred to, do not seem to have been brought under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor in that case. I have a perfect recollection of the reason for those General Orders, and of all the inconveniences they were intended to remove.

The order to extend the common injunction has never been understood to make it a fresh injunction: it is an extension of the same injunction, and an order to dissolve, dissolves the whole.

July 7. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, after referring to the orders made in Howard v. Cliffe, made the order extending the injunction.(1)

[476] FLOWER v. HARTOPP. June 8, 9, July 8, 1843.

[S. C. 12 L. J. Ch. 507; 7 Jur. 613; 8 Beav. 199.]

King Charles the Second, by letters patent, granted some property in fee, subject to a fee-farm rent, and to a proviso of re-entry, in case a decree should be made at the suit of the King for repairing the property, and the same should afterwards remain for a year out of repair. The Crown afterwards granted away the rent. Held, that the proviso for re-entry could not be exercised, and that it therefore formed no objection to the title to the property.

By the conditions of sale, no further evidence of identity was to be required than what was afforded by the abstract and the documents therein abstracted. The descriptions held in the documents differed amongst themselves, and from the description in the particulars of sale. Held, that the purchaser was entitled to have further proof of the identity.

One general exception was taken to the Master's report of a good title, which did not point out the objections to the title. The Court disapproved of this inconvenient mode of proceeding.

A water corn-mill and premises were sold under the decree of the Court, and a reference was made to the Master to inquire and state whether a good title could be made thereto.

Upon that reference, it appeared, that by letters patent dated the 8th of April 1635, King Charles I. granted to Edward Ferrers and William Ferrers, their heirs and assigns, "all those water and corn-mills beneath the Castle of Leicester with all soke and suit to the same belonging" &c. (which was alleged to be the property sold), yielding a fee-farm rent of £17 to the King, subject to the following proviso:—

"That if, at any time thereafter, any mill thereby granted should be in decay, or totally ruined, thrown down or prostrated, and any cause, suit or plea should be instituted or mooted in the Court of the Duchy of Lancaster, on behalf of the King, his heirs or successors, against any tenant, farmer or occupier of the mills and other premises, for not repairing, sustaining and maintaining the same, or any of them, or on account of the same being totally ruined, prostrated or subverted; and a decree or decrees should be made by the said Court, for repairing and sustaining of all or any of the said [477] mills and other premises, and for the preserving, keeping and maintaining them in good state and repair, or for newly building, erecting or constructing them, or any of them; and nevertheless, the tenant, farmer or occupier thereof, should not, within one year next after such decree or decrees so, from time to time, made, repair, maintain, sustain, erect, build or otherwise restore the same mill, according to the form or effect of such decree or decrees, that then and so often it should be lawful for the King, his heirs and successors, into all or any of the said mill or mills, for the repairing, maintaining, newly building or erecting of which such decree or decrees shall have been made, to re-enter the same, and to have again and repossess for ever, anything in the letters patent to the contrary notwithstanding."

The letters patent also contained a covenant, on the part of the King, not to build any other water-mill upon any stream on which any mill thereby granted was erected, or any wind or horse-mill within any manor, field, or place in which any wind or horse-mill then stood, or in any place near the mills thereby granted, whereby any injury could arise to them.

(1) See Brown v. Reina, 3 Younge & J. 389; Martin v. Mortlock, 1 Newland's Pr. 356; Goddard v. Smith, Rolls, May 30, 1844; Stratford v. Lewis, V.-C. E., 23d May 1844.

The property thus granted to Edward Ferrers and William Ferrers was, in 1636, conveyed by them to Edward Moseley, and afterwards, in the same year, by him to the Corporation of Leicester, and, in 1686, by the Corporation of Leicester to Lawrence Carter, under whose will, dated 1771, it was sold, and at length it became vested in Lewthwaite Flower, whose estate was administered in this cause.

The fee-farm rent was afterwards sold and conveyed under the statutes of Charles II. (22 Car. 2, c. 6, and 22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 24), to the trustees of [478] Colston's Hospital in Bristol, in whom the same was now vested.

This property being sold in this suit, a reference as to the title was made to the Master, who having reported in favour thereof, the case came on, upon an exception to his report. There were two objections, first, that the estate was subject to a right of re-entry, either in the Crown or in the grantee of the Crown; the second related to the identity, with respect to which it is necessary further to state, that, by the sixth condition of sale, it was provided as follows:—"That no further evidence of identity of the parcels shall be required, than what is afforded by the abstract, or the deeds, instruments or other documents therein abstracted."

The modern description in the particulars of sale differed from that in the will, letters patent, and subsequent deeds; and the description in the will, differed from the former instruments, the descriptions in which were not precisely the same.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Heathfield, for the purchaser, in support of the exception. The vendor can have no title to the assistance of this Court, unless he is able to give to the purchaser a secure title to the possession of the property for the term which he has contracted for. Fildes v. Hooker (3 Mad. 193). Here the Plaintiff has sold the fee-simple, subject only to a rent, and to the ordinary remedies for recovering it: nothing is stated in the conditions of sale, of the condition by which the estate might be wholly defeated. The right of re-entry is shewn to exist, and no presumption can be raised against [479] this express reservation. Adair v. Shaftes (mentioned in 19 Ves. p. 156). A purchaser is not compellable to accept a title to premises formerly subject to an incumbrance, the discharge of which is shewn only by presumption. Barnesell v. Harris (1 Taunt. 430). The consideration was reserved for the benefit of the King's subjects or his tenants; and if the vendor alleges that it is neither in the King nor in the purchaser of the fee-farm rent, he must shew, clearly and distinctly, how it has been destroyed.

The identity of the property is not sufficiently shewn; notwithstanding the conditions of sale, the identity must be proved; it is only by proving the identity of the property that you can shew that the abstracted deeds relate to it. To evidence a good title to property by the abstracted deeds, you must shew that the deeds relate to that very property.

The conditions of sale are catching, and not to be favoured. Taylor v. Martindale (1 Y. & Col. (C. C.) 658); Southby v. Hutt (2 Myl. & Cr. 207; and see Hyde v. Dallaway, 4 Beavan, 606).

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. G. L. Russell, for the Plaintiff. The purchaser has wholly failed in shewing that the proviso for re-entry exists. If it does now exist, it must either be in the Crown, or in the purchaser of the rent. It cannot be in, or be exercised by the Crown, for by re-entering, the Crown would not only defeat the estate of the vendor, but also the rent granted by it to Colston's Hospital, and the effect would be to get back the property, discharged of the rent. The Crown cannot defeat its own grant of the rent. The statute of Charles II. (22 Car. 2, c. 6, s. 4) vests the rent in the grantees absolutely, [480] and provides that the grant is to be expounded most beneficially for the patentees and grantees of the rent. It became impossible, therefore, for the Crown to take advantage of the condition for re-entry. On the other hand, the right of re-entry cannot be in the purchaser of the rent, because, by the common law, no assignee of a reversion can take advantage of a re-entry by force of any condition, and the grant was not of a reversion within the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34; again the owner of the fee-farm rent cannot have, at the suit of the Crown, that decree, upon which alone the right of re-entry is to be founded,

It cannot therefore now exist, and, after the long possession, it must be presumed to be extinguished. Gibson v. Clark (1 Jac. & W. 159). If the right does exist, it can only arise upon a decree in the Duchy Court at the suit of the Crown, which never could be obtained.

The identity is proved according to the express terms of the conditions of sale. The purchaser is entitled to no further evidence of the identity than what is afforded by the abstract.

Though there may be a variation in description, it may be accounted for by the ordinary changes which property undergoes by lapse of time. There is a sufficient moral certainty of the property being the same, and it is fortified by the fact of the long possession.

Mr. Turner, in reply.

Lord Braybrooke v. Inskip (8 Ves. 417), Lyddall v. Weston (2 Atk. 19), were also cited.

[481] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case two objections are taken to the title. The first as to the right of re-entry on the part of the Crown; and second as to the identity of the parcels.

With respect to the first, which is the important objection, I will take time to consider it. It may be necessary to have it decided in another place.

As to the question of identity, I am not satisfied with the evidence produced before the Master. The vendor goes to a sale with a certain description of the property in his particulars, and he has a condition of sale which says: "That no further evidence of the identity of the parcels shall be required, than what is afforded by the abstract, or the deeds, instruments, or other documents therein abstracted."

When these instruments are looked into, we find that the description contained in the last, which is a will of not less than seventy years old, differs from the description in the particulars. Then, it was justly said, you are not to confine yourself to the will, but you are to look at the other instruments stated in the abstract; and if you find that the words used in the will, being modified when compared with the expressions used in the previous deeds, induce a conclusion which identifies the property with the description contained in the particulars, then the vendor has done all that can be required. But, upon looking back to the other descriptions contained in the three or four previous instruments, it is found that they vary more than the last instrument, from the description contained in the particulars. This, therefore, does not aid the vendor, but rather makes the identity more difficult. The lapse of [482] seventy years would well justify a change in the state of the property, and a variation in the description; but the instant you have a variation in the deeds, the description in the deeds cannot, of itself, be evidence of the description contained in the particulars: something else must be introduced to correct them; and therefore, although the purchaser may not be entitled to require any further evidence of the identity of the parcels than what is afforded by the deeds, yet he is entitled to have what he has bought distinguished, and without that, it cannot be said by the vendor that he has proved, by the instruments, the parcels described in the particulars. It is very possible that a short affidavit might remove the difficulty, but I think, as the matter at present stands, the exception, as to the identity, must be referred back to the Master, unless the parties agree on some other course.

I will reserve the other question.

July 8. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. This case comes on upon an exception to the Master's report dated the 3d day of March 1843, finding that a good title was shewn to an estate purchased by the exceptant under the decree of the Court.

On the hearing of the exception, two points only were raised in argument. It was alleged, first, that the estate was subject to a right of re-entry, either in the Crown or in the grantee of the Crown; and, secondly, that the identity of the premises sold, with the premises to which the vendor has made out a title, was not sufficiently established. Upon the second point, I thought the [483] exception good; as to the first, I reserved the question for further consideration.

The title is traced up to the letters patent dated the 8th day of April 1635 (11 Car. 1), whereby, that which is alleged to be, and which for the present purpose must be assumed to be, the property in question, was granted to Edward Ferrers and Williams Ferrers in fee, yielding a fee-farm rent of £17 to the King.

The property in question was in part described as "all those water and corn-mills beneath the Castle of Leicester with all soke and suit to the same mills belonging." And the letters patent contained a proviso "That if at any time thereafter," &c.

The property thus granted to Edward Ferrers and William Ferrers was by them conveyed to Edward Moseley, and afterwards by him to the Corporation of Leicester, and, at a subsequent period, by the Corporation of Leicester to Lawrence Carter, under whose will it was sold, and at length it became vested in Lewthwaite Flower, whose estate is administered in this cause. The proviso for re-entry which is contained in the letters patent, was not noticed in the particulars and conditions of sale; and the question is, whether the right of re-entry is now in force; for if it is, the vendor cannot compel the purchaser to complete the purchase.

It does not appear that the right of re-entry was ever made the subject of any grant or release, but the fee-farm rent, which was all the interest reserved to the Crown by the letters patent, was some time afterwards granted to, and is now vested in, the trustees of Colston's Hospital at Bristol.

[484] The purchaser alleges that the existence of the fee-farm rent proves the existence of the right of re-entry, or, at least, that it ought to be proved by the vendor that the right of re-entry is extinct. His argument is shortly this: the right exists or not; if it exists, it is either in the Crown or in the grantee of the fee-farm rent, and to the purchaser it is immaterial which; and if it does not exist, the vendor ought to shew how it has been destroyed.

The vendor scarcely, if at all, objects to the form or substance of the argument; but he insists, that at this time, there is no right of re-entry, for if any, it is true, as the purchaser says, that it must be in the Crown, or in the grantee of the fee-farm rent; it cannot be in the grantee of the fee-farm rent, because the grant was not of a reversion within the statute 32 Hen. 8, c. 34, and also because the owner of the fee-farm rent cannot have, at the suit of the King, that decree upon which alone the right of re-entry is to be founded; and it cannot be in the Crown, because the exercise of it would defeat the grant of the fee-farm rent.

The argument of the vendor appears to me to be valid. There is nothing to countenance the conjecture made by the purchaser, that the right of re-entry was reserved by the Crown for the public benefit, to secure the existence of a mill where corn can be ground. The whole interest of the Crown has been alienated. The right of re-entry could only be enforced under a decree obtained at the suit of the Crown. The re-entry, if obtained, would make void, ab initio, the estate granted by the letters patent, and defeat the rent charge; and, on consideration of the nature of the proviso, the alienation of the fee-farm rents, and the effect of the statutes (32 Hen. 8, c. 34, 22 Car. 2, c. 6, and 22 & 23 [485] Car. 2, c. 24), I am of opinion, that there is not, under the proviso, any right of re-entry which can now be enforced. I must therefore overrule the exception, so far as it is founded on the objection that such right of re-entry is in force.

Refer it back to the Master, upon the objection that the property described in the abstract is not sufficiently identified with the property described in the printed particulars.

One general exception only had been taken to the report, "for that the Master had certified that a good title was shewn to the property, whereas the Master ought not to have so certified."

It was objected, that the form was improper, and that the purchaser ought to have specified the objections on which he intended to rely, and costs were, in consequence, asked against the exceptant.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS disapproved of the mode in which the questions had been presented to the Court, and held, that the order now made ought to specify the objections insisted on by the exceptant: he said, however, that he could make no special order as to costs.

[486] CANNEY v. BOND. July 18, 1843.

Part of a testator's assets consisted of a promissory note. The executor, though requested by the parties interested so to do, neglected to get it in; and about two years afterwards it was lost by the insolvency of the debtor. Held, that the executor was personally liable.

The object of the suit was to make an executor liable for a sum of money which had been lost by the insolvency of the debtor, on whose personal security the debt had been allowed by the executor to remain.

In 1825 the testator advanced to a Mr. Phillips a sum of £500, to be invested by the latter on some mortgage security. For securing it in the meantime, Mr. Phillips gave to the testator his promissory note, payable with interest.

In January 1826 the testator died, and his will was proved by Jones and Bond, his executors. Shortly afterwards, Jones and one of the persons interested in the testator's estate, pressed Bond to call in this debt, and invest it in the funds; but Bond replied, "that he should not think of removing the money from Mr. Phillips' hands, as it was as safe there as if it were in the Bank of England." Other similar applications were afterwards made to Bond, but with no better success. In 1827 Bond received £100 from Mr. Phillips, in part payment, and the remainder was lost by the death and insolvency of Mr. Phillips in March 1828. There was evidence to show that Mr. Phillips, if pressed earlier, would have paid the amount.

Under these circumstances, it was insisted, by the bill, that Bond was personally liable for the £400 and interest.

[487] Mr. G. L. Russell (in the absence of Mr. Pemberton Leigh), for the Plaintiff, cited Lawson v. Copeland (2 B. C. C. 156), Powell v. Evans (5 Ves. 839), Clough v. Bond (3 Myl. & Cr. 490).

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Lovat, for Bond.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Elderton, for another Defendant.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. At the death of the testator part of his estate was outstanding on personal security. It was the duty of the executors, quite independently of any application being made to them by the persons interested in the estate, to take steps to get in this money. In the exercise of a full discretion, they were not to commence legal proceedings unnecessarily, but they ought to have exerted themselves to get in the debt, and, if necessary, to have commenced compulsory proceedings to obtain it.

The persons beneficially interested, not considering the money safe where it was requested the Defendant Bond to get it in. Instead of complying with this request he refused to do so, saying that the money was as safe as in the Bank of England; two years afterwards the money was lost by the insolvency of the debtor.

If, in any case, an executor is to be charged for wilful default, it is in a case of this sort, where the money not only is found on a security not sanctioned by the Court, and which ought therefore to be got in, but where also the executor has been requested to call it in, and has refused on the ground that it is perfectly safe.

[488] The Defendant, by his conduct, has taken upon himself the risk of the security, and he must therefore be charged with it, and with the costs down to the hearing.

[488] JONES v. POWELL. July 17, 22, 1843.

An executor, upon transferring stock to a legatee, paid one-sixteenth per cent. to a stockbroker for identifying him at the bank. He was allowed the payment in passing his accounts.

The testator gave to each of his three children £20,000, and he directed that during their minorities, their legacies should be invested in their names in the funds. By the terms of the will, the trustees were authorised to retain, out of the estate, all costs, damages, and expenses which they might sustain in the execution of the trusts.

The three children being infants, Mr. Paterson, the executor, transferred three sums of £21,728, 8s., 3 per cents. (being the amount which would have been purchased with the legacies after deducting the legacy duty), from the name of the executor to the names of the executor and the infants.

He paid to the stockbroker for such three transfers, one-sixteenth per cent., or £40, 14s. 10d. On passing his accounts before the Master, Mr. Paterson was allowed £6, 6s. only for the fee on such transfers.

There were three other sums of £36, 5s., £42, 18s. 4d., and £9, 14s. 5d., charged by the executor for fees on transfers of other stock, for which the Master respectively allowed £2, 2s., £6, 6s., and £2, 2s. only. All the transfers had been made previous to the institution of the suit.

[489] The charges for expenses to brokers for transfers therefore amounted to £96, 12s., which the Master disallowed except as to sixteen guineas.

The Defendant Paterson took exceptions to the Master's report, insisting that the whole £96, 12s. ought to have been allowed him in passing his accounts.

In support of the charge, five stockbrokers deposed, that it was the custom of stockbrokers always to receive one-sixteenth per cent. for transfers (except where no charge was made); and one of them said, that according to the rule of the Bank of England, the executor would not have been allowed to make the transfer without a sworn broker, or his representatives, being present to identify him as a proper person to make the same.

On the other hand, the clerk of a respectable firm of solicitors stated, that he had been for twenty years past in the habit of attending at various times at the Bank of England, for the purpose of identifying persons making transfers of stock standing in their names, and that he was well acquainted with the practice of the Bank of England on the transfer of such stock. That any proprietor of Government stocks transferable at the Bank of England was capable of transferring the same, without the intervention or assistance of any broker or member of the Stock Exchange, upon being identified by some person known to some clerk or clerks in the said Bank of England. That his employers were not brokers or members of the Stock Exchange, nor was the witness.

Another witness stated that he had been, for a period of eighteen years, a clerk in the banking-house of [490] Messrs. Barclay, Bevan, & Co., and that he was well acquainted with the practice of the Bank of England on the transfer of stock, and on other matters. That any proprietor of Government stock transferable at the Bank of England, was capable of transferring the same, without the intervention or assistance of any broker or member of the Stock Exchange, upon being identified by some person known to some clerk or clerks in the said Bank of England, and that he and his employers were frequently in the habit of attending at the bank for the purpose of transferring stocks belonging to customers of his said employers, and identifying the parties intending to make the same; and that, in such instances, no broker or member of the Stock Exchange was employed in the matter.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Renshaw, for Mr. Paterson, (1) in support of the exceptions. The executor ought to be allowed the usual charges paid by him for the transfer. It is the ordinary practice to employ a broker in effecting a transfer of funds, and the invariable charge is clearly proved, by the evidence, to be one-sixteenth per cent., and it is even stated that the bank would not permit a transfer without a broker being present to identify the transfer. The duty of the broker in this case was more than to identify, he was to make a calculation of what sum of stock, according to the market price at the moment, and which constantly varies, could be purchased with the legacy in sterling money after deducting the duty. The sums transferred were very large, and, according to the practice, this sort of charge has always been allowed to executors.

(1) The exceptions, though taken nominally by the Defendant Paterson, were understood to have been, in reality, brought forward by the committee of the Stock Exchange.

[491] Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Tyrrell, contra. This case has been brought forward by the Stock Exchange, and the brokers who have made affidavits are interested in supporting this unreasonable charge: the evidence is therefore to be regarded with some suspicion.

The bank are bound by law to allow a transfer to be made in their books without charge, and the interference of a broker is altogether unnecessary. All that the bank requires for their protection is, that the party shall be identified by any respectable person known to them, as by a banker or his clerk: only one of the several brokers swears that the intervention of a broker is indispensable, and that is contradicted by two witnesses. The employment of a broker implies a buying and selling, which a transfer is not. Supposing, however, that it is necessary to employ a broker, it is perfectly unreasonable to allow a per centage for identifying, the trouble being in no way increased by the amount. The sum of one guinea only is allowed to the broker of the Accountant-General; and where executors were ordered to transfer a fund into Court, and paid £12 for the transfer, one guinea alone was allowed them; Hopkinson v. Roe (1 Beavan, 183). It is preposterous to say that £96, 12s. is a reasonable sum to pay a broker for walking to the bank, and saying "This is Mr. Paterson." The executor might have got his banker or his clerk to identify him at an expense of a guinea.

The Master is therefore right, and the exceptions to his report ought to be overruled.

Mr. Benson, for another party, supported the Master's report.

[492] Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. Hopkinson v. Roe does not apply. There the transfer was into Court, and the charge is settled by arrangement with the Accountant-General's broker.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS said he would make inquiries as to the practice, and had these sort of matters had been usually dealt with in the Master's offices, because if there had been a habit of allowing to executors the expense of transfers, then, in the present case, in which no special circumstances had been proved, the sums paid ought to be allowed. He added that he thought that the case of Hopkinson v. Roe did not apply to this case.

July 22. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale], after making inquiries, allowed the exceptions to the Master's report, thereby deciding that the executor was entitled to the sums paid by him to the stockbroker.

[492] GREENWOOD v. ROTHWELL. July 17, 1843.

[S. C. 7 Beav. 279, 291; 6 Scott (N. R.), 670; 5 Mac. & G. 628; 12 L. J. C. P. 250]

Devise to A. for his life, and from and after his decease, "unto all and every the issue of the body of the said A., share and share alike, as tenants in common, and the heirs of such issue." Held, that A. took an estate for life only.

The testator, John Mitchell, by his will, dated in 1811, after directing his debts and legacies to be paid out of his real and personal estate, devised as follows:—"I also give and devise unto Jonas Greenwood, the son of my late brother-in-law Jonas Greenwood, all my lands and hereditaments situate in Clayton aforesaid, and now in the occupation of John Mortimer; and [493] also all other my messuages, cottages, lands and tenements situate in Clayton aforesaid, for and during the natural life of the said Jonas Greenwood; and from and after his decease, I give and devise the said premises unto all and every the issue of the body of the said Jonas Greenwood, share and share alike, as tenants in common, and the heirs of such issue."

Jonas Greenwood survived the testator, and died in 1840.

This bill was filed by the children of Jonas Greenwood, insisting that, under the will, he took a life-estate only. It alleged that, in 1823, he conveyed the property by lease and release to Abraham Tempest in fee, and to bar the estate tail, Jonas Greenwood thereby covenanted to levy a fine, which the bill stated "had been levied accordingly."

To this bill the Defendant pleaded that Jonas Greenwood levied the fine with proclamations; and averred that the estate and interest which the Plaintiffs would otherwise have had was thereby barred and extinguished.

The plea came on upon the 22d of June 1842, when a case was directed to the Common Pleas on the construction of the devise. That Court certified that Jonas Greenwood took an estate for life. (6 Scott (N. R.) 670.)

The plea now came on for argument.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Rogers, for the Defendant.

[494] Mr. Turner and Mr. Thomas Turner, for the Plaintiffs.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In cases of this sort, you are to consider the rules of law and apply them to the particular cases, having regard to the intention of the testator, to be collected from all the words of the will.

Here there is a gift, in the first instance, expressly for life; therefore, so far, there is a clear intention that Jonas should only take a life-estate. The next gift is after his decease, to "all and every the issue of the body of the said Jonas Greenwood, share and share alike, as tenants in common."

The word, issue, by itself is ambiguous; it may mean the children of Jonas, or it may mean the issue of Jonas intended to take in a certain order of succession for ever. But under what circumstances are they to take here? What are the indicia of intention? "All and every of the issue" are to take, "share and share alike as tenants in common." There is to be a distribution among them, and there is a superadded limitation "to the heirs of such issue."

There is therefore a distinct gift to a person for life, and after his death, to his issue, share and share alike, and with the word "heirs" superadded. This does not look like an intention that they should take in perpetual succession. It is to be further observed, that the gift over, which has been relied on in other cases, is wholly wanting here.

The distinctions in all these cases are very nice. The Court must carefully look at all the indicia of intention, and looking at them in this case, I am not satisfied [495] that the decision of the Court of Common Pleas is erroneous. I believe it is consistent with the other authorities, and I do not think it ought to be disturbed.

Overrule the plea without costs, and let the Defendant have a month's time to answer.

[495] MADGWICK v. WIMBLE. July 13, 1843.

Difficulties in appointing a receiver of a partnership upon motion.

Surviving partners insisted on continuing the partnership with the assets of a deceased partner. The Court thought the representatives of the latter entitled to a receiver. Partnership stipulation, that a son of one partner, or in case of his minority, the executor should, on the death of such partner, succeed to his share. The Court, on the terms of the partnership deed, considered it an option, and not an obligation.

In June 1849 Messrs. Warner, Attwood and Wimble entered into partnership for a term of years. By the deed of partnership it was provided, that Attwood was to be entitled to introduce his eldest son as an apprentice, and, after the expiration of the apprenticeship, he was to be at liberty to transfer to such eldest son his own share and interest in the said partnership. "And in case the said William Attwood should depart this life during the continuance of any such partnership, leaving his said eldest son qualified to take his father's share in the said partnership concerns, such son should be entitled to succeed thereto, and become a partner with the other or others. But if Attwood should depart this life, leaving his eldest son him surviving, who should be disqualified for immediately taking his father's share, by reason only of minority, then that the executors of Attwood should be entitled to hold Attwood's share in the said partnership during such minority, allowing to Warner £100 per annum, out of their share of profits, as an equivalent for his personal attention, and should transfer the same share to such son on his attaining full age. Provided always that such son of the said William Attwood should not be entitled to [496] become a partner, unless he should be of good character and competent ability, and that any party thereto might object to his admission as such partner, for want of such qualification, and might require a decision thereon to be made by arbitration. And in case Attwood should so die, leaving a widow, but not such son entitled to succeed to his share of the said co-partnership, or if any such son should become disqualified therefrom, or should die in the lifetime of his mother, then such widow of Attwood should be entitled to receive, not only during the remainder of the seven years, but also during such further term as the said trade should be carried on under the provisions of the deed, an annuity of £100, to be paid by quarterly payments by the party or parties carrying on the same trade, in proportion to their respective shares of profit, and to commence from the time when Attwood or his executors or his son, entitled as aforesaid, should cease to have any share in the profits of the said trade."

Provision was afterwards made for the event of the death of Wimble or Warner.

A lease for twenty-one years was at the same time granted by Attwood of some property to the three partners, in trust for the partnership.

Attwood died in November 1841, leaving his son a minor, and his widow alone proved his will. On her death, in May 1842, the Plaintiff proved his will, and gave notice to the surviving partners, that he declined to take the testator's share for the purpose of carrying on the trade for the benefit of his estate, or of his eldest son.

The surviving partners, however, continuing to carry on the trade as theretofore the executors of Attwood [497] filed this bill to have the partnership affairs wound up, and for a receiver and injunction. Warner insisted, that by the terms of the partnership, the surviving partners had a right to continue the capital of Attwood in the business; he stated that the widow, after proving the will, had continued the business with them, and had received her share of the profits of the permanent capital.

A motion was now made, on the part of the Plaintiff, for a receiver to get in the partnership property, and to sell the stock and effects belonging thereto, and for an injunction to restrain the surviving partners from carrying on the business in the name of the deceased partner.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Renshaw, in support of the motion. According to the true construction of the partnership deed, the son and executor of Attwood are entitled to an option of taking the share of Attwood in the business; but it is not obligatory on them to do so. Nothing has been done by the widow to bind the testator's estate by an adoption of the right. All she has done has been to receive monies on account. Supposing, however, that she had adopted it, that would not bind the present Plaintiff. He cannot be compelled to make himself personally responsible for the losses and liabilities of a partnership, in which he has no beneficial interest. There will be no limit to his liability if he enters into this partnership. Even if the testator had covenanted that his executor should carry on the business with the surviving partners after his death, the executor could not be compelled against his will, to perform that obligation of his testator.

The estate of Attwood is insolvent, and all his assets are required for payment of his debts: they cannot therefore be wholly retained by his surviving partners.

[498] The circumstances of this case require the appointment of a receiver for the protection of the testator's interests. Here there is a dissolution by the death of Attwood, and as to the rights of succeeding to the testator's share, Kershaw v. Mathews (2 Russ. 62) decides, that when a partner has a right to appoint a person to succeed upon his death, to his share in a business, and the person so appointed refuses to accept that share, or to comply with the stipulations, the partnership is dissolved. Here the Defendants, after dissolution, are continuing the trade with the testator's assets, and in the testator's name; this is a sufficient ground for the interposition of the Court; Harding v. Glover (18 Ves. 281). They also cited Wilson v. Greenwell (1 Swan. 481).

Mr. Teed and Mr. Goodeve, for Wimble, did not oppose the motion.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. Turner, for the Defendant Warner. The terms of the partnership deed, and the conduct of the late executrix, entitle the surviving partners to continue the business in the mode pointed out by the partnership deed. The Court will not grant a receiver, except in cases of misconduct or insolvency; neither of which exists here. The object of appointing a receiver is to keep matters in statu quo till the hearing, but to appoint one in the present case, would be to stop the business, and destroy the goodwill; and thus put it out of the power of the Court to determine in favour of the Defendants at the hearing, for the subject in dispute will be then destroyed. The rule of the Court is not to interfere, upon an interlocutory application, in a way to prevent the real question between the parties being discussed; The Attorney-General v. The Corporation of Liverpool (1 Myl. & Cr. p. 207); and it will not, on motion, decide the whole merits of the cause. (The Skinnery Company v. The Irish Society, 1 Myl. & Cr. p. 163.)

It is said that Attwood's estate is insolvent; but there is no evidence of that fact; and even supposing it to be true, that would not give to his personal representatives the right of putting an end to the partnership contract: it is binding on the deceased partner and his property; and it is not to be released on the ground of insolvency. The Defendants have entered into the partnership and embarked their own capital therein, on the faith that the stipulations on the part of Attwood would be performed; besides this, the executrix by adopting the option, bound Attwood's estate, and the present Plaintiff cannot now recede from it.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply.

Where a partnership is dissolved, it is impossible that matters can remain in statu quo. It must, of necessity, be wound up by a sale, and every application of the partnership property inconsistent with winding it up is improper. Crawshaw v. Maule (1 Swan. p. 507).

If the testator had covenanted that the business should be continued by his representatives after his death, and that his partners should retain the capital, still, if the executor or administrator refused to become a partner, the surviving partners could not insist on the performance of the stipulation. An action might be brought, and the assets might be liable, but no partnership could [500] exist without the assent of the executor, otherwise an executor or administrator might be compelled to join in a declining or insolvent concern, and subject himself, personally, to the gravest responsibility.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It must be admitted, that when an application is made for a receiver in partnership cases, the Court is always placed in a position of very great difficulty; on the one hand, if it grants the motion, the effect of it is to put an end to the partnership, which one of the parties claims a right to have continued; and, on the other hand, if it refuses the motion, it leaves the Defendant at liberty to go on with the partnership business, at the risk, and probably at the great loss and prejudice, of the dissenting party. Between these difficulties it is not very easy to select the course which is best to be taken, but the Court is under the necessity of adopting some mode of proceeding, to protect, according to the best view it can take of the matter, the interests of both parties, and it has accordingly interfered in many such cases.

The rights of the parties now in question depend upon the deed. The case seems to be this, that there was to be a partnership continued between them for a certain term of years, that is, if they all lived during that period. A separate provision was made for the event of the death of any or either of them. Upon the death of Warner or Wimble, a provision was made for the disposition of their interests; but, upon the death of Attwood, a different sort of provision was made, for he wished to secure for his son the advantage of becoming a member of the partnership, and a particular stipulation was entered into for that purpose, which was to this effect. [His Lordship stated it.]

[501] Now nobody can doubt what was the object of this agreement; it was the intention of Attwood the father to secure to his son, if he should be qualified at the time of his father's death, the right to become a member of this partnership; and in case he should not then be qualified, by reason of his minority only, then to secure to his executors a right to continue the partnership until the son attained his age of twenty-one, and then to assign to him.

It is said, that because the executors and the son were to have this right, they were therefore under an obligation to go on with the partnership, and undertake all the risks of it, under any circumstances whatever that might occur; and that the surviving partners, instead of being simply under the obligation of admitting them to be partners, were to have a right of compelling them to be partners, and to continue Attwood's property in the business. I cannot so construe the deed, and I do not think that this could be their meaning. It is not right for me now to put a final construction upon this deed, or to come to a final adjudication upon it, but, upon the consideration of two courses, both of which the Court would willingly avoid, as both must interfere with rights which may, by possibility, have to be hereafter determined still when the question is, which course I am to adopt, I think, upon the construction of this deed, and bearing in mind that Mr. Warner insists that he has a right to keep the property of this testator in this concern, and to subject it to all the partnership risks and responsibilities until the hearing, I ought to interfere to protect the property. I will not interfere rashly, and, after stating my opinion, I think I ought to take a course which I have pursued on former occasions with great advantage to the parties, namely, to allow the matter to stand over, to enable the parties to communicate and come to [502] some arrangement, by which these matters may be brought to a satisfactory conclusion without the interference of the Court. There would be for the mutual advantage of all parties. If necessary, however, I should appoint a receiver, but I will not take that step unless the parties make it absolutely necessary for me to do so.

It might be the most proper course, on this occasion, to refer it to the Master to determine what course would be for the common advantage of all parties concerned to adopt. It may be proper that the surviving partners should continue the business for the purpose of winding it up.

The parties had better avoid the interference of this Court if they can. If they cannot, I must act upon this, as I did on one or two former occasions, when this mode of proceeding was not successful—I must apply the power, which this Court has, of appointing a receiver, and take the matters out of the hands of both parties. I should be very sorry to do that, but it is my duty to do so, if the parties do not agree amongst themselves.

The parties afterwards referred the matters in difference to the arbitration of Mr. James Parker.

[503] PRITT v. CLAY. July 12, 13, 17, 21, 1843.

[See Gething v. Keighley, 1878, 9 Ch. D. 550.]

A party who, upon a compromise, had executed a general release, claimed relief on the ground of a large item in which he was interested, having, by mistake, been omitted in the account. Held, that he was entitled to relief, but that to obtain the release must be wholly set aside.

A. B., the representative of a deceased partner, having filed his bill against C. D., a surviving partner, for an account, A. B., in consideration of £500, released C. D. from all claims, and the bill was dismissed. By mutual error a debt of £30 owing to the partnership, but which was not then known to exist, was omitted in the consideration by both parties; C. D. afterwards received it. Held, that A. B., notwithstanding the release, was entitled to his share of the debt, but that to obtain it the whole account must be reopened.

Messrs. Pritt & Clay carried on business in partnership as solicitors. Pritt was entitled to two-thirds of the profits, and Clay to the remaining one-third.

In December 1831 Pritt died, leaving his partner surviving him; and in 1832 the representatives of Pritt filed their bill in this Court against Clay, for the purpose of having the partnership accounts taken, and for the ascertainment and payment of the share of Pritt. The Defendant put in his answer setting forth the accounts, but by an error, arising altogether from ignorance of the fact, and not from fraud, a claim which the firm had against the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Company, was omitted. A negotiation took place for the compromise of the suit, and the Plaintiffs ultimately agreed to accept from the Defendant the sum of £500 "in full compromise, satisfaction, and discharge of and from all differences, claims, and demands." This sum was accordingly paid, and, in January 1840, the parties executed mutual releases from all actions, accounts, claims, &c., which they had or might have concerning the partnership, and the bill, by consent, was dismissed without costs.

The Defendant being afterwards called on by the railway company to make out all the bills of costs due [504] from them to the partnership, an examination of the books took place, and it was then discovered, to the surprise of the Defendant, that, though Pritt, who principally attended to the accounts, had sent in bills of costs against the company down to the summer of 1831, yet that he had omitted costs to the extent of £1998. This account was sent in and the amount paid to Clay the surviving partner. The representatives of Pritt then filed this bill, insisting that, notwithstanding the release, they were entitled to participate in this sum, the arrangement having taken place under the mutual error that no such claim as that against the company existed.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Rolt, for the Plaintiffs.

THE SOLICITOR-GENERAL (Sir W. W. Follett), Mr. Tinney, and Mr. Bazalgette, for the Defendant.

Harris v. Kemble (2 Dow & Cl. 463, and 5 Bli. 730) was referred to.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS was of opinion that this item had been excluded by a common error. That, notwithstanding the release, the Defendant was not entitled to keep the whole benefit for himself, and that the mistake ought to be set right.

A question then arose, whether the Plaintiffs were entitled to a decree at once for two-thirds of the £1998, or whether the whole accounts were to be opened, and this sum taken merely as an item in them.

[505] THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS, on this point, reserved his judgment.

July 21. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. In this case I stated my opinion, that, notwithstanding the release which had been executed by the Plaintiffs, the Defendant was bound to account for the sum of £1998 which he had received subsequently to the date of the release. The remaining question is in what mode he is to account?

The Plaintiffs by their bill allege, that the sum in question ought to be treated as so much clear profit realised, on the behalf of the firm of Pritt & Clay, and ought to be divided and paid as such, upon the terms of the articles of partnership, thus giving two-third parts to the Plaintiffs, as representatives of Pritt, and leaving the remaining one-third part to the Defendant.

On the other hand, the Defendant insists, that in the event of his not being permitted to retain the whole sum for himself, it ought to be treated only as an item in the partnership accounts, which, in the same event, ought to be considered as entirely open.

I can have no doubt but that, at the time when the releases were given, both parties intended that all accounts and transactions relating to the partnership of Pritt & Clay should be closed. Neither of them anticipated that anything would occur to disturb the arrangement then concluded. The Defendant, thinking that he had satisfied the liabilities of the late firm, and expecting to receive no more than appeared probable from the result of his examination of the books and [506] accounts, which result he had stated in the schedule to his second answer in the former suit, did not anticipate that he would or could again be called upon by the Plaintiffs to account for any subsequent receipts, and in that faith, he executed the release which he gave to the Plaintiffs. It has happened that, under the circumstances which have occurred, the Plaintiffs appear to me to have a right to call upon the Defendant to account for a subsequent receipt, and in such a case, it is necessary to take care that injustice is not done to the Defendant, by holding him to an arrangement, from which, as to this sum, at least, the Plaintiffs are released.

It was argued, that the sum in question ought to be considered as entirely out of the agreement, and that the Plaintiffs' right to their share of it ought to be treated as an entirely independent demand; but it does not appear to me that I ought so to consider it. If this sum had been known to both parties, it would have been treated as an item in the partnership accounts. I may presume, that if, with the item in their view, they had been desirous to compromise the suit, the Plaintiffs would have desired, and the Defendant might have been willing to give, a larger sum than was actually paid to the Plaintiffs; but what sum would have been required or given it is impossible for me to know, or even to conjecture. Various motives which induced the parties to compromise in the state of things which they supposed to be true might have operated differently, or with different force and effect, if the existence of this item had been known; and, giving to the Plaintiffs the benefit of the item in account, it appears to me just, that both parties should, as far as it is now practicable be restored to the situation in which they were before the agreement which is the disturbed was made. I am therefore of opinion, that an account of the partnership profits [507] must be taken, in the manner asked by the alternative prayer of the bill, except as to the two years, in respect of which I do not understand that the Plaintiffs' claim to an account is established.

[507] PRICE v. BLAKEMORE. July 26, 1843.

Trustees, with the consent of A. B., the tenant for life, had a power to sell the trust estate and invest the produce in other real estate. In 1810 A. B., with the concurrence of the trustees, sold the estate for £8440, and received the purchase-money. About the same time (but whether with the concurrence of the trustees was not proved), A. B. purchased another estate for £17,400. Of the £8440, £8124 was paid by A. B. in part payment for the second estate; the remainder was paid part out of A. B.'s monies, and partly by money raised by a mortgage of the estate. The estate was conveyed to A. B. in fee. No acknowledgment or declaration of trust was ever made by A. B., and he retained possession of the estate till thirty years after, when he became bankrupt. The Court, against A. B.'s assignees, presumed, under these circumstances, that the purchase had been made under the power for the benefit of the trust, and held that there had been no such adverse possession, and no such acquiescence on the part of the trustees, as to preclude the Court making a declaration that they had a lien on the estate to the extent of the trust monies invested in its purchase.

In 1810 an estate, which for distinction may be called the Eardiston estate, stood limited to the use of Mr. Edwards for life, with remainder to trustees secure a jointure to Mrs. Edwards, and to preserve contingent remainders, with remainder to their issue in tail male. There was a power for the trustees, with the consent in writing of Mr. Edwards, to sell the property, and with all convenient speed to invest the produce in the purchase of other fee-simple hereditaments, to be sold to the same uses.

In May 1810 Mr. Edwards, with the sanction of the trustees, but in his own name, entered into a contract for the sale of the trust estate to Mr. Kenyon for £8440. In September in the same year, he entered into a contract with Mr. Bishton for the purchase of another estate called the Hampton Hall estate for £17,400, but there was no evidence of his having done so with the sanction of the trustees. On the 7th of May 1811 Mr. [508] Kenyon paid £7000, part of his purchase-money, to Mr. Edwards by cheque, which cheque, together with £300 cash, belonging to Mr. Edwards, was, on the next day, paid over by Mr. Edwards to Mr. Bishton, in part payment of the purchase-money for the Hampton Hall estate. A further sum of £1123, received by Mr. Edwards from Mr. Kenyon, was proved to have been paid by him to Mr. Bishton in December, so that of the whole money derived from the sale of the trust estate (£8123) was traced into the Hampton Hall estate. The trustees executed a conveyance to Mr. Kenyon, and gave a receipt for the purchase-money, the whole of which was received by Mr. Edwards.

A suit for specific performance was afterwards instituted by Mr. Bishton against

Mr. Edwards; and he having borrowed £5000 to enable him to perfect the purchase, the Hampton Hall estate was, in January 1818, conveyed to Mr. Edwards in fee, who immediately mortgaged it by demise to secure the £5000. Edwards paid the remainder of the purchase-money, and afterwards charged the estate with the payment of £1300 to Mr. Wace. No acknowledgment or declaration of trust was ever executed by Edwards, shewing that the Hampton Hall estate was purchased with the trust property.

Mr. Edwards remained in possession till May 1841, when he became a bankrupt, and the estate was claimed by his assignees. This bill was filed by the surviving trustee, to establish a lien on the Hampton Hall estate, to the extent of the trust money employed in its purchase.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh and Mr. Glasse, for the Plaintiff. It is clear that Edwards acted as the agent of the [509] trustees, both in the sale of the one estate, and the purchase of the other. The trust money is traced into the Hampton Hall estate, which, though conveyed to him in fee, was still, to the extent of the trust money, held by him for the benefit of the trust.

Mr. G. Turner and Mr. Piggott, for the assignees. The object of this suit is to enforce, against the assignees of the legal owner in fee, a lien which, it is alleged, arose so long back as the year 1810, no admission or recognition of the title in the meantime being proved. After such a lapse of time and such laches, this Court would not interfere in enforcing the right, even if it were proved to have originally existed. In Bonney v. Ridgard (1 Cox, 145), which was a suit to set aside a fraudulent purchase from an executor, though the Court thought the Plaintiff would be entitled to relief, if the suit had been brought within proper time, yet the bill was dismissed, solely on the ground of the delay.

If the case be put on there being a trust, then it is merely a constructive trust, which will be barred by time. In Beckford v. Wade (17 Ves. 87), Sir William Grant said (page 96), "As our statute bars only legal remedies, of course it has no direct operation upon trusts, for which there was no remedy but in Courts of Equity. But Courts of Equity, by their own rules, independently of any Statutes of Limitation, give great effect to length of time; and they refer frequently to the Statutes of Limitation, for no other purpose than as furnishing a convenient measure, for the length of time that ought to operate as a bar, in equity, of any particular demand.

[510] "It is certainly true, that no time bars a direct trust as between cestui que trust and trustee; but if it is meant to be asserted, that a Court of Equity allows a man to make out a case of constructive trust, at any distance of time after the facts and circumstances happened out of which it arises, I am not aware that there is any ground for a doctrine so fatal to the security of property as that would be; so far from it, that not only in circumstances where the length of time would render it extremely difficult to ascertain the true state of the fact, but where the true state of the fact is easily ascertained, and where it is perfectly clear that relief would originally have been given upon the ground of constructive trust, it is refused to the party, who, after long acquiescence, comes into a Court of Equity to seek that relief."

Supposing, however, that the lapse of time is no bar, then the Plaintiff must adduce clear proof, first, that the produce of the trust estate was invested in the Hampton Hall estate: and, secondly, that it was so invested on account of the trust. We admit that to the extent of £7000, the produce of the Eardiston estate, was laid out in the purchase of the Hampton Hall estate; but there is not a tittle of proof, that Mr. Edwards acted as the agent of the trustees, or that the money was invested on account of the trust, or how the money happened to come into his hands. In favour of the legal title, it must be assumed, after the lapse of thirty-one years, that the money was placed in his hands by the trustees, and that he was liable as on a loan, or as agent. No authority of the trustees being shewn for its reinvestment in this estate, he must be considered liable only for the money, and the remedy against him is therefore barred.

[511] The Plaintiff has no lien upon the estate. In Newcomb v. Burdon (2 Anstr. 343), A. tenant for life, with remainder to B. in tail, by fraud, got B.'s authority to levy a fine; he sold the land, and invested the purchase-money in the funds, where it was clearly identified. It was held that B. had no lien on this money against the other creditors of A.; and Wilson v. Foreman (3 Dickens, 593), as explained in 10 Ves. 519, affords no sanction for a contrary doctrine.

The estate was conveyed to Mr. Edwards absolutely; until his bankruptcy, he dealt with it as the absolute owner, both by mortgaging and charging it. It would not have been a due execution of the power to have purchased an equity of redemption, or an estate of which the tenant for life was absolutely entitled to an undivided portion.

The trustees concurred, and therefore have no right to come into equity, to have a breach of trust for which they are liable repaired by other parties.

Having regard to the long undisputed possession, the length of time, the laches, and the absence of proof of the material facts, the Plaintiff must come in under the bankruptcy.

Mr. Parry, for the infant tenant in tail.

Mr. Kindersley, Mr. Kenyon, and Mr. Craig, for other parties.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply. A tenant for life, as the agent for the trustees, sells the trust estate, and, the day after the receipt of the purchase-money, it is handed [512] over in payment for another estate. Can there be any reasonable doubt that he acted as the agent of the trustees in the purchase, or that the estate was purchased on account of the trust and in execution of the power?

This case cannot be affected by the length of time. There has been no adverse possession: the tenant for life was during his life entitled to the possession of the substituted estate; his enjoyment has been rightful in pursuance of the trust, and not adverse.

Trust money may always be followed; and in Small v. Atwood (Younge, 507) money was followed into an investment, under much slighter circumstances than in the present case. It was wrong in conveying to Edwards in fee; but it would not have been right to have conveyed the estate to the trustees, because Edwards, to the extent of the money contributed by him, had a lien on the estate.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. It appears to me that the assignees were perfectly right in having this matter investigated, and they would not have performed their duty, if they had not done so; but, upon investigation, the case does not seem to be attended with any difficulty.

The estate was vested in the trustees of the settlement; and the Plaintiff was one of those trustees for the benefit of a married woman and other parties. There was a power of sale, to be exercised only with the consent of the tenant for life; and there was a direction that the purchase-money should be laid out in the purchase of other lands, to be settled to similar uses; it was [513] only, therefore, for the purpose of reinvestment that the power of sale was to be exercised.

The simple facts are these, there was an authority given by the trustees to Mr. Edwards to sell the trust estate, and it was accordingly sold for £8440 in the year 1810. The purchase-money was received by Mr. Edwards, and it clearly appears that in this part of the transaction, namely, in the receipt of the purchase-money, Mr. Edwards was the agent of the trustees. He did not, it appears, pay over the purchase-money to the trustees. His assignees now request me to assume, that this was a simple loan of the money by the trustees to Mr. Edwards, and that the trustees had nothing but his personal security for replacing it; but it is in no way shewn, that the money was left in the hands of Mr. Edwards as a simple loan to him. Contemporaneously with the sale of the trust estate to Mr. Kenyon, there was a purchase of the Hampton Hall estate by Mr. Edwards from Mr. Bishton for £17,400. Of the sum of £8440 received for the purchase-money of the trust estate a sum of £7000 was, on the very day after, and by the very cheque for £7000 received from Kenyon, handed over to Bishton in part payment of the £17,400. If the Court was ever justified in acting on a presumption, it must, in this case, presume, that it was for the purpose of investment in the Hampton Hall estate that the Eardiston estate was sold. Considering the trusts, the person employed, the contemporaneous purchase, and the application of the portion of the purchase-money, nobody can believe otherwise than that this was one transaction, a sale of the trust estate, and a reinvestment of this part of the produce at least in another. In the course of a few months £2000 more was paid by Mr. Kenyon, of which £1123, 13s.

was paid over to Bishton, so that the whole purchase-money [514] of £8440, except about £316, is proved to have been applied in the purchase of the Hampton Hall estate. The whole of the purchase-money for that estate was not paid until some time after, in January 1818, there having been, as I understand, a suit instituted in which Edwards was called upon specifically to perform the agreement, and for that purpose it became necessary to borrow £5000. What happened then was extremely wrong; the conveyance was taken to Edwards in fee, and this was done, without anything to shew that any part of the purchase-money had arisen from the sale of the trust property, and not only was that fact not noticed in the conveyance, but there does not appear to have been any other deed executed.

Edwards entered into possession, without having made any acknowledgment that he held on any trust. It is to be observed that, he being one of the cestuis que trust, and entitled for life to the income of the trust property, there was no adverse title ever brought in question between these parties, no pretence that Edwards was entitled to hold this property as against the trustees; but being entitled as tenant for life, he remained in the apparent enjoyment of his life interest, and the question of a possession inconsistent with his title under the deed was never contemplated.

This differs from the cases where, by the acquiescence of the trustees, the right of redress becomes lost. Edwards was not performing his duty in taking the estate in the way he did, but there is not the slightest thing to shew that the trustees were cognizant of what had taken place or in any way acquiesced therein. If there had been the slightest ground for the supposition, I must assume that the assignees would have filed their cross-bill, and have brought the matter before the Court. [515] I cannot suppose that there are any such grounds, the assignees not having filed a cross-bill to establish their case.

I think, therefore, there is no objection arising from any length of time which has elapsed: that £8123, 19s. of the produce of the trust estate has been traced into the Hampton Hall estate, and that to this extent the Plaintiff is entitled to a declaration that he has a lien on the estate.

[515] OLDFIELD v. COBBETT. July 28, 1843.

After an estate has been fully administered in this Court, the executor will not be permitted without the leave of the Court, to prosecute an action to recover part of the testator's property from a party to the suit.

In May 1843 the Defendant Cobbett, the executor of his father, whose estate had been administered in this Court, brought three further actions against the Plaintiff, who had in this suit been found to be a creditor of the estate. The Court, upon the affidavits, considered that, substantially, those actions had been brought to recover property belonging to the testator.

Mr. Parker moved for an injunction to restrain the Defendant prosecuting the actions.

The Defendant, in person, contra.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. Whether there are merits or not in this case, I certainly am not in a situation to determine, but I can determine this, that after the estate of the testator has been fully administered in this Court, and every opportunity given to the Defendant, the executor, to examine [516] every charge on the estate, and every particular constituting the estate, he cannot be permitted, without the leave of the Court, to commence an action to recover from the Plaintiff a portion of the testator's property.

Where parties conduct their own cause, one misfortune is, that they do not understand where the stress of the case is, and the consequence is, that the time of the Court is occupied in discussing that which is quite immaterial. It has been supposed that the order for a receiver, and the order to restrain the executor from getting in the estate, was the foundation for the order restraining the former action (5 Beavan, 132), but this really formed no part of the consideration.

Under the present circumstances I must grant the injunction. It appears to me that these actions are substantially brought to recover property belonging to the testator, after the estate has been administered in this Court; this cannot be allowed without the leave of the Court. If there is any ground to justify the proceedings at law, it is open to Mr. Cobbett to make a proper application for leave, and then it will be seen whether there has been any such omission in the former proceedings, as to make it proper to commence fresh litigation.

Taking the matter as it now stands, and it appearing that the estate has been administered, and that three actions have been brought by the executor against the Plaintiff without the leave of the Court, I think it proper that they should be stayed. I must grant the application with costs.

See Frank v. Basnett, 2 Myl. & K. 618.

[517] GUIDICI v. KINTON. July 19, August 7, 1843.

Under a decree in a legatee's suit to take the usual accounts, A. B. went in and claimed the residue, which the Master found him entitled to; but the residue was not then ascertained, and no order was made in respect of it. Held, that A. B. was not precluded from afterwards asking relief against the executor, in respect of an alleged breach of trust, in a suit of his own, he not having, in the first suit, been in a situation to investigate the accounts of the executor, or to claim the relief which he asked in the second.

The facts of this case sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Mr. Turner and Mr. Haig, for the Plaintiff, cited Shepherd v. Towgood (Turn. Russ. 379).

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. Kindersley, and Mr. Dixon, for the Defendant.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS reserved his judgment.

August 7. THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. This bill is filed by Gaetano Guidici one of the Italian executors of the late Mrs. Cosway, against Newbold Kinton, the executor of the same testatrix in England, and it prays, that the Defendant may account for all such parts of the personal estate of the testatrix as was situate in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, at the time of her death, and may be charged with the loss occasioned by the investment of £7200 in Bank stock, as with interest upon such sums of money as should appear to have been lent by him at interest, or improperly retained in his hands.

After some objections, to the constitution of the suit and to the representation which had been taken out to Mrs. Cosway, had been taken, it appeared to me, that if [518] there was no other objection, the Defendant was bound to account to the Plaintiff in this suit for the English personal estate of Mrs. Cosway possessed by him. It was then shewn by the Plaintiff, that a part of the English personal estate of Mrs. Cosway consisted of £5000 Bank stock; that on the 17th of April 1839 the Defendant, having no immediate occasion for money for the purposes of the testatrix's estate, sold that Bank stock for £10,268; that on the same day, he lent £10,000 part of the purchase-money, to Messrs. Hulberts & Co.; that the money was repaid by them, at various times between the time when it was lent to the month of February 1839; and that on the 26th of February 1839 the Defendant reinvested the sum of £7200 in the purchase of £3500 Bank stock. The Defendant received the sum of £213, 4s. 1d. for interest on the loan to Messrs. Hulberts & Co. and now offers to allow that sum to be paid to the Plaintiff, but the Plaintiff claims to be entitled to charge the Defendant with so much Bank 3 per cent. annuities, might have been purchased with the £7200 at the time when that sum was invested in Bank stock, and with interest at 5 per cent. upon the money which he lent Messrs. Hulberts & Co. I am of opinion that he is entitled to some relief upon the transaction, if he be not precluded from asking any relief, in consequence of the proceedings in a former cause of Prodon v. Kinton.

As to this, the case is, that in the month of August 1839 Annette Prodon, legatee of £1000 under the will of Mrs. Cosway, filed her bill for an account of what was due to her upon her legacy, and for payment, or that the usual accounts might be taken. The Defendant answered that bill, and by an order dated the 25th of of March 1840, it was referred to the Master to take an account of the personal estate of the testatrix come to [519] the hands of Mr. Kinton, and also an account of the debts, funeral expenses, and legacies of the testatrix.

Under this order, and on the 15th of July 1840, Gaetano Guidici, the Plaintiff in the present suit, claimed to be a creditor of the testatrix to the amount of £4000, with interest thereon from the day of the death of the testatrix, and this claim was allowed by the Master, and stated in his report, dated the 3d of February 1841. Under the same order, Guidici, by another state of facts, claimed to be entitled, as specific legatee, to receive, on trusts created by the testatrix, the entire residue of her personal estate and effects in England, and by the same report, the Master found him to be entitled, as specific legatee, to a sum of £2800 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities, or the residue thereof then remaining in the hands of the trustees of an indenture of the 11th of July 1832, and to the clear residue of the testatrix's estate and effects in England.

The Defendant took exceptions to the report, and Guidici and his two co-trustees presented a petition for payment of the debt of £4000 and interest, and the case coming on to be heard, upon the report, the exceptions and the petition, on the 26th of April 1841, it was ordered that the exceptions should be overruled, that the debt claimed by Guidici and his co-trustees should be paid to them, and that the legacy and interest found due to Annette Prodon should be paid to her. The Master was not directed to state what was the residue of the testatrix's estate, and no report or order was made in respect thereof.

I have read all the proceedings in the Master's office with which I have been furnished; and I am of opinion, that Guidici was not, in the cause of Prodon v. Kinton, [520] in a situation which enabled him to investigate the accounts of Mr. Kinton, or to claim the relief which he now asks, and that he is not precluded from asking the relief in a suit of his own.

From some difficulty, which there may have been, in determining what, under a proper construction of the testamentary papers, ought to have been done with the Bank stock, and from some evidence which is given that the Defendant acted under legal advice in reinvesting the £7200 in Bank stock, I think that I ought not to charge him with interest at 5 per cent. upon so much of the £10,268 purchase-money as remained unapplied for the purposes of the will, from the time when the Bank stock was sold, down to the 26th of February 1839; and that the account of the estate must be taken, with a declaration to that effect, and leave for the Master, if he shall think fit, to adopt the accounts in Prodon v. Kinton.

As the whole question raised in this cause has been occasioned by the sale of the Bank stock, when the proceeds were not required for the purposes of the estate, I think that Kinton must pay the costs of this suit up to and including the hearing of his cause.

And whatever may be found due, in respect of the residue, should be paid into Court to the credit of this cause, with liberty to apply.

[521] HOLMES v. BADDELEY. July 27, 1843.

[S. C. reversed on appeal, 1 Ph. 476; 41 E. R. 713; 14 L. J. Ch. 113; 9 Jur. 289; for subsequent proceedings, see 7 Beav. 69. See Pearse v. Pearse, 1846, 1 De G. & Sm. 27; Pearse v. Foster, 1885, 15 Q. B. D. 119.]

A. and B. claimed an estate adversely, as heirs ex parte paterna, and C. claimed the estate as heir ex parte materna. In a suit by A. against B. to set aside a compromise entered into between them, B. admitted he had in his possession cases submitted for the opinion of counsel after C.'s adverse claim, and in contemplation of legal proceedings. Held, that they were not privileged.

In the same case, the Defendant B. stated, that A. and C. had entered into some compromise to share the proceeds of the estate, and that he believed, that the suit was carried on by A. for the benefit and in concert with C. Held, that this did not relieve B. from the obligation to produce the cases.

The Plaintiff and the Defendants claimed an estate, adversely, as heirs at law ex parte paterna of Susannah Holmes, the younger, who died in 1838, the Defendants alleging that the Plaintiff was illegitimate.

The estate was also claimed by Mrs. Hemming, as heir ex parte materna.

In 1839 the Plaintiff entered into a compromise of his claim with the Defendants, by which the produce of the estate was to be divided between them in certain proportions, and in 1842 the Plaintiff, alleging that the transaction was tainted with fraud and misrepresentation, filed this bill to set it aside.

The Defendants, by their answer, stated the claims of the heir ex parte materna, and that in 1841 the legal estate in the property had improperly been conveyed to Elworthy, upon some trusts for the benefit of the Plaintiff and Mrs. Hemming, and to give effect to some compromise between them, to share the proceeds of the estate, and they stated as follows:—"And the Defendants believe this suit to be instituted and carried on, not only for the benefit of the said Complainant, but for the benefit and in concert with the said Mrs. Hemming, as well as the said Elworthy."

The Defendants admitted "that they had in their possession or power, certain letters and copies of letters [522] between their solicitors, as such solicitors, and various persons, of various dates subsequent to August 1838, and a case marked with the letter (A), on the behalf of the Defendants, laid before counsel in the month of November 1838, with his opinion thereon, and another case marked with the letter (B), on behalf of the Defendants, laid before counsel in the month of January 1839, with his opinion thereon, which cases were laid before counsel, and all of which letters were written and sent, after the Defendants were aware that a claim to the said estates, adverse to the title of the said Defendants, was about to be made on the part of the alleged heir to Susannah Holmes the younger, ex parte materna, and in contemplation of legal proceedings being taken by the said Defendants to enforce such title, and the greater number thereof, after the said claim had actually been made on the part of Mrs. Hemming, and occasioned by, and with reference to such claim, and with reference to the right and title of the said Defendants in issue in this cause, and was wholly independent of the compromise by the said Complainant's said bill sought to be set aside, and without any reference thereto. They said, that they were advised and insisted, that all the said documents and the said two cases and opinions, and the said letters and copies of letters were privileged communications, and that they were not bound to produce the same, or make any discovery in relation thereto."

A motion was now made for the production of these documents.

Mr. Pemberton Leigh, Mr. G. Turner, and Mr. Bird, in support of the motion.

Mr. Kindersley and Mr. G. Russell, contra.

[523] Mr. Pemberton Leigh, in reply.

Curling v. Perring (2 Myl. & K. 380), Storey v. Lord George Lennox (1 Myl. & K. 525), Herring v. Cloberry (1 Phillips, 91), and Cholmondeley v. Clinton (Turn. & R. p. 116; and see Jones v. Pugh, 1 Phillips, 96), were cited.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS [Lord Langdale]. The question in this case is whether the documents referred to ought to be produced. The bill is filed by a person who claims to be heir at law of Susannah Holmes, ex parte paterna, and unless he makes out his claim in that character, the suit cannot be maintained. Having filed his bill to set aside a deed of compromise, he moves on the answer that certain documents in the Defendants' possession may be produced. It appears that the Defendants in this case, are persons who also claim to be heirs at law of Susannah Holmes, ex parte paterna, so far, therefore as the question whether the heirs ex parte paterna or ex parte materna, ought to prevail, the Plaintiff and Defendants have similar interests. So far from anything adverse, they have precisely the same interest, and no question is raised in this case by the Plaintiff as to any right ex parte materna. Sometime after the death of the party in possession, claims ex parte materna were made, and the Defendants, claiming as heirs ex parte paterna, found it necessary to prepare to defend their right as heirs ex parte paterna, against the claim of the heirs ex parte materna. The contest on this occasion is as to the production of the documents which arose as a consequence. The Defendants state in their answer that the cases were laid before counsel, and the letters were written and sent after they were aware "that a claim [524] the said estates adverse to their title was about to be made on the part of the alleged heir to the said Susannah Holmes the younger, ex parte materna, and in contemplation of legal proceedings being taken by the Defendants to enforce such title, and the greater number thereof after the said claim had actually been made on the part of Mrs. Hemming, and occasioned by and with reference to such claim, and with reference to the right and title of these Defendants in issue in this cause, and the said cross-cause, by the said Defendants instituted as aforesaid, and was wholly independent of the compromise by the said Complainant's said bill sought to be set aside, and without any reference thereto."

If it be true that the right of the Defendants as heirs ex parte paterna was in question between them and those claiming ex parte materna, the issue in this cause is something quite different from that which was then in question. Taking the record as it stands, the Plaintiff in this suit must stand or fall by establishing that he is heir ex parte paterna, there is nothing now in controversy between these parties which was then in issue. It is clear, that these documents originated before the suit between the Plaintiff and Defendants in this case arose or was in contemplation, it does not therefore appear to me that the Defendants are entitled to the protection which they have asked.

It is said that the letters passed between the Defendants and their solicitors, but the right to protection on that account fails on the words in the answer.

It is then contended that this bill, though the suit of the Plaintiff, is in effect, in some way or other, the suit of Mrs. Hemming, and that although the Plaintiff has so framed his bill as to stand or fall by his title of heir ex [525] parte paterna, yet that some arrangement has been made by the Plaintiff with the person claiming as heir ex parte materna, and that the Plaintiff is carrying on the suit in concert with her and for her benefit, and that as she would not have a right to production, therefore the Plaintiff ought not. I do not recollect having such a case as this attempted before.

It is also said that the Plaintiff having got a discovery might dismiss the bill, and then Mrs. Hemming might file a bill of her own and use the discovery obtained in this suit. I am of opinion, that speculations of this sort ought not to affect the rights of parties on the record. There is no possibility of knowing what may be the consequence of the production of documents which the Plaintiff in a cause may obtain. This Court cannot act on such speculations. I must look at this record as constructed in a particular form, and not speculate on the use which may be made of the discovery when obtained.

I think that the Plaintiff is entitled to the production of the letters and cases.

NOTE.—On appeal to the Lord Chancellor, this case was reversed on the 25th of November 1844.

[525] THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. THE GROCERS' COMPANY. (LAXTON'S CHARITY.)
Jan. 18, 20, 21, 1155.

A testator by his will founded a charity, towards which he directed certain and definite sums to be applied, and he devised estates to a company for that purpose. The will contained no express beneficial gift to the company. Held, however, under the circumstances, that the company was entitled to the increased rents of the property after making the fixed payments.

This information was filed by the Attorney-General, at the relation of several of the inhabitants of Oundle, and it sought to have the whole increased rents of property devised to the Grocers' Company, applied to the charitable purposes stated in the testator's will.

Sir W. Laxton by his will, dated the 17th of July 1556, after giving certain pecuniary legacies, devised as follows:—"The residue of all my manors, lands," &c., "I leave to descend, after the decease of Dame Johane my wife, to my cousin Johane Wanton, my right heir, and her heirs for ever, according to the order of the King and Queen's Majesties' lawes;" and he appointed his wife to be sole executrix of his will, and certain persons therein named to be overseers, who were to assist her.

R. II.—30

On the 22d of July 1556 the testator made a codicil, which was as follows:— After reciting that “he was fully minded to erect and found a free grammar school at Oundle, in the county of Northampton, to have continuance for ever, to be kept in the messuage, late called the Guyld or Fraternity House of Oundle aforesaid, which free school he willed, should be called the Free Grammar School of him, Sir William Laxton, Knight, Alderman of London.” And further reciting, “that his mind, will, and intent was, that the schoolmaster of the said free school, for the time being, should have for his stipend and wages yearly, £18, and the usher of the said school, yearly, £6, 13s. 4d. And that his whole [527] mind and intent was, to have seven poor men perpetually to be found at Oundle aforesaid, and to have each of them 8d. weekly, towards their maintenance and relief, and also convenient lodging and house-room and dwelling in the said messuage or tenement, then of late called Guyld or Fraternity House of Oundle. And that for the said godly intent and purpose, he had taken order, and that it was agreed between him and the Wardens of the Commonalty of the Mystery of the Grocers within the City of London; and that he had set out unto them, in particular, certain of his lands and tenements within the City of London, as well for the payment of the stipends aforesaid, appointed to the schoolmaster and usher, and for the poor men, as also for the reparation and maintenance of the said messuage or tenement, then of late called the Guyld or Fraternity House of Oundle; and that he, minding the accomplishment of all the premises, and to have the same take effect according to his full mind and intent, did by his said codicil, will, devise, give, and bequeath unto the Defendants, the Wardens and Commonalty of the Mystery of the Grocers within the City of London, and their successors for ever,” certain messuages, lands, tenements, &c., in his codicil specified: “to hold the same unto them and their successors for ever, upon the condition and intent thereafter expressed and declared; that is to say, that the wardens and commonalty, within as convenient time as they might or could, should make suit with his executors to the King and Queen’s Majesties, to obtain at the Highnesses’ hands, the said messuage or tenement, then of late called the Guyld or Fraternity House of Oundle aforesaid; and the said messuage or tenement being obtained, he willed the same to be employed and used for the schoolhouse aforesaid and for the habitation of the said seven poor men.” And he also willed that the Grocers’ Company [528] should, from time to time, for ever more, provide a schoolmaster and usher, and should yearly pay the schoolmaster “out of the issues, rents and reversions of the messuage, lands, and tenements aforesaid to them bequeathed for his stipend and wages yearly, £18, and to the usher £6, 13s. 4d.” And he also willed them, with the advice and consent of the Vicar, &c., of Oundle, to appoint seven poor men to be bedesmen for him, the said Sir William Laxton, in the said messuage to have their convenient lodging and dwelling therein freely, and that the company should, yearly, pay, “out of the issues and revenues of the aforesaid lands and tenements,” to every one of the said poor men 34s., which amounted weekly to the rate of 8d. a-piece;” and he further willed, that the Grocers’ Company should yearly, pay unto the Vicar, &c., of Oundle, 24s., to be employed in the reparation and maintenance of the said free school; and he further willed, that the said free school, schoolmaster, usher, and bedesmen should perpetually be named and called the free school, &c., of Sir William Laxton.

And he willed, “that for lack of convenient time further to explain and set out the erection aforesaid, that all other things necessarily touching the erection and continuance of the said free school, and other the premises, should be considered and done in such godly sort, as by the good discretion of his executrix and overseers in his last will and testament, or by their learned counsel, should be thought meet and convenient.”

The testator died shortly after (25th July 1556), and his will was proved by his widow on the 28th of August 1556. The [529] company accepted the property, and the guild having in some way which did not appear been obtained, they proceeded to establish the charity, after some disputes and litigation with the widow and the heirs at law. The particulars as to which appeared only from the following entries in the Defendants’ books.

16th November 1556.—“Mr. Alderman Lodge declared at this court, that Sir William Laxton, Knight, did will, by his last will and testament, certain lands in London to this company, for the founding of a free school and maintaining of certain poor persons, as by his will may appear; whereunto, the whole assistants are well willing to receive the same, with thanksgiving for his genteel remembrance."

7th December 1556.—"It is agreed, that Mr. Wardens shall betake a copy of Sir William Laxton's will, so much as shall concern and belong to the erection and finding of a free school as he has devised, and also that the said Mr. Wardens shall view the lands given for the same, and to know what years is granted of the same lands, and when the same shall be expired."

23d December 1556.—"Whereas Sir William Laxton, Knight, deceased, by his last will and testament, devised certain lands and tenements within the City of London, for the erection of a free school and maintenance of certain poor persons in Oundle, in the county of Northampton, and further willed that this company should have the order, rule, and disposition thereof, and forasmuch as it has been sundry times moved to this house, whether they would take upon them to have the said lands to the intent aforesaid or not; at this court, the whole assistants, with thanksgiving, is well willing, pleased, and contented to receive the same, and [530] thereupon have appointed Mr. Wardens, Mr. Tathill, and Mr. Grafton, to speak with Mr. Southcott to travaile with them, in drawing a plot and form in what manner the same may be done, and that finished, to certify the house thereof at the next court."

17th May 1557.—"At this court there was a letter sent from the Earl of Bedford to this company, which read, the effect was, that this company should further the agency of Mr. Laxton for the erection of a free school at Oundle, in Northamptonshire; whereupon it is agreed it shall be moved at the next court."

6th July 1557.—"It is also agreed that Mr. Wardens, Mr. Mills, and Mr. Grafton shall travaile with Mr. Southcott, for a draft to be made of the free school at Oundle, of the late gift of Sir William Laxton, Knight, deceased; and all such money as Mr. Wardens shall lay out for the same, or for anything thereunto appertaining, shall be of the common goods of this house, and this court be a sufficient warranty for them."

12th November 1557.—"At this court, Mr. Alderman Lodge, in open Court, did declare, that the Lady Laxton is minded to make assurance to this company of all such lands as Sir William Laxton, by his last will and testament, did give to this company after her decease, to the intent and upon condition, that the said wardens should employ the same to such uses and purposes as he in his last will and testament hath declared; at which court Mr. Southcott was required to know, what assurance was necessary for the company, who declared that the will of Sir William Laxton, being inrolled in the hustings of London, shall be sufficient assurance to this company; yet the said Mr. Southcott thought it [531] necessary to have a release from Mr. Wanton and his wife, to put all things out of doubt; whereupon, Mr. Wanton being then present, was required to do the same, who answered that for his part he would ever hinder that good work which Mr. Laxton had devised to be done, notwithstanding he would that his heirs should take such benefit as the law will give them, if the company should chance to break the said Mr. Laxton's will; and thereupon the said fr. Wanton desired that Mr. Southcott and Mr. Gilbert might talk therein."

1st March 1558.—"It is agreed that Mr. Wardens, Mr. Grafton, and Mr. Ramsey shall commune and talk with Mr. Thomas Wanton and his wife, for and about a release, from them twain, of Mr. Laxton's lands, which he gave to this company for finding and maintaining of a school at Oundle in Northamptonshire; and they, the persons aforesaid, to require Mr. Recorder and an alderman to go to Mr. Wanton for to take knowledge of the said release."

9th October 1560.—"Whereas Mr. Thomas Lodge, alderman, declared, at a court of assistants holden on the 16th day of November 1556, that Sir William Laxton, knight and alderman of London, did give and bequeath to this company, by his last will and testament, certain lands and tenements in London, for finding of a free school and poor men at Oundle in Northamptonshire; and thereupon, the whole court at that time received the same with thanksgiving, and now, at this court, the said gift concerning the" [here was a short obliteration in the entry] "was revived and had in memory, wherefore the assistants above written are and will be well willing to receive the same lands so bequeathed, and so to per-[532]-form the will of the said Sir William Laxton. And furthermore it was agreed that Mr. Wardens shall retain counsel learned in the laws of this realm, to have an assurance from the Lady Laxton, widow, late wife of the same Sir William Laxton, for to convey the interest of the same lands to this company."

14th October 1566.—"Item—Touching Sir W. Laxton's will, Mr. Wardens are requested to speak with the Lady Laxton and to know her pleasure therein, which they have promised to do."

11th August 1570.—"Item—A motion was made now touching Sir William Laxton's will for the schoolhouse at Oundle, but the taking any order therein was deferred until another time."

27th July 1571.—"Touching Sir W. Laxton's good devise for the maintenance of a free school and other things, communication was now had, and in the end, Mr. Wardens were called to take pains therein, and to take good counsel, what ways were left to bring the same to good effect; and such charges as shall arise about the same, to be borne of the goods of this house, and their order to be a discharge sufficient for the same."

1571.—It appeared, from a bill of costs, that in this year, counsel's opinion was taken, "touching the force of the codicil, which he said was as good as any part of the will;" and that the company exhibited their bill in Chancery against Lady Laxton and Mrs. Wanton respecting the devise, which was carried to a hearing. The pleadings in the suit were not, however, produced.

[533] 18th October 1572.—"Communication was had concerning the free school at Oundle, which Sir William Laxton did, by his will, appoint to be erected and continued by this company; and the matter between the Wantons and the company being yesterday heard in the Court of Chancery, where the Lord Keeper took order, that Mr. Wardens shall speak with Mrs. Wanton, being next heir to Sir William Laxton, and propose to agree with her for some reasonable sum of money to clearly release her title, that she and her heirs may hereafter have in the lands appointed for the maintenance of the said school; whereupon, it was thought good, that Mr. Warden Young, Mr. John Riche, and Mr. Richard Young shall go to Mrs. Wanton, to speak with her, which was so done, and upon their answer, it was agreed, that her counsel and ours shall meet with Mr. Wardens this afternoon at the Temple, in Mr. Solicitor, his chambers, and there to have conference for an agreement. There was conference but no agreement."

24th October 1572.—"This Court was informed what had been done in the suit for the lands appointed for this company for the maintenance of Sir William Laxton's school in Oundle, which hath been a chargeable suit: and there was now read an order made by the Lord Keeper, wherein is included an offer made by Mrs. Johane Wanton, and also a dismission out of the Chancery. Whereupon, it was thought good to send to the Lady Laxton presently, to know her pleasure, whether she would be content to part from the houses for her lifetime, and to let the company possess the same, that with the rents, they may erect and maintain the school, according to Sir William Laxton's will; and there were now sent unto her Mr. Alderman Boxe, Mr. Warden Young, Mr. Francis Bowyer, Mr. Richard Young, and Mr. Thomas Norton, which brought word, [534] that the said Lady Laxton is content to part from the said houses out of her hand, so that the company will, with the rents of the same, perform and fulfil the will of the said Sir William Laxton touching the maintenance of the said free school and poor men at Oundle. And there were now requested to assist Mr. Wardens in the said business, Mr. Alderman Boxe, Mr. Richard Thornhill, Mr. Nicholas Backhouse, and Mr. William Owenshawe."
